AN EVANGELIST ON EVANGELISM—By Herbert Yeuell.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Volume XXVII. January 6, 1910. Number 1

The Ultimate Problem

THE WHOLE discussion about the divinity of Christ is usually vitiated by the fallacy of assuming certainty with reference to God, and then arguing whether Christ is of the same nature, whereas all we can legitimately do is to begin with the warm, blood-red spirit of Jesus Christ and ask ourselves whether the heart of God is like that. The significant thing finally is not so much whether Christ is divine, as whether God is Christlike! And the only way to determine this is by asking whether Christ is an exception or a normal product in the life of the world. If other lives like his are possible; if the social order is capable of incarnating his spirit; if a kingdom of Christlike men and women can be built in the world; then we may believe that the heart of the world beats true to the heart of Christ, and that God—the inmost Soul of all—is like the soul of Christ. This is the crux. Men are not cynical about Christ. They do not doubt his goodness. They want their children to know him and they would delight to see his spirit rule the world. There is little if any serious dissent from his ideals. But there is much doubt whether his teachings are practicable; whether his unselfishness, meekness and idealism are capable of realization in a universe where power and cunning seem supreme. And unless they are possible of attainment there would seem to be only tragic mockery in things and our experience could furnish no evidence that there is a God worthy to be called the Father of Jesus Christ. What is needed to create faith in the soul of the modern man is evidence that Christianity is fitted to the task of creating a better moral order, a juster social system. This practical achievement would demonstrate the quality of the world we live in and relieve us of the present difficult task of proving the infinite goodness of God in the face of a seemingly very bad world.

Is God A Christian?

An Exposition of an Uninspired Text

The words on our cover page this week will be found full of suggestion to thoughtful people who will ponder them.

It will, perhaps, repay editors and readers to linger awhile with the statements of Dr. Ames to see just what truth they may contain and what some of the bearings of this truth may be.

Our great and final concern, he says, is to know what kind of a God we may count on in this universe.

What our hearts need for strength in the struggle of life is to know that God also fights with us, and what our hearts need for solace in the sorrows of life is to know that God cares for us. This is the ultimate need and the only need of our lives.

If God could be demonstrated to us beyond peradventure, if He would smite and grip our minds with His presence, so that we would see and know that He exists, and that the good is bound to win, and that no matter what we lose for the sake of the good we ourselves cannot be lost—if we could be made absolutely certain of this there would no longer be any religious problem whatsoever.

But in the world in which we live no man is absolutely certain. We cannot see the final outcome of things, and, shut up as we are to the present, we see evil entrenched and often triumphant, we see goodness fail, we see good men suffer, we see bad men prosper, we see children born into the world with no chance to become anything but criminals, we see a city wiped out by a cyclone or an earthquake, we see a selfish, vicious politician climb to power and honor while his rival who with clean, unselfish hands aspires to serve his fellows goes to defeat—in a word, we see good and evil woven together in the universe as the warp and woof are woven together in a fabric, and we cannot tell by simple observation whether God is good or not, or whether indeed there be a God at all.

It is this deepest and most baffling question of the soul that Jesus Christ answers.

He does not answer it with an argument. He does not answer it by writing a book. Doctrines and dogmas have nothing to do with the answer that he gives. His answer to the soul's perplexity is not in terms of a creed but of his actual life.

> "He wrought
> With human hands the Creed of creeds,
> In loveliness of perfect deeds
> More true than all poetic thought."

He demonstrated the existence of God and the goodness of God by an experiment—the sublime experiment of living from dawn till dark as if God did exist and was good. He put God to the test, not by artificial devices like that with which he was tempted once in the wilderness, but in meeting the real situations of his actual experience he trusted God to help him and to take care of him.

It was a costly experiment—all the treasures of his life were staked on the outcome. But he wavered not through humiliation and poverty and buffetings and the scorn of men. And when he came to death he said, I will drink that cup, too, before I will assert my will against my Father's!

Standing in the shadow of death, with its chill breath smiting his face, his heart ached lest his friends should miss altogether the meaning of his life, and he wished them to possess his peace and his joy!

He was conscious that in all his life, and now in his impending death, he was expressing the will of One greater than himself. "I and my Father are one," he had said. Manifestly as his life's experience deepened he had become more and more certain of God's personal reality and goodness. So that now when one of his friends, mystified by his talk, asks that he shew them the Father, he replies with the most revealing word he ever spoke, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father!"

God works as I work, he would say to Philip and to all men who are baffled by this mystery of life. He cares for the things I care for and hates what I hate. He estimates the soul as I estimate it. He despises the titles and trappings of culture and position as I despise them when they cover pride and craft and a selfish heart. He yearns for the outcast and the weary and the injured to forgive and revive and heal, as ye see me do. What I do in my three and thirty years, that God is doing in his millenniums. And my Calvary, to which I hasten, a moment in history, is matched by the eternal heartache of God, "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world."

The root fallacy of the church's theology for many centuries is that it has made a problem of Jesus, whereas God meant him to be the answer to life's deepest problem.

God is the real problem. Christ is not a problem, but a fact.

God is the unknown x which we are seeking in the equation of life. And Christ is the given term in the equation.

Traditional theology starts with God to explain Jesus. It asks, Is Christ divine? Is Christ like God? Is his nature of the same substance as God's nature? In the life men really live these questions have neither point nor application. They are fictitious questions growing out of a fictitious conception of the world.

True theology starts with Jesus to find God. It asks, Is God like Christ? The pyramid is made to stand upon its apex if the doctrine of the Deity of Christ is taken as the fundamental thing in Christianity. The Christian character of God is the fundamental thing. The essence of the incarnation is that God is a Christian.

He is not a King-God, ruling us men from above, nor a Philosopher-God, looking on impassive or helpless while we struggle and win and fail and die.

He is a human God, a Christian God, standing beside us in the conflict, refilling our quiver of arrows, binding up our wounds and noting the fall of the least of us.

We can count on finding in God all that we see in Jesus—this is Christianity.

If we accept Christianity in these terms we accept not a personal faith only but a social task as well.

In connecting this social task with personal faith Dr. Ames has made a most important contribution to Christian thinking. In many minds there has long been felt the lack of just this link between personal religious experience and social service.

For the most part, Christianity has been conceived as an individual experience, and social reform, while it has been regarded as a good thing, has been relegated to the realm of "mere morality."

But in a religion whose basis is faith in the Christian character of God, the social order holds a strategic position. If Christ's kind of life cannot be made at home in the world; if his ideals, his unselfishness, his meekness are incapable of attainment in the social order, our faith that God is like Christ or that there is a God at all would be a pitiable mockery.

But if the social order may be seen to progressively conform itself to the principles and ideals of Christ, what other proof does one need that the God back of and in the world is like Christ, that his will is indeed one with the will of Christ?

Thus sociology becomes the supreme apologetic for theology. Thus the business of proving that a good God exists is taken out of the hands of the philosophers and given to every common worker for the social welfare. For if a man repeats Christ's life in his own life and makes Christ's ideals to reign in ever so obscure a corner of the social order, he has given the doubter an indisputable proof that God's heart beats true to the heart of Christ.

And this is what it means to confess Christ, as if a soul should say: I believe that the unseen God is like the Christ whom I meet face to face in the gospels, that He will establish in the moral order of the world whatsoever of good my hands perform and that he tenderly cares for my soul and counts my life of infinite worth for its own sake. This I believe. And I join hands with all souls of like faith to create a juster, better, fairer social order in which it shall be manifest that this our common faith is true.

Editorial Survey

Keeping the Great Commission

The following table is interesting. Complete statistics are not at hand, but these are significant from the Disciple view-point. We best help ourselves by recognizing our own delinquencies. This table shows how many members each of the following religious bodies has per missionary:

Disciples—One to every.....6139
Baptists—One to every.....5031
Presbyterians—One to every.....4303
Congregationalists—One to every.....2950
Moravians—One to every..... 60

All these are older and wealthier peoples than the Disciples. The Disciples have been building through a great evangelism. For that reason they have a less matured membership because so much of it is new and their evangelism has also led them to neglect the first part of the Great Commission in their emphasis of the last part. No religious communion is today making the missionary gains that the Disciples are. With their plea for the New Testament only, they ought to become the greatest missionary host in the world.

The Gates of Empire

Jean Paul Richter said "Jesus Christ has lifted the gates of empire and turned the course of history into other channels." Wu Ting Fang, on the eve of his departure for home, gave testimony to the immeasurable value of the missionary to China. Some of her great viceroys and most of the leaders in her present day renaissance bear witness to the fact that he is the real precursor of the new era. He has been the schoolmaster that has led them to modern civilization. Christianity is the dynamic of civilization. Macaulay said that "Christianity has brought freedom to the intellect, redeemed woman from slavery, promoted justice, mitigated the horrors of war, comforted the sorrowing, brightened the mystery of the grave, and to oppose it is treason against humanity and civilization." Griffeth John, for a half century in China, says her "one great need is a vital religion—a mighty power that will transform her inmost being." Stanley said that "the greatest discoveries ever made in Africa were the roads into the hearts of the people." This is the God-given imperialism. Gladstone said that "European intercourse with the uncivilized had, without exception, been disastrous unless attended by missionary exertion." Moozombar, loyal to England, yet cried, "Not England but Jesus Christ is redeeming India," and Sir Andrew Frazer, for a lifetime under the British flag in the Indian government, and for years governor of Bengal, told a great commercial association before whom he was extolling British beneficence in the rule of India that with it all the missionary had done more for India than England ever had.

The missionary "finds the roads into the hearts of the people" and it is there that nations are changed. Sir Wm. Ramsey, the greatest authority on the Levant, says that "the Apostle Paul's journey outrivaled in significance to civilization the conquests of Alexander and Cæsar," and again Gladstone told the world that "the American missionaries have done more for the Levant than all the nations of the earth together." The Sultan, Abdul Hamid, said, "Bulgaria would never have obtained her independence had it not been for Roberts College." Yet Roberts College did not teach the young Bulgarians to rebel, she only taught them manhood, and manhood rebelled. It conquers all old customs and superstitions by putting a new desire into the hearts of the people.

A Thousand Years in a Day

China is to live a thousand years in a day. The day her constitution is adopted will register more progress than has a thousand years. The time is coming when a day of Europe will not be better than a cycle in Cathay. Yet China will never move with the alacrity of Japan. The Japanese are imitative and adapt themselves quickly. The Chinese are slower and intensely racial. The Japanese will adopt the customs of other races quickly and is ever ready to seek the answer to the question of advantage. On the other hand he is patriotic with a religious intensity and never loses his reverence for Nippon in his adoption of new things—he adopts them for the greater glory of Nippon. The Chinaman is scarcely patriotic in the Japanese sense, but he is intensely racial. He clings with almost stupid reverence to custom, saying "it was not so with our fathers." His nation is a great heterogeneous empire held together by racial rather than patriotic bonds, else the Manchus could not have ruled for the past two hundred years. But China is awakening. Education is finding the hearts of the people and the missionary has been the chief school teacher. The Celestial Empire will not change in a day, she may take a century or indeed several of them, but already much of the old has been torn away and the Prince Regent, himself a conservative though not a reactionary, says China will never go back to the old.

The Provincial Assemblies of the twenty-two provinces have met and organized. They are to meet for ten years and learn how to settle local problems, and at the end of that time they will elect the delegates to the convention that will create a constitution for the empire. This illustrates China's conservative temperament. She will make haste slowly. These assemblies raised a vigorous protest against the use of foreign money for the building of railways, and shouted the rallying cry of the country, "China for the Chinese." By this it is not necessarily meant that foreigners shall be excluded, but that Chinese resources must be developed by Chinamen and not delivered over to foreign syndicates for exploitation. There is but one justifiable imperialism and that is the kind that goes to educate and develop a people and teach them how to use their own treasures. Foreign syndicates are rarely endowed with that beneficent motive. Japan has builded her own railroads and constructed her own navy under instruction from western teachers. China will do the same. It may take longer but it will save her the generations she would have to spend redeeming her resources from the hand of property-right represented in the millions of foreign capital. We have a right to demand the open door and the arts of civilized trade in China, but no more right to demand ingress to foreign capital than has China to demand of us the right to land coolies on our soil.

Unifying the Empire

Education is already doing marvels in China. It is destined to do yet greater. China believes in schools, but her traditions had emasculated them of power to transmit knowledge. They but taught her sons the more effectually to look backward. Now she has abolished the old examinations and turned from Confucius to science for the education of her officials. She is attempting to found a school in every village. It will be long before she will have it done for teachers are scarce. But she so honors the teacher that her youth will hasten to make it their vocation. To the honor of it will be added the knowledge that through the school house is the road to China's complete redemption from the old to the new civilization. Here as nowhere on the face of the earth can young men of philanthropic bent today put their lives to the greatest advantage. They can mould the life of a nation, create new ideals in a whole people, transform communities, and play a larger part than in any other vocation in any other place on the face of the earth. And while doing it they will see history made more rapidly than elsewhere in this generation and receive better pay than they can for the same work at home. It is significant that the Y. M. C. A. can best furnish these positions to young men who are willing to enter the governmental service as teachers.

The postal system has been reformed by Sir Robert Hart. The government has taken over the business formerly conducted by private companies who clung to their vested rights just as strenuously as the express or telegraph companies would in this country, and it was only after the people had seen how much more cheaply and expeditiously the government did the business that they were finally routed out of the field. There are already some 3,000 post-offices in the empire and but for the provincial difficulties they would multiply much faster. But they are one of the means of abolishing provincial difficulties and with the drawing of the peoples together the process of reform will be greatly expedited. The currency stands in grave need of nationalizing, but here again the banker and money broker stands in the way for exchange in his business and the more there is to do the more he profits by it. Therefore he resists all suggestion of a universal coinage, but increased transportation and intercommunication will bring this reform by the time the national assembly is ready to meet. Then the dialects will begin to yield to the universal language of literature and China will become less a race and more a nation.

The Saint from the West

It is related that Confucius said that "In the west the true saint must be looked for and found." Whether he ever said it or not, it is from the west the true saint is coming to China. Christianity alone can find that road to the hearts of the people and put that desire into their hearts which will lift the gates of empire and turn the course of history into other channels. It is not claimed that Christian missions are wholly responsible for the renaissance of China but it is claimed that Christianity gives the modern universalizing impulse, that she alone conserves to the new-found peoples their own integrity and claims for them their own property and social rights, that it is Christianity only that goes solely for the good of those to whom she goes, and that it is the Christian in all the other means of civilization that considers the claim of the uncivilized the boon of our enlightenment. The missionary is the scout for civilization; he is the schoolmaster that leads the peoples to deliverance; he is the watchman upon the gates to claim for his wards all the rights that any man is entrusted with.

When Milne died he thought that there might be a thousand Christians in China at the end of the first century of missionary effort. The celebration of that centennary saw nearly 200,000 enrolled in the churches, with a community of 800,000 learners about them. Thus it may be fairly claimed that the Christian community in China today numbers a million souls. They have proven the worth of Chinese Christianity in the martyrdom of the Boxer outbreak and they will increasingly prove their right to a place on the apostolic roster of history by their enthusiasm for the gospel they preach. They will be the salt of the new leaven in China. Prince Ito said, "Except for the missionaries, the young men of Japan would have sunken in immorality." The customs officials found it very difficult to establish modern methods because government had always been an individual matter, and each man was supposed to make whatever he could out of governmental business. No tax collector ever thought of turning in all he collected. So the new postal system finds administration difficult because officials will not do money-order business honestly, and stamps are so generally counterfeited. The official has had no responsibility to anyone but the man above him, and government is honeycombed with graft. New China will need honesty and the Christian youth of New China will be in great demand just as they have been in Japan.

A Free Press and a Free People

The newspapers of China are playing a large part in the reform of the empire. It has been but a few years since the Dowager Empress had some editors sliced lengthwise as a choice display of her answer to critics. But today there is a much larger freedom of the press. They very freely attack old customs and advocate the new and they are very patriotic. They are seized upon by the reformers as the most effective means of arousing interest and unrest and enlisting recruits for the Young China party. Inasmuch as nearly all Chinese boys are taught to read, they have a rich field to cultivate. Reading halls are being established in the cities where these journals may be found by all. They prefer the ways of peace and the arts of peace in their conquest of the new civilization. Sir Robt. Hart says, "The Chinese are the most intelligent, industrious, peaceable and law-abiding of people." They have never been given to war and the talk of an army of a million men does not find ready response among many outside those who have accepted the worldly wisdom of nations and seek to found progress upon strength of arms rather than upon that of intelligence and industry. China will never have a war host except as forced to it in self-defense. By the nature of her peace-loving and industrious millions, she will choose the way of intelligence rather than of blood.

Leopold, the Depraved

The news of the death of King Leopold of Belgium will bring little sadness to the civilized nations. Probably no ruler of modern times has represented so completely the combination of unscrupulous commercialism and personal depravity as this same Leopold. Beginning his career with the fairest promises of ability as an administrator of public affairs, he accomplished in the early years of his reign many improvements in the internal life of Belgium and gave evidence of being an enlightened and capable monarch. But as years went by his commercial ambitions extended to many forms of exploitation not so commendable, and the crowning infamy of his career was the organization of the Congo Company for the cornering of the rubber trade. The atrocities committed under the license and protection of the Belgian ruler have been only in part described by the aroused press and pulpit of the Christian world. So conscienceless and barbarous have been the practices by which the natives have been compelled to yield their tribute of rubber and ivory that Leopold has seemed to Europe and America admirably worthy of a place on the tall stage of infamy beside Abdul the Damned, the deposed autocrat of Turkey. But King Leopold's private life was as vicious as his commercial policy. Years ago his home was broken up by his immoralities, and on the boulevards of Paris he has been for years a frequent figure accompanied by some of the notorious denizens of the half-world. Strange to say, this man has maintained his influence at the Vatican, and is considered by the Roman Catholic church one of its most dutiful and praiseworthy sons. It is a curious type of religion that can overlook such atrocious traits in public and private life for the sake of such political advantage as the unquestioning loyalty of Belgium to the papal power would secure. The dead king of Belgium will be paid the honors due a deceased sovereign, but he will lie under the execrations not only of the surviving victims of his tyranny in the Congo, but of all right-minded men and women throughout the world.

The Daily Altar

We deeply desire to make our new department, The Daily Altar, a really serviceable section of the Christian Century, believing as we do that no factor in the life of the church needs more careful attention at the present time than private and family worship. We are not lovers of form and liturgy in religion, but we recognize the need felt by many people for some suggestive and simple method of conducting family worship as well as of making profitable their moments of private devotion. We have already asked that any who find themselves so inclined will write to us frankly their experiences, their difficulties and their needs, especially in the matter of family worship. We should like to have our readers begin the use of "The Daily Altar" on the first day of the new year, setting apart some time either morning or evening for that practice. It will, of course, require a certain amount of self-discipline to keep this matter constantly in its rightful place. But the habit is soon formed, and when once it has become a part of the daily program it will not be given up lightly. If any ministers desire additional copies of "The Daily Altar" we shall be prepared to furnish them in such numbers as they require for their congregations, at the cost of the separate printing. We are very anxious to make this department a genuine aid in the cultivation of the religious life in our homes.

A Heresy Hunt in Texas

Our spirited contemporary, The Christian Courier of Dallas, Texas, has recently treated its readers to a brief, but significant correspondence between Professor Ellsworth Farris, of Texas Christian University at Waco, and the minister of the local church. This minister, who has had sufficient experience to be beyond the small business of heresy hunting, conceived it his duty to put Professor Faris upon examination as to his orthodoxy, and wrote him a list of questions beginning with the venerable inquiry regarding Moses and the Pentateuch, and closing with the demand for his attitude toward "destructive critics." It is notable that the minister referred to seems to have been in no manner concerned with Mr. Faris' views upon matters of present moment nor of vital religious significance. It might be supposed that a man who is deeply agitated over another's soundness of views regarding the virgin birth of Jesus, the resurrection of Jesus' body from the grave, and the authenticity of the narratives regarding Moses as the law-giver of Israel might have some slight concern for such pertinent matters as the interpretation of Christian truth to the men of today, the sensitiveness of the church to moral questions, the belief in clean hands, a pure heart and the charity that thinketh no evil. It is evident that there are still some men in Texas who are more concerned with the past than with the living and vital gospel for the present, and who are more stirred in their minds by rumors of heretical belief regarding miracle and inspiration than with heresy of conduct and of temper in themselves and their churches. If the services of Professor Ellsworth Faris to the causes of missions and of education constitute no sufficient guarantee of the soundness both of his faith and of his life, then it is evident a different test from that which the New Testament announces or Jesus sanctioned is being applied as the standard of orthodoxy. Do men who ask questions of the kind noted above really feel concerned for the spiritual welfare of the brethren whom they thus interrogate, or are they hoping to strengthen the foundations of Christian faith in the hearts of others by their inquiries, or are they only seeking the publicity to which the attitude of a supposed defender of the faith is likely to entitle them?

The Charity Ball

It is the custom in many cities to hold a Charity Ball at some period shortly after the advent of winter, in order to augment the funds which are devoted to the care of its indigent and unfortunate. Chicago held its Charity Ball last week. One of its most spacious theaters was chosen for the purpose, and elaborate and costly decorations were used to make the place a scene of sumptuous luxury and beauty. The fashionable elect of Chicago headed the list of people who patronized the event. Boxes were sold at auction, which was itself a social function of the first class. The total proceeds of ball tickets and premiums paid for boxes amounted to about $26,000. These charity balls seem to be a rather childish way of accomplishing the double purpose of self-exploitation by the very rich and fashionable, and incidentally securing some help for the deserving poor. The total amount of money raised in this manner is very small in comparison with the funds required and actually received for the administration of the city charities. And the total value of the Charity Ball is only slight when measured against the responsibilities of the wealthy class in a great city like Chicago. It is really an opportunity for self-indulgence of the particular kind of social instincts which can be afforded by only a very small group in any city. The fact that the average men and women who do the serious work take less and less interest in these dress parades of the idle rich is proved by the frost that fell upon this recent Charity Ball, which was attended by much smaller numbers than have thronged similar events in recent years. People are not anxious to pay ten dollars for a ticket for the purpose of watching the so-called "leisure class" go by in grand marches around a theater whose decorations and accessories have consumed a considerable share of the money that is supposed to be employed for a charitable end. The modern world will learn some day that the best way to raise money for any purpose is to ask for it in a straightforward and sensible manner, whether it be for charity or for church expenses, and not to resort to the round-about and questionable method of giving entertainments or running restaurants for their promotion.

Dr. Cook's Audacious Fraud

The report that the investigating committee chosen by the University of Copenhagen to examine the materials placed in its hands by Dr. Cook, the northern traveler, had come to the unanimous conclusion that the evidence presented did not warrant the claim that Dr. Cook ever reached the north pole, was fully expected by men whose opinion was entitled to respect in the scholarly world. When Dr. Cook's claims were first published there was an almost unanimous feeling of skepticism on the part of men who were acquainted with conditions in the far north. When these men declared their inability to credit the wonderful story Dr. Cook told, they were instantly charged with academic jealousy or incompetence by the great mass of the American people, who were all too ready to give credence to the story of an adventurer. Those who knew nothing about the merits of the case hoped that Dr. Cook had actually made the journey, for it seemed so colossal a claim that the ultimate discovery of fraud would react with absolutely crushing force. This astonishing alternative seems now to have been invoked and braved from the very first by the man who in his passion for money forgot every obligation of honor and was willing to sacrifice even the unquestioned record of unusual adventure in the West and in the North in the hope of winning passing popular applause and a considerable amount of money by a groundless claim of polar discovery. The psychology of such procedure seems unaccountable. It has thrown a shadow over even the undoubted merits of Commander Peary's great journey to the pole. It has made the whole business of northern and southern exploration a distasteful topic, at least for months to come. The best fate that can overtake Dr. Cook will be that of complete and merciful oblivion.

Christmas Greetings

The holiday season has brought to the editors of the Christian Century a large number of greetings from friends; some of them from very dear friends, and all from those whose words are greatly worth while to us. Sometimes it was a greeting to the Century itself, and sometimes to one or the other of its editors. We wish we might respond in personal messages to every one of these heartening and loving sentences. They have given us a new sense of the joy and responsibility of life. In some of them a sentiment quoted from our own columns has come back to us with a new significance and virtue. In some of them the outspoken feelings of the writers have brought to us a humbling yet grateful sense of the rare obligations of friendship. Some of them have been the simple conventional greetings of the "Evergreen Week," lifted into personal values by an added line or word of good cheer, or sent out with just the name of the one whose remembrance provided us that pleasure. Not one of all these messages has failed to give us satisfaction. Not one of all the names will be allowed to slip out of mind. Life is always richer for these tokens of regard. Let us wish for you all, writers of messages, bearers of petitions for us at the hour of the daily sacrifice, and members of the silent yet effective host of whom we think and for whom we labor,—let us wish for you the spirit of good-will to all, the joy of friendship with the people of God, and the companionship of the Great Friend.

The New Order of Conventions

It is a common saying of our people since the Pittsburg Centennial Convention that the Disciples, having come with some degree of honor through the first century of their history, must recognize the responsibilities which their age and experience have brought to them, and attempt to adjust their methods of working to ideals suitable for the accomplishment of the ends before them. Easily the chief of our duties is the interpretation and advocacy of Christian unity. That must not for a moment be neglected or obscured. But in the very accomplishment of this object through the united efforts of a great body of people like the Disciples there are other important elements of organization and procedure that need to be emphasized, and have in fact been too long neglected.

Aside from the great truths of our faith which need insistent proclamation and in which we share responsibility with all the Christian world, there are certain matters of our own growth and administrative work which require urgent and constructive attention. Of these we believe the chief are the imperative necessity for delegate and therefore truly representative conventions; the need of a much larger number of consecrated and trained young men to enter the ministry of the gospel; the need of developing the religious life among our people so that private and family worship may find their rightful place in our regard, even as in the life of the earlier generations of Christians; and not least, the cultivation of the spirit of generous and competent giving, so that the churches may be adequately administered in their efforts to meet the needs of their communities and that the causes of missions and philanthropy may have ample resources for the interest which they represent.

At this moment it is the first of these factors in the work of the Disciples in the new century that we wish to emphasize. This is no new theme with us. For years the Christian Century has been urging the adoption of the plan of delegate conventions, both for our state organizations and for the national conventions. We shall never be able to accomplish the proper results with our present ineffective, loose and mass-meeting type of gathering. No other religious body of any significance still uses so antiquated a method of gathering. It was probably sufficient in the early days, when our conventions were like town meetings, composed of a fair proportion of the total membership of the churches. Such a body can express itself, since it includes most of those who are concerned in the results of its deliberation. But when a city succeeds to the town or village it can no longer transact business by the town-meeting method. It must appoint representatives who shall interpret its interests and be held responsible for the work accomplished.

It is not otherwise with a religious body of any considerable size. And especially is it true of the Disciples of Christ, who have left so far behind them the period of infancy and early youth that the plays and experiments of childhood seem foolish when measured by the duties and approved methods of maturity.

This, of course, is simply the fault of our wholly anomalous and inconsistent practice of refusing to organize a convention of the Disciples of Christ, upon the plea that we are afraid of a truly representative and competent body lest it should assume ecclesiastical authority and bind upon us burdens that we did not wish to bear. Under this wholly fictitious pretext, in which none of the Disciples take any serious stock, we perpetuate an outgrown and incompetent practice and make futile the effort to secure from the brotherhood its approval or disapproval upon any important question submitted for its consideration. When the matter of Federation was discussed by the churches of America some years ago, and nearly all of them entered with hearty good will into the plan of united action upon matters of a missionary interest and social service, the Disciples who should have been the first to welcome federation as a step in the direction of closer unity, struggled for five years before they were able to express their convictions and desires upon this great theme. Even then it was only by throwing away entirely the cumbrous machinery of our present conventions, and gathering in a mass-meeting at Norfolk, that the long-delayed decision was reached and the silence of the Disciples on this question so pertinent to all their history and efforts was broken,—a silence that must have seemed pathetic and unpardonable to all Christian people who have had the slightest acquaintance with our claims to be the advocates of Christian unity.

Such is our present situation. We are a people with definite convictions and large purposes, but impotent to express them in any other manner than that mob fashion which is the characteristic of primitive society. The remedy is of course perfectly simple. The churches can choose delegates to our national conventions upon the basis of their membership and by some plan easily agreed upon. The churches would then speak with authority in the conventions. The brotherhood would have a voice that would be heard with deference and courtesy whenever it cared to speak upon the living questions of the time. The reproach of indifference or inadequacy of expression would pass away. The danger of centralization, the nightmare of the ill-informed and the shibboleth of alarmists, would disappear by the simple process of experience. The garments of infancy and childhood would be laid aside and those of maturer years, such as are worthy of a people of the age and strength of the Disciples, would be assumed.

We shall return to the consideration of other phases of this question. But meantime we shall be glad to hear from our readers their opinion concerning this question of delegate conventions. We believe that there is no matter of greater importance in our organized work at the present time.

Biblical Problems

By Professor Willett

What was the thorn in the flesh of which Paul spoke (2 Cor. 12-7)? G. W. S.

Russellville, Ark.

No definite answer can be given to this question. Perhaps the most plausible explanation is that Paul was afflicted with some disease of the eyes which greatly hindered his work. He seems not to have wished to be left alone by his companions at any time, as for example, when he arrived in Athens and waited for Timothy and Titus to join him. In the Epistle to the Galatians he speaks of the former affection of the members of those churches, and that his first visit to them was the result of an infirmity of the flesh, and adds that so great was their love for him that they would have been willing to pluck out their own eyes and give them to him. In the close of the same letter he uses the significant words "you see with how large letters I write unto you with my own hand," indicating, perhaps, that he had added in his own large and irregular hand-writing a last word to the letter written by an amanuensis. But these are only suggestions. Some have supposed it was recurring attacks of epilepsy that occasioned Paul his distress. We cannot be certain as to the facts.

Please explain Revelation 6:12-13.

Student.

The writer of the Book of Revelations was attempting to assure his Christian brethren of the hopeful outcome of events which seemed to him and them alike so disheartening and oppressive that it was difficult to keep up courage. The period was that of early Christian persecution. The Roman power had ceased to protect the Christian communities in their rights of worship. From being the guardian of law and order, Rome had become the persecutor of the least offensive of its people. Jesus had warned the disciples that there would be days of tribulation such as the world had never heard of before, but that they would be the very events which marked the coming of his kingdom (Matt. 24). When, therefore, Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans in 70 A. D. and the Christians suffered the agonies of martyrdom under Nero, this Book of Revelation and other words of comfort and exhortation were written to sustain the hopes of the faithful and to keep them encouraged in the expectation of better days. The vision of the seals is a part of this message. In terms which every Jewish Christian would understand, it described the struggles and difficulties through which the church was passing. In language which was full of lurid figures of speech it spoke of changes in politics and government then taking place. The usual language of apocalyptic on these themes is that of portents in nature, the darkening of the sun and moon, the falling of stars, earthquake and eclipse. Literally, these events did not happen, but they are the vivid descriptions of those events that made the environment of the Christian communities during the latter part of the first century of church history.

What Constitutes Success?

Wise men, ancient and modern, have recognized the difficulty of knowing what is worth while. Aristotle put it thus: "Any one can be angry; that is quite easy. Any one can give money away or spend it. But to do these things to the right person, to the right amount, at the right time, with the right aim and in the right manner—this is not what any one can easily do." A recent writer says: "To be intelligent in action is, however, a far-reaching affair. To know what one is about is a large and difficult order to fill; so large and difficult that it is the heart of morality."

"Seek First"

The shrewd man often fails to convince because he leaves out some of the facts which he is under obligation to consider. Brother Jasper used to deliver a powerful lecture on "The Sun Do Move," but only the ignorant believed that he proved his proposition. The intelligent knew too many facts for which Jasper's theory had no explanation. We seek first the kingdom of God because we wish to get all the facts that bear upon conduct. The successful man responds sympathetically to the whole of his spiritual environment. He is a man and nothing that is human is foreign to him. He knows what is great and what is small and he never makes the mistake of putting the emphasis in the wrong place.

The Fool's Choice

The rich man of the parable was only partially human. He was aware that a man needs food and raiment and leisure, but he was not aware that a complete man finds satisfaction in serving others. The Lord plainly tells us that such a man is a fool. He differs from a beast only in having greater shrewdness; he does not, however, possess the intelligence of a man. The man of this sort today is unmoved by the cry of overworked women and children; he does not puzzle his brain about the inequalities of taxation; it is nothing to him that the "white-slave" traffic claims its victims by the thousand; he does not believe in missions; "he would not give one American young man or woman for all the negroes of Africa;" moral enthusiasm is to him fanaticism. He has acquired enough for his own bodily comfort; he asks no more; let other men follow his example and they too will be comfortable. Of course he "would prefer" that the evils mentioned should be abolished, but he will not sacrifice his comfort to abolish them. The rich fool does not bother his brain about hungry women and children and disordered lives at home or abroad. Jesus says that such a man misses the meaning of life. Even his riches cannot give him the satisfaction they would give to a man of sense.

Happiness

Love, joy, and peace are the happiness of the successful man, if Paul is allowed to define that happiness. One who seeks first the kingdom and its righteousness has a conscience that God will honor and that is serviceable under all circumstances. The peace of the man with narrow interests is easily disturbed. Other interests are forced upon his attention and he tries to put them out of his life instead of accepting them as parts of the complete life which every man ought to live. The citizen of the kingdom has many sources of joy. If at any given moment one source is lacking, he readily finds another. Love is the fulfilling of the law because the one who loves is interested in all that pertains to the kingdom of God. His supreme satisfaction is in laboring with God for the redemption of the world.

The Victory of Faith.

To have faith in God is to have faith in men. A faith in God that does not include faith in humanity is of no earthly use. In this world God works through men. Men are the objects of his love. He entrusted them with the message of his grace. The man of faith therefore lives with other men and works with them. No mistakes they make can destroy his faith in them. The victory of faith consists in living the life of reason and of love in the presence of all that is unreasonable and hateful among men. "To love others: to grow in gentleness and strength: to despise our fellows less: to have less fear of those great in a worldly sense and less disdain for those of humble appearance—this is the task of brotherhood, kindliness and faith."

For the Uplift of the Negro

The Southern Christian Institute

By Alva W. Taylor

When J. B. Lehman and bride left college nineteen years ago they went to Edwards, Miss., on their wedding tour and took charge of the Southern Christian Institute. The school had been chartered fifteen years before and was doing good work with its very limited resources. Dr. Belding, Jeptha Hobbs and others had done heroic service there in times when it cost complete social ostracism to work among the colored folks, and when it was keenly resented as an intrusion for northern people to come south for the uplift of the negro. There was yet too vivid a memory of carpet-bagging days for the south to trust the north, and slavery was not far enough removed to allow those who had looked upon the colored man as by nature born to serve to feel that he could or by right ever ought to be anything but a hewer of wood and a drawer of water.

The band of students who, under their teachers, did the skilled construction work on Allison Hall, from the making of the cement blocks to the finishing and installation of electric lights.

Meets Prejudice.

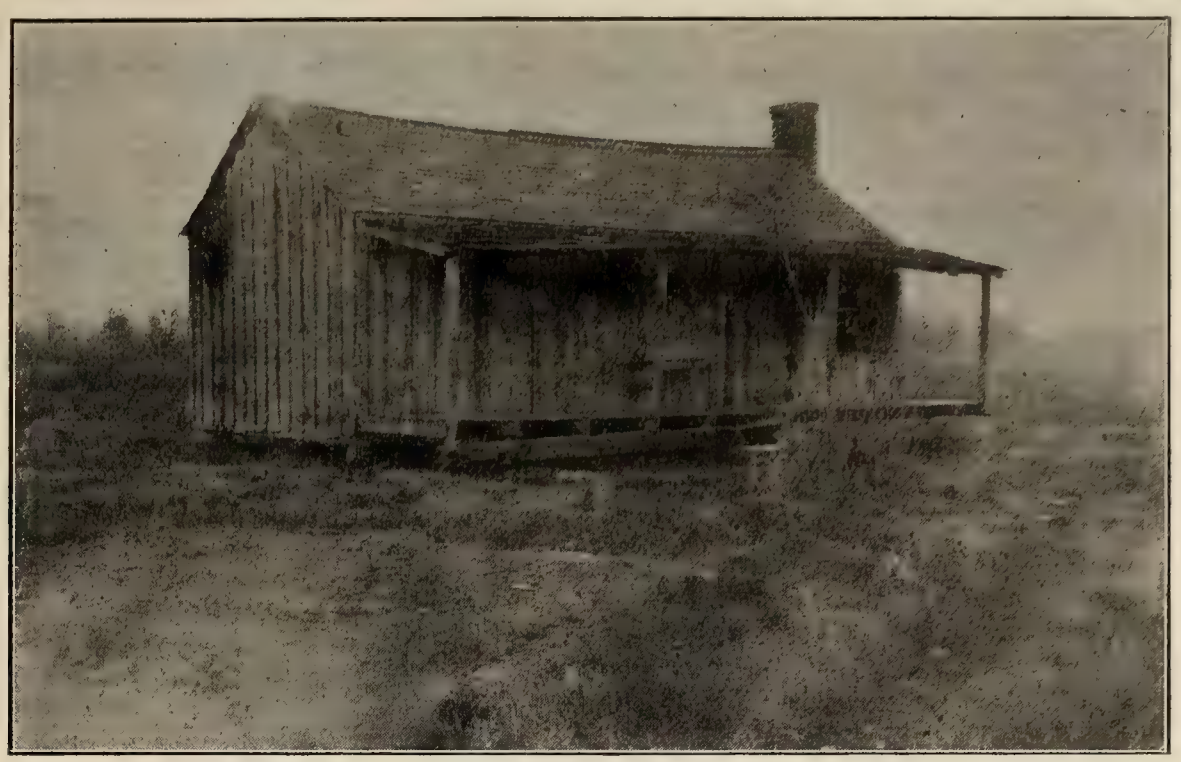
Mr. Lehman and his young wife met no cordial reception, therefore. Those they went to help were few and the mass of the old plantation darkies shared to no small degree the prejudices of their white masters against learning for the colored man. The white people were sincerely afraid that an education would make the negro unruly and a menace to the life of the southland. Those who have never lived under the circumstances of those days in Dixie have no right to judge for they can have no conception of the problem. The north has already ceased to fling stones since the race-riots in Yankeeland have given the worst of the south something to stand aghast before.

An Unwelcome Reception

When the young matron of the school went to shop she could scarcely get waited upon, and sundry remarks were made in her presence which indicated the feeling of the provincial folk over the undertaking. When they went to church they were given the whole pew to themselves and allowed to depart without the solemn lessons of the morning being lost through social intercourse or invitations to the generosities of southern hospitality. Today the merchants of Edwards give Mr. Lehman respect as a citizen and a business man that rates him as one of the first of the place. He is freely invited to fill the pulpits and the fact that he is sort of apostolic see to the colored Disciple churches of the middle south does not debar him from those of the white brethren. The dean of the local pastors is on the board of trustees of the Institute. Mr. Lehman was denied the floor at a state convention of the Disciples in those days, but he endured patiently and is rewarded today with great regard from the white brethren. Least of all has he ever spoken a word of complaint or condemnation over those things because he knew the feeling of the south and knew the reason for it and he judges it from fact and from keen human sympathy and not from theory and far-removed partisanship. He knew he must prove his workmanship by making his pupils such citizens that the white folk of the south would welcome their culture and feel that he was helping to solve the problem.

The Transformation

The writer has had the pleasure of attending the past two commencements at the Institute. He saw the difference between the new and the old. The transformation wrought is marked and tells a story more eloquent than words can describe. Riding through the rich Yazoo valley he inquired of an intelligent elderly lady why such rich soil was not more highly cultivated, and she gave as the reason the shiftlessness of the colored folks. Asked if she thought the state would soon make more heroic efforts to educate the colored population, she replied that it was not desirable; that a colored man with book-learning could not be expected to help develop the south, and that he became top-lofty and a menace to both black and white. Inquiry soon discovered that she was the daughter of a slave owner and had been reared on a slave plantation. The suggestion was made that a reasonable education was one that would solve her very problem of shiftlessness; one that would educate the hand and heart of the colored boy and teach him to make his own way and especially to desire a higher standard of life for himself. She said she was enthusiastic over that sort of educational effort for the colored people. It turned out that what a northerner might have turned into a bitter discussion over human rights, etc., became a ground of common agreement with one interested most in retaining white supremacy in the south. And by this means President Lehman has won the approval of the whites of the black belt of Mississippi. He has made better citizens of the children of the old slaves by giving them a working creed within their own kind, i. e., he has taught them how to respect their own kind by making themselves respectable and self-respecting through honest and efficient industry and character.



Scope of the Work

Today the plantation covers nearly one thousand three hundred acres. Besides the old mansion that serves as a residence for the teachers and as headquarters for all the work, there are work buildings, dormitories, a college building with a chapel, and a number of well made cabins for the colored tenants who farm the excess parts of the plantation. The whole property is worth $87,000. The students range from beginners to high-school graduates and the schools from a night school for young people employed on the plantations about, to a Bible department ably presided over by the president. The training includes farming and stockraising, the arts of domestic science and sewing and all the practical industrial arts necessary in an agricultural community, such as carpentery, blacksmithing, tinning, printing, plumbing, gardening, and masonry. No industrious young person need lack for an education that will multiply his efficiency and earning power to the highest degree, excepting for the lack of equipment to provide for all who apply. This year there are two hundred and fifty in attendance and fifty have already been turned away.

A typical negro cabin. Many of them have neither windows nor floors.

The practical side of the work done is illustrated in the accompanying photographs of the new Allison Hall and the squad of students who did the skilled work in building it. The concrete blocks were made by the students after hauling the sand from a bank on the plantation and the cement from the tracks where it had been delivered in car-load lots. After excavating they laid the walls, did the plumbing in approved modern fashion, finished with the wood-work and installed electric lights. The total cost of this handsome new and commodious building will be but five thousand dollars, a saving of seven thousand over the contract price. At the same time it has been a school of instruction to the builders and a means of earning a schooling at the same time. Another such structure is to be erected immediately which will be named Smith Hall, after the beloved C. C. Smith, who has been for years the tireless secretary in the field for all our work among the colored people of the south.

Beginnings of a New Civilization

The other two photos illustrate the effect of the training on the young people who go back to the farms to make a worthy place in their communities for themselves and their race. The old shack of a cabin is a common sight everywhere in the south, but happily the other type is becoming more common. To transform the homes of a race after this manner is to make a new civilization for them. To turn the colored people of the south from the present all too prevalent shiftlessness and almost universal dependence upon the storekeeper and the land owner into an industrious folk with their own forty-acre lots, neat three-roomed cabins, local schools, and churches where intelligence replaces superstition, is to do more to solve the race problem than all the political expedients ever devised. Here the white people of the north make their largest contribution to the problem of the southland.

This work has an attraction that is a mystery to one who has never mingled with the workers. It is the fascination of the missionary and of all creative work. President and Mrs. Lehman have toiled there for nineteen years, for many of them with no guaranteed compensation and for all of them at one pitiably small. Mr. and Mrs. Burgess prepared to become missionaries, but found here a mission field that met their passion. Emory Ross refused a handsome offer upon his graduation and nothing could tempt him today to leave the task but a call to a larger and more sacrifical one. Mr. Prout tried to give it up once, but the yearning was in his heart and he returned. Miss Hunt is putting her life into it with missionary devotion and could do nothing else happily while the workers of less length of service are as ardently devoted to it as they are. A more congenial band of fellow toilers could not be found. Envy and human frailties seem lost in the love of the common task. The bonds of family are enlarged to take in all these faithful fellow-workers and they dwell together like those of one blood and kinship.

A type of the cabin builded by the graduates of S. C. I. This one houses the farm foreman on the school plantation and the cut shows the splendid old trees with their hanging mosses.

No great movement is fixed or of permanent good until it develops institutions that express its life and effort and fix its traditions. Would that the Disciples of Christ might begin their second century by endowing many like this one.

SIXTY YEARS WITH THE BIBLE—A RECORD OF EXPERIENCE, by William Newton Clark. Dr. Clark has come to be one of our most dependable interpreters of theological thinking in this generation. His work, "The Use of the Scriptures in Theology," opened the way to comfort of heart and deepening of faith on the part of hundreds of ministers and Sunday-school teachers who were not quite sure what effect modern studies were destined to have upon the Bible. His shorter works, "Can I Believe in God the Father?" and "What Shall We Think of Christianity?" asked and answered two of the most interesting questions with which a thoughtful mind can concern itself. His "Christian Doctrine of God" in the International Theological Library, and his "Outline of Christian Theology" are the most ambitious works of the series. But the latest title upon his list is "Sixty Years with the Bible," which has just appeared. It is almost an autobiography. Dr. Clark calls it his "Apologia," though not in Newman's sense. It traces the experience of his use of the Bible from the period when he was taught to regard it as a supernatural and unearthly book, with magical values and verbal authority, up through the long process of enlightenment and emancipation until with the opening of the new century the Bible has come to its own with himself and a great company of the most open minded and constructive thinkers of our generation. The book is divided into chapters, each dealing with a decade from the Fifties to the present time. Professor Clarke makes perfectly evident to the most casual reader the firmer foundations of Bible study and the complete ability of the book to meet every test of real religious need as compared with the mechanical and impossible views of the Bible held a half century ago. It is a book to remove doubt and strengthen faith. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1909. Pp. 250. $1.25 net.)

Our Modern Evangelism

A Scathing Characterization and Expose of Popular Revivalism Seen from the Inside

By Evangelist Herbert Yeuell

EDITORS' NOTE.—No more intense half hour was experienced during the recent Centennial convention at Pittsburg, excepting, perhaps, that during which Col. S. H. Church delivered his address, than that in which Rev. Herbert Yeuell spoke on the Evangelistic Problem. The address was a portion of the program set for "Evangelists' Day" and, with Mr. Lockhart's paper on Union Evangelism, struck a distinctive note in a program not otherwise notable. Recently in discussing the revivalistic procedure we said editorially: "It is our firm conviction that if there is to be a reform in our evangelistic methods and standards it must be made by the evangelists themselves. So long as a crass evangelism—sensationalistic, hypnotic, manipulative, irreverent—is abroad in the land there will be hard-pushed pastors and churches that will utilize it." It is a most heartening sign that Mr. Yeuell's voice, one of the most authoritative in evangelistic circles, should be raised against the system which more than any other influence is corrupting the modern church's character.

I start this address with the assumption that the evangelistic problem of today is totally different from that of even ten years ago. With the exception of Moody and Finney there has been no great popular evangelist. These were followed by a host of feeble imitators. Then evangelism was the abnormal, the untried. It had one merit, however; in any case it was inspirational. Now, evangelism is the expected, the indispensable part of the machinery of the modern church. With increased organization in regular church life comes the necessity for evangelistic machinery. The early Moody type of inspirational evangelism is impossible today in the average well organized church. The revival is calculated with the nicety of a game of chess, and it is fast coming to pass that the best manipulator is considered the best evangelist. In olden days churches were satisfied if there had been great spiritual upliftment, even though there had been no great ingathering, but today only immediate results count. In many instances pastors have a record to make, others have records to beat, others are going to leave and the climax of a great revival is necessary to a complete report of that pastorate. So they want a man whose only commendation is that he can work up things quickly, and get committals, whatever that may mean.

The reaction from this somewhat deplorable condition will close the evangelistic doors of every church in America within ten years, unless better evangelistic ideals are in vogue. No other country would permit such folly as parades in the guise of many features of modern evangelism. Even the German Emperor examines every religion that seeks admittance to his country. He will not even permit Christian Science to organize a church until it can actually raise the dead, and even the Methodists are restricted as to the length and quality of their prayers. One reason for the chasteness of Gipsy Smith's vocabulary is that one word of slang before any English audience would disqualify him as a preacher of the Gospel of Jesus. You may call it conservatism, but if there were similar demands made by the American public our evangelists would be free from the nauseating billingsgate which seems to be the stock in trade of so many popular evangelists. There is necessarily a reaction from every form of abnormal evangelism. The great Wesleyan revival is in point and while the great Methodist church is the offspring of that revival, yet the hysterical excesses of those revival days nearly plunged this country into Atheism. Perhaps it is not going too far to say that the movement of the Disciples of Christ, with its clear-cut and rational terms of entrance into the Kingdom, did more than anything else to prevent such a calamity. Are we now to lose our heads by losing our Mission?

In the second place, I want you to look at our problem—ours in particular. As I view it, it is a seven-fold problem. (1) In common with all other religious bodies, we have the problem of the amusement-loving age.

Evangelist Herbert Yeuell.

(2) There is also the problem of the money-crazy age. (3) There is the problem of the materialistic age with its counter extremes of mysticism and occultism. (4) We have the problem of the relegation of the Bible to a mere book of history and tradition and fable and incongruity and contradiction and absurdity. (5) We have the problem of religio-scientific scholasticism. (6) The problem of the impudently contemptuous attitude of certain of the secular press toward anything that bears the name of orthodoxy. (7) Our greatest problem, however, as a people, is the union meeting.

There are vast aggregations of churches engaged in minor meetings that are only union in name. They are rather huge disintegrating machines, breaking down all loyalty to churches, and while their influence for the time being is seen in every possible moral reform, and a general arousement of religious feeling, yet the conclusions of the average union evangelists are so vague and their efforts to appear broad and unsectarian so evident, that the permanent results of great union meetings are seen in the destruction of doctrinal conviction. So far as the creeds and human formulas are concerned, it is well that they should be destroyed, but most of these union evangelists are men of creeds and human formulas and strongly believe in the tenets of their churches, hence their preaching is of such a character that people generally get the idea that one church is about as good as another and that all doctrines, whether creedal or biblical, are unnecessary to salvation, and that if they only believe and lead a good life that God requires no more of them. They make poor church members if they ever join a church. Statistics show that in the majority of cases that they take these evangelists at their word. The lack of doctrinal conviction in the popular mind is the hardest problem that we, as a people, have to meet. The fact that our own people unite in these great efforts, makes it necessary for them to drop their plea for the time being, and in their effort to show their Christian-union spirit, they will go often to the extent of sacrificing the doctrines associated with their plea, and when they return to their own work again, they have lost the sense of the distinctiveness of the plea of the Disciples of Christ. The result is that when one of their own evangelists comes to conduct a series of meetings, he is entertained with a recital of the eccentricities and the abnormalities of the great sweeping revival and is advised to conduct his meetings on the same plan.

How to Meet the Problem?

First. By magnifying the dignity of our plea. We are a distinctive people. We are not a sect. We are sectarian, but our great movement is not therefore necessarily a sectarian one. Even if all our members were to believe that only members of the Christian Church could be saved, while that would indicate deplorable sectarianism, yet it would not constitute our people a sect. We are not a disappearing brotherhood and never can be as long as the world is yet to be saved. Whatever may be the psychology of the times, whatever may be the concensus of scholarship, whatever may be our position among the sects in Christendom, as long as there is a church in existence bearing a sectarian name, violating the ordinances of baptist and the Lord's Supper, our people will have a mission, and if I am any judge of the development of our movement, in spite of many assertions to the contrary we are less sectarian than formerly, our plea of Christian union more powerful than ever before, and we have less cause today to fear a disintegration of our people and the loss of our message.

Meetings Independent.

Second. By conducting our meetings without regard to the customs of others. Our meetings must comport with our plea. In all our studies of evangelism, we are far more concerned as to how Gipsy Smith does, or Billy Sunday fulminates than we are in regard to the manner of the Apostle Paul's preaching and the simple methods of the Apostles generality. There are meetings, being held among us that are weak, miniature imitations of certain types of union meetings, with the result that in six months after the revival, hardly ten per cent of the converts can be found. If in the great union meetings themselves, less than ten per cent of the converts join churches, it ill becomes our evangelists, merely for the sake of swelling telegrams, to go into the business of counting every hand raised and tear shed as an indication that another soul has been won to Christ. Our evangelists are not alone in this unholy fever for numbers, for reasons already given, and the general ambitions of many churches are such that they select their evangelist only with a view to numbers, and to get these numbers they are willing to condone many dishonesties of method on the principle that the end justifies the means. The meeting is considered a failure by many evangelists if there is not a convert, and some of them to keep up the appearance of success, arrange with the recently baptized converts to walk to the front as decoy ducks, as soon as the invitation begins. This is supposed to lead the way for others. I was told of one evangelist who, after a long invitation with many exhausting exhortations and finding no one responding to his hysterical plea, rushed over to a man who was seated at the end of a pew, and asked him to please change his seat. The man complied with this request, and we can imagine his amazement when the evangelist jumped upon the front seat and clapped his hands, and thanked God for another soul saved. This is not a fairy tale. My amazement was due to the fact that when this was told among a group of preachers that a general roar of laughter went up, and it was regarded as a huge joke, and yet, deep in their hearts those same ministers, for they were good men, rebelled against such a dishonest practice. Why they laughed I could never learn. This indulgent laughing over the idiosyncracies of evangelists, and their flagrantly dishonest methods to secure immediate results is one of the puzzles of the day. If pastors and people generally would frown upon such things, instead of making them subjects of common humor, this particular type of evangelist would go out of business, and a more honorable type leave the pastorate in larger numbers to do the work of the evangelist.

We have at the present time in our brotherhood, at least one hundred men with evangelistic gifts of a high order, but who refrain from entering the field, because they will not degrade themselves by using the average revival methods. There is a something about our plea which induces people to walk out in acceptance of it, without the pulling and hauling and general chicanery of a union revival. When our evangelists quit emulating Billy Sunday and Chapman and Torrey and Gipsy Smith, and conduct their own revivals in their own way, they may not count quite so many cards, but they will count more actual conversions, and in six months after the revival, the majority of the converts will still be found.

Magnifying Preaching.

Third. By magnifying preaching. The craze for organization in the regular church life, brings about a similar craze in revival meetings. Meetings are organized in such a way that certain results are absolutely guaranteed. There must of course be considerable organization where large bodies of people are to be handled, but an organization which calculates to a nicety the number of committals must necessarily take little thought of the presence of the Spirit of God or the power of the Gospel. In many of our evangelistic organiations every worker in the meetings, except the evangelist, is nothing but a part of the cunningly devised machine. All individuality is lost. There is an admixture of hustling and meetings and stunts and frantic exhortations and music, all calculated almost to the second, and a hot-house forcing process becomes the vogue. Much is said about great multitudes coming, and many scriptures are used in support of people in large companies accepting Christ, without reference to the change of conditions from those which existed in the days of the Apostles. All sorts of curious statistics are compiled to show that a certain number of people could be converted in a certain length of time. The idea of the complexity of the human soul does not enter into this process at all. The folly of this gigantic machine for counting converts is already seen in the lapses from union meetings. The idea of producing conviction is magnified, and every possible means is used to bring about a state of emotion, which passes for conviction, and few evangelists prepare their sermons with a view to convincing the intellect. Indeed there is a general feeling that intellectual preaching should be discounted. We are developing a type of evangelist that is a travesty on the preacher, and even pastors are beguiled by a mongrel type of preaching, into neglecting the proper preparation of their sermons on the grounds that it is not worth while to do anything better. I heard one evangelist before a large number of very intelligent preachers inveigh covertly against the intellectual tone of another evangelist's address. This because he himself had come prepared with nothing but a mushy exhortation. My amazement was, as I gazed upon those intelligent ministers, that they should practically indorse the evangelist that had not spent a half-second in preparing an address for them on that especial occasion. All sorts of questionable stories and thrilling accidents and pathetic appeals are poured out with a flood of hysteria, all a purely subpective process to bring about a certain state of feeling conducive to easy handling by an expert manipulator.

Personal Work.

The magnification of preaching will not make less of personal work, but it will give personal work a different tone; it will dignify it. There is a pettiness about much of the personal work done at revivals. A lot of people are held in reserve, and at a given moment are hurled with tremendous force into an unduly excited throng, and when they come back they bring with them persons who are neither in a really penitent state, nor under real conviction. A step once taken however, must be maintained during the meeting, but it is obvious that when the meeting is done if there has been nothing but this personal touch, that the regular services of the church will not find these people in attendance. The modern hysteria on the subject of personal work, is doing more to belittle preaching and preachers than any other influence. The preacher is nothing. The little pert jackanapes of a certain ubiquitous type of personal worker is everything. Stars in the eternal crown are counted on earth in proportion to the number of people dragged out to a front seat, but in the majority of cases I fear that there will not only be no stars, but there will be no crown.

By magnifying preaching I do not mean that the preaching must take on the tone of mere doctrinal discussion, but "atmosphere" is everything in a revival. The thing that is most magnified is the thing that people respond to quickest. In meetings where I have magnified organization, people respond to that. Where I have magnified conscience to the sacrifice of intellectual teaching, people have responded to a death-bed story. Where I have magnified personal work, they have almost invariably waited for some one to lead them to the front. Wherever I have magnified preaching of the Gospel of Christ including the simple steps of entrance into the kingdom, people have responded without organization, without scarification, without spurious personal work, and I am satisfied from my own experiences, my largest meetings being of that character, that it is not necessary to burden our revivals with a lot of methods more appropriate to the ward politician, or the faker of multitudes.

The Ministry and Ministerial Relief

By A. L. Orcutt.

There is no general proposition with claims upon the church today but may justly be regarded as a preacher proposition, that is to say, the preacher holds the key to the situation. While he holds no "big stick" and is not to lord it over God's heritage, yet it is true in a general way that what he directs his people will do. As leader, counselor, and director-general, his plans and instruction will and ought to be followed. Here is the point clearly stated: if the preacher instructs his people in Home Missions and urges their support, it will be given; if he instructs them in Foreign Missions and urges their support, it will be given. If he does not so instruct and advise his people they do not support missions. And because this is so nearly a universal truth, we call missions in the essential reality a preacher proposition. If a people may be called a missionary people, it is not because they have a commission from their Lord, but because they have a missionary ministry. This fact understood and realized would certainly cause the ministry to tremble under the weight and gravity of such responsibility.

The same thing is true of the ministry and Ministerial Relief. The preacher holds the key to the situation. What he teaches his people and urges them to do in this matter will invariably be done. If he gives them no instruction and urges not this duty upon them, his people will not be among the supporters of this work. The churches supporting this work or not supporting it, are led by a ministry interested in, or indifferent toward the work. This is not to find fault, it is simply a statement of the fact with a view to an awakening of a sense of responsibility and an interest in a ministry already too long neglected by those who hold its destiny in their hands.

One of the easiest and among the most necessary things the disciples of Christ as a people have to do is the support of our Ministerial Relief work. $25000 annually will at present meet all the demands of this work, properly discharging our duty toward all who are needing this support. This being not only a specific requirement our Lord has laid upon his people, but a debt we owe these faithful old soldiers of the cross, it is therefore one of the first duties of the church. Of more than one hundred people represented by our annuitant list last year some of them have no other source of income whatever than the limited amount received from this Board.

The Book World

QUIET TALKS ON HOME IDEALS, by S. D. Gordon and Mary Kilgore Gordon. S. D. Gordon is a well known writer on subjects connected with religious experience. His "Quiet Talks" on Service, on Prayer and on Power are familiar to most readers of devotional books. A new volume called "Quiet Talks on Home Ideals" has recently appeared in which Mrs. Gordon has collaborated. The themes dealt with are: friendship in the home and in a reverence and helpful manner the delicate subjects of domestic love, childhood, heredity and training are considered. (New York: Fleming H. Revell Company. $.75 net.)

DEVOTIONAL HOURS WITH THE BIBLE — THE GOSPEL BY MATTHEW, by J. R. Miller, D. D. Rev. J. R. Miller has written many volumes on devotional themes. He is now engaged upon a series called "Devotional Hours with the Bible," and the volume on the Gospel of Matthew has just been issued. It has value as dealing with the themes of the International Sunday-school lessons for 1910. There is need of larger attention to this kind of literature, and although Dr. Miller's works do not represent the highest grade of devotional writing, they are helpful as an aid to one type of Bible knowledge. (New York: Hodder & Stoughton. Pp. 319. $1.25 net.)

THE CITY WITH FOUNDATIONS, by John Edgar McFayden. The company of those biblical students and preachers who can write with full knowledge of the critical values of biblical material and at the same time with penetrating insight into the deeper values of the Word of God is not a large one. Of critical expositors there are many, and of devotional writers there are some fairly good ones, though the number is smaller than once it was. But one of the men who combines the power of critical analysis, historical interpretation and devotional appreciation is Professor McFadyen of Knox College, Toronto. His previous volumes, "An Introduction to the Old Testament," "Old Testament Criticism and the Christian Church" and "The Prayers of the Bible," in addition to his strictly critical and historical works, have made him a familiar companion of the ministers' study. A recent volume, "The City with Foundations," is a series of brief expositions of Scripture texts, some of which are reprints from current journals. These are capital chapters for sermon suggestion, but even more so for the culture of the spiritual life. (New York: A. C. Armstrong & Sons. Pp. 254. $1.50.)

HOUSEKEEPING FOR TWO, by Alice L. James. The author of the popular "Catering for Two" has issued this companion book, an eminently practical gift for the bride,—experienced or otherwise in the mysteries of housekeeping. The chapters on "System," "Cleaning House," "Laundry Work," "Maids and their Ways," etc., are full of time-saving hints that will help in no small degree to set in motion and keep oiled the housekeeping machinery and thereby eliminate much of its unpleasant creaking. (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, $1.25.)

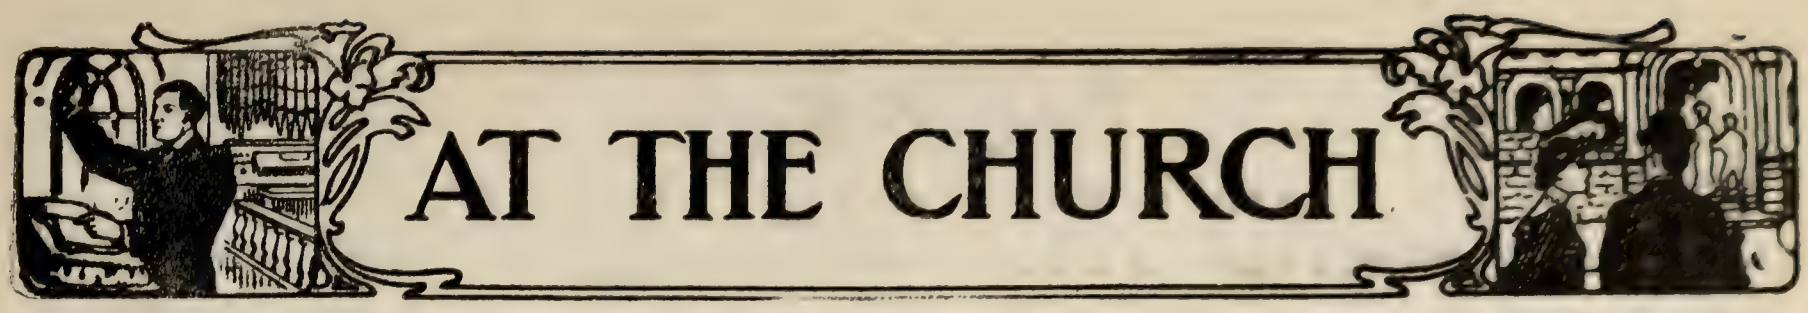
ONE THOUSAND SALADS, by Olive Green. "Will she ever be forgiven?" was the comment of a presumably dyspeptic reviewer in a popular weekly. However, the housewife always on the alert for new and toothsome additions to her menu, will find it very easy not only to forgive but to commend the author for such an unlimited variety of salads for every possible occasion. (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, $1, net.)

THE WHITE SISTER, by Marion Crawford. Mr. Crawford has no equal as a writter of brilliant cosmopolitan fiction; in which the characters are true and very real; belonging to the chosen scene. Mr. Crawford is a novelist born—a natural story teller, with wit, and insight added to a varied and profound knowledge of social life. The White Sister is a strong, interesting and dramatic story, with picturesque Roman setting. It is beautifully kindled with sustained interest from the beginning to the end. Added interest is given the story because of its publication coming so shortly after the death of the author. It is his last novel but one. (The Macmillan Company, New York. $1.50 net.)

ANNAPOLIS. A story of Annapolis life by Lieut.-Com. Edward L. Beach, U. S. N. Life in the United States Navy was never more attractive to the youth of our country than it is today when the prestige gained by the wonderful cruise of our battleship fleet is still fresh. Life at Annapolis is the first step in the naval officer's career, and is depicted in this story of how Ralph Osborn won his first spurs. A rattling good story of naval service. (Boston: W. A. Wilde Co., $1.50.)

SIX GIRLS AND THE SEVENTH ONE by Marion Ames Taggart. This new volume in the "Six Girls" series concludes the series. The story picks up the characters where they were laid down in the previous one and carries them through to the time when life with its added responsibilities comes to them. The volume is complete in itself. The return of Laura from her musical instruction abroad and the arrival home of Margery and her baby girl—the seventh one—brings together again that happy family with which the first volume started out. A good, wholesome book. (Boston: W. A. Wilde Co., $1.50.)

BILLY WHISKERS AT THE FAIR by F. G. Wheeler. What little child has not been interested in the antics of Billy Whiskers, the "cut up" goat? This four legged rascal has made thousands of the small folks laugh and laugh in the past and now he is at it again in this new book. He goes to the fair, and what he doesn't do and what he doesn't see is not worth relating. The illustrations are unusually good and of the kind that brings smiles even to grown ups. All girls and all the boys will certainly want this "Billy Whiskers" book. (Akron, Ohio: Saalfield Pub. Co., $1.00.)



THE FAST MAIL. The story of a Train Boy. By William Drysdale. To the average boy there is something fascinating about a train. He wants to know how the engineer runs his engine, how the conductor collects his tickets, in fact all the details of the work of each employee on the railroad. Mr. William Drysdale has carefully studied this subject, and in "The Fast Mail" supplies a great deal of information which bright boys desire. (Boston: W. A. Wilde Co., $1.50.)

LINCOLN'S LEGACY OF INSPIRATION, by Frederick Trevor Hill. The chapters composing the book were published in several Metropolitan papers at the time of the Lincoln Centenary and attracted much favorable attention. Mr. Hill holds that Mr. Lincoln was not a genius, but his great work is due rather to an unswerving moral integrity than to intellectual brilliance. Thus his life is richly inspiring to the average man. Mr. Hill is a prominent New York lawyer, and is the author of several successful books, including "Lincoln the Lawyer." (Frederick D. Stokes Co.: New York. 50 cents net.)

BIBLICAL IDEAS OF THE ATONEMENT, by Ernest DeWitt Burton, J. M. P. Smith, and G. B. Smith. J. M. Smith has presented the Old Testament doctrine of atonement through its various phases from the rise of the idea of sacrifice to the ompleted ritual of the Jewish church. At this point Professor Burton begins his discussion of the idea of atonement in the extra-canonical literature, and traces the theme through the New Testament, indicating the various elements of emphasis found in the teachings of Jesus, the writings of Paul, the book of Hebrews and the Johannine literature. Upon the basis thus organized Professor G. B. Smith proceeds to the discussion of the significance of the biblical teachings concerning atonement, and the atonement in the light of modern thought. Naturally this third section of the book is the gist of the discussion. Far from being merely academic, it grips the subject vitally and presents the problem in terms of present social, commercial, political and individual life with such insight and force as to give it living significance for the student. There have been several volumes recently on the atonement, but none that presents the facts in so direct, simple and practical a fashion as this composite discussion. (The University of Chicago Press. Pp. 338, 12mo. Cloth, net, $1.00.)

BOLENGE—A STORY OF GOSPEL TRIUMPHS ON THE CONGO, by Mrs. Royal J. Dye. The recent visit of Dr. Dye and Mrs. Dye to the home churches after a number of year's work in the Congo region was one of the most inspiring experiences the Disciples have ever enjoyed, and brought a blessing to all the American churches without distinction of denomination. Mrs. Dye was unable to return to Africa with her husband, but has devoted herself to the preparation of a volume dealing with the condition of affairs on the Congo and the triumphs of the gospel achieved by the workers in that field. The story of the Bolenge mission is too familiar to the Disciples to need retelling here. But the book is so valuable as a record of the progress of work at that station that it should be in the possession of every well-informed and interested student of missions among us. Readers of Stanley's recently published autobiography will find this book a most interesting commentary upon conditions in the land he did so much to open to civilization and will in addition find material in this recital as thrilling and inspiring as any furnished by the great explorer. (Foreign Christian Missionary Society, Cincinnati, Ohio. Pp. 225. $1.00 net.)

HEAVENLY HERETICS, by Lyman P. Powell. Under this alliterative title, Mr. Powell describes interestingly the lives of Jonathan Edwards, John Wesley, Horace Bushnell, William Ellery Channing, and Phillips Brooks. Mr. Powell is rector of St. John's Church, Northampton, Mass. He has made a practice for many years of preaching at regular intervals upon the life of one of the world's great preachers. The book is the product of the study made for this pulpit work. The style of the essays are therefore that of the public address. The descriptions are brief and suggestive rather than exhaustive. Appended to each chapter is a list of a few of the best books on each life. The entire book contains but 138 pages. A good suggestion for a series of Sunday evening addresses. (G. P. Putnam's Sons; New York and London. 1909. $1.25 net).

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

IN GALILEE.

In the change of location from Judea to the populous region of the Sea of Galilee the disciples, later in their ministry when they had taken time to reflect upon the significance of Jesus' work, saw a remarkable fulfillment of a message that Isaiah of Jerusalem had once given his countrymen (Isaiah 9:1-2). In the year 732 B. C. when Tiglath-Pileser, King of Assyria, had just taken Damascus and was ravaging the coasts of Upper Palestine, terrifying the people of Judea with the dread of his march to the south, Isaiah comforted them with the assurance that the people then sitting in darkness in the ravaged district should see the light of deliverance soon, because God would save them from the hands of their greatest enemy, who would be driven away or destroyed. Those words, which applied primarily to a local situation in the eighth century B. C., seemed to come to a fresh birth, an ampler significance, in the arrival of Jesus in that same region in after years, for he was truly the great light who was to bring a deliverance more glorious than that by which Israel escaped from Assyrian devastation.

The Choice of Disciples

In this district of Galilee Jesus began his active ministry, which ushered in the period of his greatest success and popularity. He took up the message which John had been preaching in the region of the Jordan, a message of repentance in view of the early establishment of the new order, the realization of God's will among men. But it was necessary that he should have some interpreters to carry out his message to other lands and to be witnesses after his departure. For, from the moment of his temptation in the Wilderness he had known with increasing certainty that he could not live long against the opposition of the ruling classes in his country, and that he could not go far except at the expense of the work he wished to accomplish among his own people. Therefore, almost at the beginning of his public work he set himself to discover and call into his constant companionship a small group of men whom he could teach to be like-minded with himself, and with whom he could dare to trust the good tidings he was bringing to all men. For this reason he looked about with the greatest care among those who promised to be at all serviceable. The Synoptic Gospels tell us nothing of the earlier meeting with the fishermen of Galilee while he was yet in Judea. But the Gospels supplement each other in many ways, and Jesus evidently took a good deal of time to fully determine upon the men he was to use as his disciples and witnesses. When, therefore, one day he saw Simon and Andrew working at their task as fishermen on that coast where so many generations of fishers have plied their trade, he recognized them at once as the companions of his stay in Judea and of his journey to the north. And he asked them if they would go with him upon some missionary tours he expected to make through the region. They at once abandoned their nets and went with him. Soon after, perhaps on the same day, he met James and John, who with their father, Zebedee, were cleaning and mending their nets. And they left the boat and their father to go with the Master.

Popularity of Jesus

Then began that wonderful series of journeys from town to town through all that thickly-settled region of Galilee, where report ran so rapidly that the story of their stay in one town preceded them to the next, and the people were in immense expectancy everywhere they went. It was the time of Jesus' greatest popularity. The people hailed him as a helper, a friend, and perhaps a coming king. His presence brought benediction everywhere, and all were attracted to him by the graciousness of his bearing and his words. He saw at once what power was in his hands. It would have been of the easiest to have incited the people to a popular uprising against the oppressive tyranny of Rome, and to have made himself their leader and king. This, in fact, was just what they were always hoping he would do. And no doubt the disciples themselves were keenly sensitive to the Messianic hopes which grew in the hearts of people as Jesus went from place to place.

The Program of Jesus

Yet his method was very simple. It consisted of a three-fold ministry—teaching, preaching and healing. He taught men the nature of that kingdom of God which was the great theme of his life. He tried to make them understand its value in other terms than those of political success. It was a difficult task to get them to give up their military and royal hopes and to think of another sort of leadership than that which had as its ideal a king of David's family. He preached to them because he wanted to win them to an immediate repentance from sin and to the acceptance of a program of personal honesty, justice, purity and reverence. He knew that no reformation could be effective that did not change the characters of men from selfishness to the love of God and their fellowmen.

The Helping Jesus

The third item of his ministry was the healing of the sick. The testimony of the Gospels is so emphatic upon this point that any denial of such power to our Lord goes far toward a repudiation of the simplest and most basic facts of his career. But the healing of the sick was to him no mere vulgar display of personal power. It was a part of the manifestation of his spirit, and thus of the divine attitude toward humanity. Jesus healed the sick because his heart went out in pity toward them, and he longed to help them in the most immediate and friendly way. But there was also a deeper meaning in these works of power. Their larger need as sick and suffering men and women was the healing of their bruised and diseased souls and of that power the cure of the body was a sort of symbol and pledge.

No wonder, then, that such a ministry as this attracted to itself great multitudes of people from all the regions about, and even from the country beyond the Jordan and from distant Judea. It seemed as if the times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord had actually come. A great and heavenly Presence was with them. God seemed once more to have spoken to them in terms of a human life, and the pathway of Jesus was thronged with eager seekers after life, to all of whom he ministered.

Christian Endeavor

By W. D. Endres.

Topic: January 16, Matt. 5:13-16.

Jesus' vision of his work in the world was the most comprehensive and audacious ever given forth from a human brain. He conceived his domain to be the whole world and his reign for all time. There were men befor who dreamed of a world empire for themselves, but none ever dreamed of remaining its perpetual ruler. The method too, by which he seeks to bring it about is equally remarkable. He marched at the head of no army, he mapped out no campaign, he simply told his disciples to carry his message to the ends of the earth. The simplicity of the plan amazes us. Yet that was all the provision he made and if we do not do it his work will fail.

The remembrance of this fact shows the significance of this lesson. To Jesus, his disciples are the saving salt of the earth. Upon them he depends for the cleansing of all moral filth, and the establishment of clean, fresh, wholesome, relations upon the earth. They are as light to those groping in moral darkness. This is only another way of saying that the disciples of Jesus are the logical leaders in all moral reform. They cannot remain quiet so long as there are wrongs to be righted. The cry of the oppressed, the neglected, of the helpless is an appeal to them. In like manner, and for a similar reason, should the disciples of Jesus lead in all attempts at moral and religious instruction and the increase of general intelligence. Hence the instruction of the church, through her schools, her public services, etc. These are all obligations of the disciples because it is through them that Jesus hopes to have his kingdom, which in its essence is moral, to cover the entire earth.

The fact that we become disciples implies that we have enlisted in that very thing. For us not to do so then is to be just as foolish and incongruous as for a man to light a lamp anad then conceal it beneath a box or a basket. It would be like the watchman in the tower of the lighthouse carrying over the glass through which the light was to give its signal of warning and hope. To call such an institution a lighthouse would be a misnomer. Then for a disciple of Jesus Christ, and all Christians are his disciples, to allow any of his powers which could be used to further his kingdom among men to lie dormant, or to be used in another direction is perfect incongruity.

The power of song and speech, the ability to instruct, and organize, loyalty in season and out of season to the launching to some program for moral and spiritual advancement are all ways and means by which the disciple may be true to his high calling in Christ Jesus. The important truth then in this lesson is that as a Christian the disciple is not free to choose as to the use he will make of his powers for they through his very discipleship are dedicated to the cause of the kingdom.

The Two Arithmetics

I know a girl who multiplies
  Her sorrows by dividing.
Whatever cause she has for sighs
  She always is confiding.
And so she adds to others' woe
  And from their joy substracts.
A strange arithmetic, I know,
  But these, my dear, are facts.

I know a girl who multiplies
  Her joys by cancellations.
She draws the line through tears and sighs
  Of all denominations.
Dividing joys, she multiplies
  Her friends and sunny hours.
Now tell me, which arithmetic
  Shall we adopt for ours?

Grandmother Dixon's New Year's Caller

BY FRED MYRON COLBY.

Grandmother Dixon was one of the nicest and dearest little old ladies you ever saw. She was ninety when I saw her, and she did not look to be over seventy, her slight figure erect, and her eyes as bright and her cheeks as fresh as those of a girl of eighteen. She had spent the larger part of her life in the West, although she was born in the East, and it was very interesting to hear her talk of the old times of adventure and privation, when the "West" was debatable ground, and not the rich, populous country it is now.

She had married when she was eighteen years old and went with her husband to the eastern part of what is now the state of Illinois, though in those days it was a part of the great Northwest Territory. It was a wild, unbroken country then, and she lived a pioneer life with all its hardships of want and cold and even of Indian adventure. Grandmother was fond of talking of those old times of care and privation when she was a young wife in that new country. She had six children, and she made every stitch of their clothing, as well as her husband's, and taught them, too. There was no schoolhouse nearer than six miles, and the only books she had were the Bible, the "Pilgrim's Progress," and a copy of Robinson Crusoe. She taught all her children to read and to spell out of these books.

She did the work of all this great household, and still found time to enjoy herself. Their house was a sort of tavern, and Henry Clay and President Jackson had stopped there once on a time, and she had heard Douglas and Lincoln make some of their famous speeches. She was a great knitter, and she kept this up in her old age, and I do not know how many pairs of warm woolen mittens she knit and gave away every winter.

Our girls were busy one afternoon of the last of December getting ready for New Year's callers, the next day being January 1, and they were talking about it to grandmother, who was sitting by the register in her familiar employment of knitting.

"You never heard about my New Year's caller, did you, girls?" she asked.

"No, grannie, we never did," they said. "Won't you tell us about it?" and they gathered around her eager to hear the story, for they know there must be one back of grandmother's question.

"It was a good while ago," said Grandmother Dixon, "soon after I was married. You know we went west, your grandfather and I, and took up a farm in southwestern Illinois in what is now Morgan County. We were miles from civilization, and our nearest neighbors were two and three miles away, and your grandfather had to go fifteen miles to mill to get our corn and wheat ground.

"I was just a girl, and it was very lonely for me, but my oldest child was soon born and she made company for me. Once in a while a circuit rider—traveling preachers they were—would call at the house and stay all night. There were Indians about us, and occasionally we would catch sight of the red creatures hiding about in the cornfield. One day a squaw came to the house with a sick pappoose in her arms. I made her stay all night and sleep by the fire, and I made some catnip tea for her baby, and when she went away I gave her a pair of little woolen socks such as I had knit for my baby. She seemed to be very thankful, and I heard afterwards that her pappoose had recovered from its illness.

"This occurred in the fall of 1831, just before the Black Hawk war broke out. The following New Year's day—our second in that new country—John, that was your grandfather, started off with a load of corn to be ground at the distant mill. He would not return till the next day, for the roads were bad, and he did not like to be out nights on account of the wolves which were more or less numerous in that region.

"It was pretty lonesome after he went away, and I remember standing and looking out of the window and crying as I saw my husband disappear in the distance. But I presently overcame my feelings, and I was busy all day looking after the stock in the barn and caring for baby. It was getting about dark when I thought I heard steps about the cabin, and before I could interpose the door opened and an Indian walked in as stately as you please.

"He was a huge, hideous looking creature, all in war paint, as he was decked with feathers and wampum, and he had a knife and tomahawk in his belt and carried a gun in his hands. You can imagine my feelings. I was nearly frightened to death, and I caught up baby and ran behind the bed, with that between me and the savage. He never said a word, just grunted, and sat down by the fire.

"I think that was the longest night I ever experienced. It seemed a week long, and sometimes I felt as if I wanted to cry, and the next moment I wanted to laugh. And the big Indian just sat there by the fire and grunted once in a while. It must have been after midnight when he arose and pointed to his mouth, and made motions that he wanted something to eat.

"Baby was sound asleep on the bed but I did not dare to leave her with the savage, and so I took her up in my arms and brought out from the cupboard what I had cooked that day. There was a great pan full of doughnuts, a piece of boiled pork, half of a johhny-cake and a can of vinegar, all of which I set on the table before him. Did you ever see an Indian eat? Well, I never did but once. He ate all the johnny-cake and the doughnuts and the pork, and drank nearly all the vinegar, gulping it down as if it had been so much sweet cider.

"When he had finished eating he went to the door and peeped out as if listening, and instantly came back to me and pulled me there. I tell you I could hardly stand from fright, but as I listened I could catch the echo of what was worse than the howls of hungry wolves—the war cries of Indians. They were a good ways off, and the red man after a while closed the door, put out the light, and covered all the coals on the hearth with ashes.

"And there we sat and listened through the rest of the night. Once my child cried, and the Indian came and put his hand on baby's mouth, and it hushed instantly. I made up my mind then that my red visitor was a friend and had come to save our lives if he could. Towards morning he showed me a light in the sky, and I knew that the fiends had attacked and burned the cottage of one of our neighbors.

"It was a terrible night, but after a while the glow went down, and the yells became more and more indistinct. When the morinng broke wasn't I glad to see the sun once more and to know that we were safe. As soon as it was light the warrior picked up one of the baby's socks, and said to me, his dark eyes glowing, 'Umph! made one for pappoose, so Indian came here.'

"That was all he said, and he walked away, with his gun in his hand and his eagle feathers dancing in the breeze. I knew then that my visitor was the pappoose's father, and that he had come to our home to protect us from his people out of gratitude for what I had done for his squaw and child.

"John returned early in the afternoon, and his face was as white as chalk till I appeared with baby in my arms in the doorway. He had expected to find us killed and scalped. The savages had burned the homes of several of our neighbors and had killed quite a number of the settlers. John and I sat up all that night, not knowing but they might come and burn us up after all, but they never appeared in our section again.

"That, girls," said Grandmother Dixon, folding up her knitting as the tea bell rang, "that was my first and last New Year's visitor."

Good Samaritan Ants

Eight-year-old Mamie was in a flutter of excitement. Grandpa had promised to show her something wonderful; he had said that she might watch him while he "verified one of Sir John Lubbock's experiments."

Mamie didn't know what grandpa meant, but she danced about him while he filled a small pan with water and carried it into the garden. She was even more puzzled when he stopped at an ant hill, lifted a little stick on which a number of ants were crawling, and shook them off the stick into the water. "You'll kill them."

But grandpa only smiled.

"No, no! I'll not kill them," he answered; "wait a minute and see what happens."

In a very little while he took the half-drowned ants from the water and placed them near the hill. Mamie was bubbling over with curiosity, and stood first on one foot, then on the other.

"O grandpa!" she cried, seizing his hand, "what will happen?"

Grandpa said nothing, but smiled down into the impatient little face and pointed to the ant hill. Some ants came out and crawled away. Mamie watched them a long time, but saw nothing wonderful, then she looked up at grandpa. His face brightened as another ant issued from the hill. Mamie began watching again. The ant took the same path the other had taken, but suddenly it stopped and seemed to be looking at something. Then Mamie remembered the half-drowned, unconscious ants, and saw that it was looking at them.

"What's he going to do?" she exclaimed in an excited whisper. "Will he—?"

But the ant had evidently satisfied its curiosity, for it went on. Before Mamie had time to say anything more, other ants came along, and, seeing their unconscious brothers, stopped and looked at them. Then they began moving quickly about, and Mamie gave a little shriek of delight.

"Grandpa, grandpa! They're going to take them home, and give them something to make them well!"

And sure enough, the active little insects were carrying the unfortunate ones back home, and soon disappeared through the opening in the hill.

"Oh, oh!" cried Mamie, "I must go quickly and tell mamme about the ex—What will you call it, grandpa?" Grandpa was writing in his notebook, but he looked up as she spoke.

"It's a long word," he said, " 'experiment.' " Then he went on writing, and Mamie, who had no idea what the long word meant, ran into the house, exclaiming:

"O mamma, grandpa let me see an experiment, and ants are just like the men in the Bible; there are priest ants and Levite ants, then there are some Good Samaritan ants, too!"—Selected.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and to Family Worship

SUNDAY, JANUARY 9.

Theme for the Day.

The holy day and the divine Presence.

Scripture.

The Lord is in his holy temple; let all the earth keep silence before him.—Heb. 2:20.

Lines.

But Thou art not alone in courts by mortals trod,
Nor only is the day thine own when man draws near to God.
Thy temple is the arch of the unmeasured sky,
Thy Sabbaths the stupendous march of grand eternity. —Unknown.

Prayer.

Our Father, we hail this day as the best of all the week. Its memories are dear to us, and it brings us the joy of fellowship with thy people. Help us to enter the house of God with gratitude, and to find it truly the place of prayer, the gate of heaven. And while we find it satisfying to us as the temple of God, help us to understand that all places are sacred in the eyes of Him with whom we have to do. Amen.

MONDAY, JANUARY 10.

Theme for the Day.

Resistance to temptation, by the grace of God.

Scripture.

Blessed is the man that endureth temptation; for when he hath been approved, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love him.—Jas. 1:12.

Lines.

In the hour of my distress,
When temptations me oppress,
And when I my sins confess,
Sweet Spirit, comfort me!
—Robert Herrick ("The Litany").

Prayer.

Father of our spirit, thou Comforter and Friend, preserve us this day from the temptation that would rob us of purity, calmness and joy. Help us, we pray thee, to learn the strength that comes through the memory of the words of Scripture, the consciousness of the presence and power of God, and the will to resist all unworthy appeals. Save us from sin, for thy name's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 11.

Theme for the Day.

The necessity of preparation and watchfulness.

Lines.

And the sin I impute to each frustrate ghost
Is, the unlit lamp and the ungirt loin.
—Robert Browning ("The Statue and the Bust").

Prayer.

Holy Father, we thank thee for the warnings and admonitions of thy holy Word. We are in constant danger of missing the best things in life through inattention and neglect. We need such arousal as shall save us from the loss of opportunity, of time and of character; for to lose these is to lose life itself. May we keep our souls in readiness for Thyself, and we cannot then be unprepared for any event. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 12.

Theme for the Day.

The witness of nature to the greatness and goodness of God.

Scripture.

The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handiwork; day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge.—Psalm 19:1.

Lines.

Fast as the evening shades prevail,
The moon takes up the wondrous tale,
And nightly to the listening earth
Repeats the story of her birth.
—Joseph Addison ("The Hymn of Creation").

Prayer.

Lord, thy glory fills the heavens, and the earth is full of thy praise. Thou art the Creator of all things, and thy tender mercies are over all thy works. Help us to join our worship to that of all thy creatures, for we would not be thankless when all nature is praising thee. And may our gratitude for thy mercies bring us so near to thee that we may grow like thee in goodness and in loce. We pray in Jesus' name. Amen.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 12.

Themes for the Day.

The power of God, manifested in Jesus, to heal the ills and sufferings of humanity.

Scripture.

But that ye may know that the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sins (he saith to the sick of the palsy), I say unto thee, Arise, take up thy bed and go unto thy house.—Mark 2:10, 11.

Lines.

He took the suffering human race,
He read each wound, each weakness clear.
He struck his hand upon the place,
And said, Thou ailest here, and here.
—Matthew Arnold.

Prayer.

O Thou great Friend to all the sons of men, we claim thy healing and helping power. In us there is no health, nor strength nor wisdom in thee there is power for our uplifting and great gentleness to bear with our ill-desert. We trust ourselves to thee, nor shall we ever trust in vain. Thou forgivest all our iniquities, and healest all our diseases. Forgive and heal us, for our Savior's sake. Amen.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 14.

Theme for the Day.

The final purpose of God, the completion of human life through the work of Christ.

Scripture.

Making known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure which he purposed in him, unto a dispensation of the fulness of the times, to sum up all things in Christ, the things in the heavens, and the things upon the earth.—Eph. 1:9, 10.

Lines.

That God, which ever lives and loves,
One God, one law, one element,
And one far-off, divine event,
To which the whole creation moves.
—Alfred Tennyson ("In Memoriam").

Prayer.

Good, Father, thy purposes are eternal, and can find their full consummation only in the complete success of the redemptive work of Christ. Of that saving grace, manifested to all men, we are both the objects and the instruments. We praise thee for this high honor, and we crave thy blessing in the effort to conform our lives to so divine a program. Help us to know the part we have to bear in this world-wide message, that we may enter thus into the eternal plan. Amen.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 15.

Themes for the Day.

The value of moderation and contentment.

Scripture.

Remove far from me vanity and lies; give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food suitable for me.—Prov. 30:8.

Lines.

This man is freed from servile bands
Of hope to rise or fear to fall:
Lord of himself, though not of lands,
And, having nothing, yet, hath all.
—Sir Henry Wotton ("The Character of a Happy Life").

Prayer.

Father of mercies, thou God of love, we praise thee for the providence which ministers to all our needs. The gifts of life are of thy bestowing. Make us thankful for them all. We do not ask great things for ourselves, but rather for the contented spirit that accepts with gratitude the favors of thy hand, and knows from whence they come. Give us, we beseech thee, the true riches of humility, courtesy, helpfulness and faith in thee. Make us like our Master, in whose name we pray. Amen.

Nothing is so contagious as enthusiasm; it is the real allegory of the tale of Orpheus; it moves stones, it charms brutes. Enthusiasm is the genius of sincerity, and truth accomplishes no victories without it.—Bulwer Lytton.

A STORY OF THE TRUSTS

BY JANE RICHARDSON

CHAPTER VI. Continued.

During the latter part of Eleanor's talk the subtle fragrance of coffee—so suggestive of good cheer—permeated the room, and soon Ann and Susan came in with trays, on which the steaming cups were re-inforced by plates of sandwiches and cakes. The coffee loosed their tongues, and they chattered gayly. A little later all sang, and in their united voices Eleanor distinguished one that was very superior. It proved to be Mary Benson's, and when Eleanor spoke some words in its praise, Mary confessed to her her modest ambition to take vocal lessons and, ultimately to join some church choir. Eleanor warmly commended her, and from that moment, Mary was her devoted adherent. As she went among them, speaking a word here or shedding a smile there, there was no mistaking her genuine interest in them, and the young women instantly responded to it. Many artless confidences of hopes and plans were made to her, which gave her the very insight she sought for her future work among them.

Eleanor would have laughed, with tears in her eyes, doubtless, could she nave heard their exchanges of opinions on her and her plans, on the homeward walk. They all admitted that "they had had a splendid time, and that it would be something to look forward to!" It was a novelty in their young lives, and, as such, it held their attention and interest thenceforth; so strongly indeed, that they forgot the pleasures they had sacrificed; the Saturday evening promenade through the business streets of the town, with their respective escorts, who, later, "saw them home" and accepted their invitation "to come in a while"; they neglected the "Band Concert" in the public square, even the disconsolate "beaux," in the fullness of their new enthusiasm. However, in due time, the young men were propitiated by being invited to the "open meetings," and, ultimately, they too regarded them as social events of great importance. For the first time many came in contact with a truly cultured woman, and their standards of life were insensibly bettered thereby. They agreed heartily with the members of it that the Neighborly Club was a success in every respect.

CHAPTER VII.

Birds of a Feather.

When Bannister returned to Carlinville for Commencement it was inevitable that he should meet B. F. Mullins, and quite natural that there should spring up at once as warm a friendship as could exist between two such natures. Bannister admired Mullins' crude force; the brute will that bent or broke whatever resisted its advance in any direction. He was, in the parlance of the hour, "a live man;" progressive and public spirited. He was the richest man in the town, self-made, in the hatefullest acceptance of a term that has long lost its first wholesome significance, since the making on which he prided himself had only increased his dogged resoultion to sweep everything aside, that did not tend to his individual aggrandizement. Of genuine integrity, of refinement, of spirituality, of clear, true mental perception, he had acquired nothing; on the contrary he had lost the little which nature implants in even the most rudimentary soul.

He had introduced into the pleasant old town a new and concise financial creed, "Money talks," which, as yet, was by no means universally accepted there. But the mere repetition of words has a cumulative power that has destroyed armies, and overthrown nations, and held races for ages in the shackles of fanaticism.

The man's sordid ignorance still prejudiced the more refined and better bred people against him; but his financial success had inspired the unthinking with an admiration for his ability.

He was formost in all the leading enterprises of the place, and was largely interested in several Trusts, and he was secretly scheming to get control of the Wire Fence Works amongst them.

Mullins saw in Bannister all that he himself would have been, could he have arranged the terms upon which he entered life. With his loud, coarse advocacy of the "self-made man," in his inmost heart, there was a slavish and servile admiration for one who had never worked with his hands, whose place had been made for him, and who could boast of ancestors that for generations "had been gentlemen." He had heard rumors of Bannister's budding political ambition, and after he had met him, declared that he "was just the man."

"I have some state pride," he said to a familiar, "and we want to show the kid-gloved politicians in Washington that Indiana isn't all backwoods, and Hoosiers hain't all poor white trash. Bannister's well-educated; he's lived in Washington; he's got money; all good reasons why he ought to have the Senatorship!"

There was still another that he was too discreet to formulate; the nominee thus designated, the result of a brief conference as soon as they "understood each other,"—was pledged to further in the Senate any and all schemes that might advance and protect the extensive enterprises with which Mullins was identified. This was to be accomplished through protection, or tariff revision; through reciprocity, or its defeat; not in accordance with any sincere, personal view Bannister might hold, for he possessed few scruples, and less principle, and fell willingly into Mullins' plans.

"B. F.'s" big white house stood upon the summit of the highest hill on the outskirts of Carlinville, and was pointed out, with the water works tower, the Soldier's monument, and the Cemetery, as an object of interest. It was gabled and turreted and its solid walls were like battlements. Within, the Chicago upholsterer had been given "carte blanche" and had done his worst. There was too much of everything; too many big, soft chairs, too much light, too much frescoing, in which naked nymphs and shameless satyrs disported themselves amongst overblown roses and abnormally brilliant foliage, and "B. F.'s" counterfeit presentment, photographs, portraits in oil and crayon, confronted one everywhere.

Mrs. Mullins was a meek inoffensive creature, whose personality had long since been absorbed in that of her husband. She had no views and never expressed her opinions, if meeting of the Neighborly Club might open

It was a hot September evening. Eleanor and Susan worked all afternoon that the first sewed, scrubbed and washed; and when they she had any. When they were poor, she sewed, scrubbed and washed; and when they became rich, she still occupied herself in pottering about her big, over-furnished house, doing the trifling things with her own hands which could have been relegated to the servants, who spoke of her below stairs with familiar disrespect. She dressed in rich silks, new and stiff, for her best gowns, old and shiny for ordinary occasions. She was faded and withered, and the great diamonds which dragged down the lobes of her large thin ears, intensified every line and every shrunken feature. Her yellow fingers were also encrusted with jewels.

Only in one thing did she ever defy her husband, and this was in the ruinous indulgence of her son whom she blindly adored. She privately supplied him with money, concealed his extravagances and dissipations and interfered whenever he was put to work. She had taken him from every school he had entered because "his eyes were affected," or "the teacher was too strict," or "did not understand him."

It was this poor, weak mother, chiefly—aside from his heredity—who had made her son what he was; a trifling, worthless spendthrift, who had never done an honest day's work in his life or manifested a desire that was not ignoble, or devoted himself seriously to a pursuit that was not vicious.

The three daughters were like their father, in varying degrees; Arabella, the eldest, being such a pronounced copy in manner, bearing and appearance that everyone said "it was too bad that she was not a man." The other two, Maude and Edythe—as she wrote it—were also "real Mullinses."

Besides espousing his political aims, after he came to know him well, Mullins decided that Bannister should marry Arabella.

The girls were none of them young and he believed firmly in women marrying.

"An old maid's a freak," he said. "It's woman's business to marry, keep her husband's house and have children for him; if she don't do this, she's no good! I've got no use for the new-fangled notion of women settin' up for themselves! Their place is at home, and they should stay there and be satisfied with what the man furnishes." His opinion was a species of Western philosophy identical with the Mohammedan dogma that a woman acquires a soul only through the saving grace of marriage.

Bannister, who had been a leading spirit in the convention of his party at Indianapoils, plunged energetically into the campaign. He had been advertised early in the canvass to speak at Hoopersburg, a village off the railroad, ten miles south of Carlinville, and Bannister, "en route" and returning, was to be Mullins's guest. This plan was carried out and the meeting was duly reported by the Clarion as "one wild burst of enthusiasm in which two old-time Democrats had come forward and renounced the political faith of a life-time!" The opposition sheet described the gathering as "a mere handful of women, children and minors, the few voters present being discouraged and apathetic."

The two men sat at breakfast the next morning, the table laden with a profusion of fruit and porridge, chops, fish and beefsteak, all of which were hospitably pressed upon the visitor. The daughters, ordinarily, did not appear so early, but they were present now in the most elaborate morning costumes. Mrs. Mullins, her diamonds glittering conspicuously, in the best of her older black gowns, sat half extinguished behind the huge shining bulk of the coffee urn. She was thankful for this barricade when she was forced to reply to "B. F's" suspicious inquiry:

"Where's Billy?"

"Poor Billy, he's got one of his bad headaches, and I wouldn't let him get up," she faltered.

"B. F." had heard this excuse before, so he frowned with surly incredulity, but he said nothing. He turned to Bannister remarking: "My folks don't meddle with politics, if I know it!" and he and Bannister thereafter monopolized the conversation. Mrs. Mullins willingly yielded the point; and the girls, although they might have surprised their father, were too wise to offer any remark.

"We've got to get Dick Randall and the men at the Wire Fence Works into line," said B. F., buttering a plateful of steaming griddle-cakes. "Randall pretends to be with us" he went on talking with his mouth full. "There's no reason in the world why everyone of them three hundred men shouldn't vote the straight ticket!"

Bannister did not reply for a moment; then he said: "If there's anything I can do—Dick and I are pretty good friends—I'm at your service."

Bannister had known Randall slightly in his college days but had not renewed the acquaintance until he decided to try for the Senatorship.

"No," said B. F. emphatically, "You keep out of it! It won't do for you to be mixed up in it. I'm not running for office—you understand! I'll see him myself this morning, I'll have the horses out and we can drive up there right away after breakfast. He's sure to be there. That's one good thing about him; he sticks to business. It's more than can be said of some other fellers!" and he frowned meaningly in the direction of his wife, who felt guilty and was once more thankful for the interposing coffee urn.

The young ladies were visibly disappointed as they watched the departure of B. F. and their guest, when they dashed off behind the handsome horses; Bannister was so manifestly like the great world they longed to know.

"It's just like Pa!" observed Arabella angrily. "He never thinks of anything but himself."

"Some other people are a good deal like him too!" spitefully observed Edythe.

"You're out of this, remember! I'll drop you any place you like," said Mullins, when he had checked the horses after their first dash. "Think you'd better not see Randall at all, this time. I know him better than you do."

"All right!" said Bannister indifferently.

"Would you like to look in at the Clarion office? It's always a good thing to keep on the right side of the newspapers. Or you might call on Judge Brainard. He's so confounded stiff that I can't get along with him myself. He's more your sort; not that he isn't all right. He's with us from principle and he stands by his party; but he's apt to make trouble if things don't go his way. We want a different sort of a man on the bench here; but we can't undertake to tackle him now. He's too well known all over the state. He's got a mighty strong grip on the party: he's solid with the farmers. I wouldn't give much for your chances if he was to take a notion to try for nomination!" and Mullins laughed at the jesting insinuation.

"If he's all that's in the way, I've nothing to fear! He never had any gall!" said Bannister slightingly, not without reminiscent thoughts of the drubbing he had once got from the man he now sneered at.

"Not afraid of the dark horse, eh?" observed Mullins, good-humoredly.

"No; not as long as Burns and Johnson and Cummings are in the field, to say nothing of the candidates the other party may spring on us and divide the vote. These clod-hopper legislators have a way of sticking to their neighbors!"

"That they do!" observed Mullins sourly, perhaps recalling occasions where his own plans were upset by them.

They rode along silently for a few moments then Bannister looked at his watch and said hesitatingly: "I don't think I'll call at the Clarion office this morning; and Brainard's probably in the court room; if—if you don't mind, you might set me down at Mrs. Crofton's, it's on your way. She's a very old friend, and it isn't too early—it's after ten now."

Nothing escaped B. F. Mullins small furtive eyes, neither the slight embarrassment, nor Bannister's heightened color. He had heard, of course, rumors of Bannister's former engagement to Eleanor Crofton, and the gossip which had been circulating since his recent visits. But he placed no credence in the stories.

"Mrs. Colonel Crofton, you mean? Let me—see! Where are they living now? Brainard has their old place—O, I remember!" And he turned abruptly, drove into an adjacent street and shortly thereafter left Bannister at the gate.

CHAPTER VIII.

A Political Conference.

Mullins drove on to the Wire Fence Works alone. He did not bother himself at the time, as to the nature of Bannister's errand to Mrs. Crofton's. His own business, from which he, himself, had excluded the aspirant for the senatorship, fully occupied him.

He attributed his personal success to his firm belief in the principle, "One thing at a time, no muddling or mixing things." He would make sure of Randall; this accomplished, Bannister's turn would come!

He heard, when he halted before the works, the noise of heavy machines as the wire was drawn, paid out and wound upon the clicking swifts under the surly, but observant eye of the foreman, Clark.

Alonzo and Teddy were at their posts in the engine room and a force of men were unloading and loading the cars upon the siding, the same activity prevailing which he noted months before. Randall's men, without exception were sturdy, contented and faithful. There was no "soldiering," no sly undermining of his authority by the treacherous tools of paid agitators. His men were his fellow townsmen and his friends. They earned the wages he paid them and were advanced as rapidly as he could promote them. The confidence and respect between them was mutual. There was no talk amongst them of "oppressor" or "oppressed."

Randall saw Mullins through the window and he was as little pleased with the visit as he had been on other occasions. He knew that self-interest was at the bottom of whatever he might propose. Mullins suspected that Randall's formal greeting made up in politeness what it lacked in cordiality but he seated himself and went straight to the point.

"You're busy, Randall, I know."

Randall glanced at his desk heaped with letters, half of which he had not opened, and said:

"Yes; always, at this hour."

"Well, I'll not take a minute more of your time than I can help. I've a pressing engagement myself. We'd like to know, Dick, how your men are goin' to vote?"

The use of his Christian name was a display of extreme friendliness and it immediately excited Randall's suspicion.

"My men?" he asked sharply.

He had seated himself at his desk again—"My men?" he repeated, "Well, really Mr. Mullins, you'd better ask them. I suppose the republicans will vote their own ticket, the democrats theirs and the populists and prohibitionists theirs."

"That's just it!" said Mullins emphatically. "You are an employer of labor, Randall; the men look to you for work and wages; their families are dependent on you for the very bread they eat!"

"I beg your pardon! am I not as dependent on their help? Without their labor could I run this works an hour?"

"Now don't fly off the handle!" said Mullins, "Hear me out! The capital invested is yours; the men don't own a cent of it, and they don't lose a cent if it fails. You've taken all the risks, and you've a right to the lion's share of the profits—and—"

"Profits they make possible; not a wheel could turn without their co-operation; as to the 'lion's share,' I've no reason to complain."

"Just so!—But they couldn't have helped you a little bit if you hadn't planked down the cash in the first place! That's sound doctrine, isn't it?"

"It is the fallacious doctrine of the times, I'll admit" said Randall, his eyes kindling. "But I don't rate my men with the coal that feeds my furnace, or the water in the boilers, nor the steam that drives my machinery. I consider that rational beings have somewhat higher claims on the employer than that."

"Yes, when they are rational!" Mullins sneered.

Then he changed his tone and said, as if he were placating an unreasonable child, if it could be supposed he were ever guilty of such weakness.

"That's all right! I've always known you held queer, socialistic ideas, but it's not the time for any of that sort of moon-shine now. We've gone through the hardest times the country's ever known, though, somehow, you've not felt it much."

He paused, but Randall did not reply.

"It's the outcome of the tariff tinkering," he went on, "and if it isn't stopped, and our party put back into power, public confidence will be paralyzed. What we've gone through will not be a patchin' to it and there'll be such a devil of a panic as will ruin you with everybody else!"

Still Randall did not speak.

"You're not a mugwump?" asked Mullins suspiciously.

"No; I'm not that!" Randall replied decidedly. I've never concealed my politics—You know that. But I am one of the many who is ashamed that his party will use dirty tools and lend itself to schemes that honest men must blush for. I'm a better partisan than you; for I want my party to be again what it once was!"

"I don't understand you!" said Mullins sullenly. "But we haven't time to split hairs. You have a right to your opinion and I to mine. All's fair in love and war, and politics is war from the word 'go.' We've got to fight the devil with fire. and it's no time for Sunday-school tracts or preacher-talk. Not to beat around the bush any longer, for it's getting late," and he glanced at the big clock ticking solemnly on the wall, "the Central Committee wants you to round up your men. Lay down the law to 'em, and tell 'em they've got to vote the straight ticket!"

Randall toyed with his pen-holder absently, thinking over the shameless audacity and insolence of the demand.

Mullins at last seemed to realize that perhaps he had gone too far, and he said, by way of conciliation:

"Of course I don't mean that you're to force them, or threaten them in so many words, but let 'em know that if the county goes against us they'll be out of a job; that there'll be a reorganization, a cut in wages! That's the way to bring 'em round!"

Randall stopped him with sudden emphasis:

I pray not that Men tremble at
My power of place
And lordly sway.
I only pray for simple grace
To look my neighbor in the face
Full honestly from day to day.

Church Life

The article by Mr. Yeuell on Evangelism, in this week's issue of the Christian Century will be read with interest by every reader of the paper.

Dr. and Mrs. Herbert L. Willett, and family have been spending the holidays with relatives and friends in Kenton, Ohio. Mrs. Willett has quite recovered from her recent illness

We thank our friends for their coöperation in making our pages "The Christmas Pulpit" of last week. Next will be the summaries of the annual reports of the churches. Send them in by earliest mail.

Several of our friends have written asking whether the books reviewed in our columns from week to week may be ordered through the Christian Century Company. To all who are interested we would say that we can always supply books to our readers at as low a rate as they can be had of any one, and will take pleasure in thus serving our readers.

The annual meeting of the Bellevue, Pa., church will not be held until the 21st of January. William Lloyd is the pastor.

There were five accessions to the Central Church, Dayton, Ohio, the last Sunday in December. I. J. Cahill was the preacher.

George H. Kemp has resigned his pastorate at Prairie City, Iowa, and closed his work with the church the first of the year.

A meeting at Fertile, Ia., has just closed with twenty-four accessions, all but one by primary obedience. Chas. McVay led the singing.

Victor F. Johnson spoke at the Monroe Street church, Chicago, on a recent Sunday. The Monroe Street church has not called a pastor yet.

Dr. Arthur Holmes, was engaged by the Y. M. C. A., of Canton, Ohio, to speak at the Baptist Church of that city, Sunday, December 26.

Charles D. Hougham has resigned as pastor at Mount Pleasant, Iowa, and will close his work with the church the first of January.

The annual meeting of the church at Davenport, Iowa, will be held Tuesday evening, January 4. Two of the clubs of the church will serve a free supper.

E. J. Arnot, who preaches for the church at Batavia, Ill., received the B. D. degree from the University of Chicago at the close of the autumn quarter.

The church at Pittsburg, Kans., made a careful investigation to discover needy families a few days before Christmas, and made liberal provision for them in their Christmas offering.

Vaughn Dabney, the energetic pastor of the Douglas Park church, Chicago, has led his church in paying off half of the church debt. They are much encouraged about their future.

Dean Frederick Norton left Des Moines for Prince Edward Island, December 17. Mr. Norton makes this long journey of 4,000 miles that he may spend a few days at the bedside of his mother who is very feeble.

The church at Urichsville, Charles Darsie, pastor, made a contribution of $58.85 to the Bethany College endowment fund. Mr. Darsie is an alumnus of Bethany, and led them in their college songs at the Centennial Convention.

Evangelist F. A. Ware, Living Link, of the church at Walla Walla, Wash., has come into deep sorrow by the death of his wife, his daughter and his youngest son, all within a few days. Typhoid fever was the cause of the death in each instance.

Wallace Tharp, pastor of the North Side Church, Pittsburg, and W. R. Warren, who is just retiring from the office of Centennial secretary, will start March 12 for a three months' trip to Palestine. Messrs. Tharp and Warren will travel in company of forty ministers.

The church at Vinton, Iowa, burned to the ground the evening of December 22, with a loss of $7,000, partially covered by insurance. The fire started in the furnace room while the church was filled with children practicing for a Christmas entertainment. All escaped from the building in safety.

In January Marion Stevenson will spend a week each at Hiram and at Butler College. He proposes to reach as rapidly as possible all of the ministerial students in our colleges and to suggest and assist in the development of regular Bible-school pedagogy courses.

Christian University, Canton, Mo., is facing a very hopeful future upon the foundation of the recent gift of $50,000 by Robert Stockton of St. Louis, Mo. President Johann has proven himself a patient, strong, self-denying leader during the eight years of his administration.

Rev. Wm. A. Ward, of St. Louis, the General Secretary of the Christian Socialist Fellowship, will give the address at the Fellowship mass meeting at Memorial Church, Oakwood boulevard, just west of Cottage Grove avenue, Chicago, Sunday afternoon, January 9, at 2:30 o'clock. All are cordially invited to attend.

E. N. Duty is pushing the work of the Second Church, Milwaukee, with vigor. There were six additions to the church the last Sunday in the year. An adult Bible class has been organized with R. A. Nourse as teacher; and a teacher training class will be organized early in the new year.

H. F. Brastow has been called to the church at Roseberry, Idaho, and will begin work there the second week in January. In a personal letter he says: "As part of my sermon last Sunday I read your first page editorial, 'God in a Manger.' You are getting at the heart of things."

A. R. Spicer, pastor at Dixon, Ill., says: "Alva W. Taylor's 'Trend of Events' is the best written department of the kind I ever read—no religious paper of any denominational body excepted. It's worth the price of the paper." We receive many such letters commending the work of Mr. Taylor.

Charles C. Wilson, pastor of the church at Bellefontaine, O., has made very attractive announcement of the following series of "Six Short Sermons on Great Questions." They are: "Is There a God?" "Was Christ Divine?" "Is the Bible True?" "Is There a Heaven?" "Is There a Hell?" "The Greatest Living Question."

The Christian Tabernacle church, North Tonawanda, N. Y., has extended a call to G. H. Steed, Moundsville, W. Va., and he has accepted. Mr. Steed will begin work January 15, and for two weeks will be assisted by the retiring pastor, W. C. Bower, who enters Columbia University the first of February for post graduate work.

Christmas this year was called by the Sunday-school of the First Church, Lincoln, Neb., a "Giving Christmas." The children received no treat from the Sunday-school; but brought fruit, candy, toys, groceries and clothing to be distributed to worthy families on the Christmas day. Besides this feature, the children rendered a Christmas program.

The Central Church, Peoria, Ill., is looking forward to a great ingathering during the meeting which they will hold under the leadership of W. E. Harlow, during February. Mr. Harlow and the pastor of the Peoria church, W. F. Turner have been together in several meetings.

C. A. MacDonald, Bible-school evangelist, has been at work in Macon county, Mo., for the past month. In that time he has organized eight adult Bible classes. Four of these are men's classes. A short time ago Mr. MacDonald made a brief visit to Illinois and organized two classes of young men and two of young women at Grand De Tour, near Dixon, Ill.

L. E. Brown, pastor of the church at Lebanon, Ind., was the object of a surprise planned by his official board and their wives. The members of the church came into the church building at the close of the prayer meeting service, and presented Mr. Brown with a fine diamond pin, and then with resolutions of highest appreciation of his work, signed by all the members of the board.

W. D. Ward, who has been pastor of the church at Rockford, Ill., for the past two years, but recently resigned, has received and accepted a call from the Central Church, Newark, Ohio. Newark has a population of 25,000, and is just thirty-three miles east of Cleveland. The resident membership of the church is about 600, and the Sunday-school enrollment, 300. Mr. Ward began his work with the church January 9. We wish him a happy and permanently successful pastorate.

A. T. Shaw was in his pulpit at Spencer, Ind., twice Sunday, December 19—the first time his health has permitted this service since last August. Mr. Shaw had to preach sitting, as did the Master on so many occasions. Despite the pastor's illness, the work prospers at Spencer. The church building has just been redecorated at an expense of $400.00. The offerings for state missions and C. W. B. M. were taken on their respective days.

A young people's missionary society has been organized in the East End Christian Church, Pittsburg, Pa., where John Ray Ewers is minister. The age limits are, fifteen to thirty-five. Meetings will be held monthly, and this year the circle will make a study of Mrs. Royal J. Dye's new book on Bolenge. This church will give a dinner to its entire membership the evening of the annual meeting, which will be the third Wednesday evening in January.

The annual reception of the Jefferson Street Church, Buffalo, N. Y., was held the week before Christmas. The entire church was thrown open. As the guests came young ladies pinned dainty name cards upon each one, and then they were shown through the building, and were introduced to all the other members present. The reception was intended especially as a welcome to the members who have come into the fellowship of the church during the past year.

There is a growing tendency among our churches to emphasize more the seriousness of change in official position in the churches, either of pastor or members of the church boards. It is not at all uncommon for churches to hold formal installation services. This principle has been applied by the church at Huntington, Ind., to the teachers and officers of the Sunday-school, and on a recent Sunday evening held a service in which their teachers and officers for the coming year were formally installed.

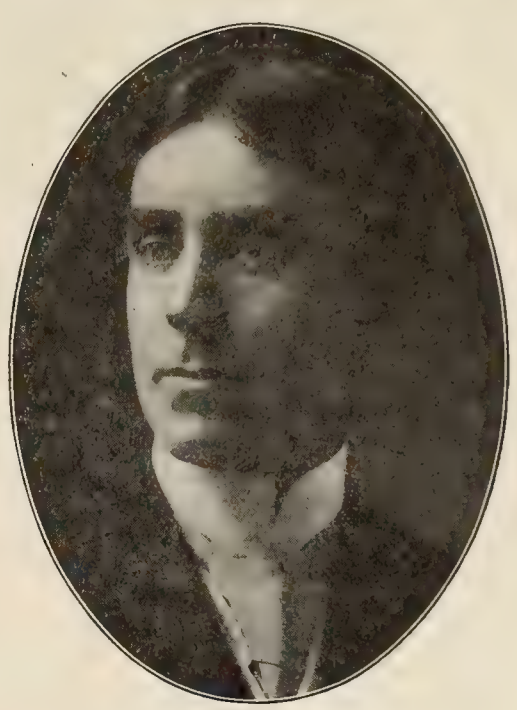
S. A. in connection with its state superintendents of Bible-schools!"

A. J. Saunders has resigned at South Chicago and is now on his way to Australia. We shall miss him much in our councils.

Two of the churches of Chicago have installed stereopticons recently: Sheffield Avenue and Armitage Avenue. Douglas Park is getting ready to put one in. They are a most useful piece of equipment in the city life for presenting biblical subjects and missions. O. F. Jordan spoke at Sheffield Avenue on the evening of the Christmas entertainment, reviewing the life of Christ with the most celebrated works of art.

H. O. Pritchard, pastor of the University Church, Bethany, Nebraska, will hold a meeting with his church, beginning the first Sunday in January. He has announced for the meeting a series of expository sermons based upon the Hebrew epistle, in which he says: "I shall cover pretty largely the ground of Christian Theology." Mr. Pritchard must undertake this plan of meeting as an experiment, for our evangelists do not often use expository sermons. We wish to commend the efforts to make the evangelistic meeting educational.

Roscoe Hill, who during last year was studying in the University of Chicago, is this year at Columbia University, where he will complete his work for the Ph. D. degree. A note in the parish paper of the Lenox Ave. Union church gives evidence that Mr. Hill has found other avenues of interesting activity aside from his university life. The note reads: "Since Mr. Roscoe Hill has become an officer our school has taken on new life. . . . He has some good things he has not yet told us of."



Most of the churches of Des Moines will hold special meetings after the holidays. The church in Highland Park begins January 2 with the sermons by the pastor, John McD. Horne. At the Capitol Hill church the services begin the same day as do the services at the Park Avenue church. The services begin on the following Sunday at the Grant Park and Clifton Heights church. I. J. Spencer will conduct the special service at the University Place church beginning February 14, and Peter Ainslie begins his series of evangelistic meetings in the Central church on March 6.

R. A. Long, the prince of givers, was so pleased with the growth of the Sunday School at the Independence Boulevard church, Kansas City, during the last six months that he has made his gift $100,000 instead of $50,000. It will be remembered that Mr. Long's original offer was to give $50,000 for a new Sunday-school building on the condition that the attendance of the school, which was then about 500, should average 700 for July and August, and 1,000 for the remaining months of the year. The average attendance in July and August was 811, and the remaining months, 1,054. The new building will be larger than the present $100,000 structure and will contain every modern equipment for the Sunday-school, a gymnasium, swimming pool, club rooms, etc. The $10,000 pipe organ now used by the church will be given to the Sunday-school, and a new $15,000 organ given to the church.

The latest addition to the list of paid state superintendents of Bible-schools is Clark Bower, 315 N. 3rd street, Colorado City, Colo., who takes up the work at once in that great state. Colorado is to be congratulated upon its forward movement which calls so enthusiastic and well qualified a man into the field.

Ernest J. Sias, pastor of the church at Frankfort, Ind., has resigned and will again devote his energies to lecturing. Mr. Sias's work in Frankfort is most highly commended by the local press. Throughout that region he has made a reputation for his eloquence, his breadth of sympathy, his wonderful energy, and marked enthusiasm. The Frankfort church has grown under his care to be the largest in the city and one of the largest churches of the Disciples in Indiana. In addition to this, Mr. Sias has furnished a mission church in the city, which has grown from a membership of seven or eight to one hundred and fifty. Mr. Sias is not inexperienced in the lecture field, having given some years to this work before preaching at all, and having spent several weeks on the platform each year during his pastorate in Frankfort. He will make his home in Lincoln, Nebraska.

G. B. Van Arsdall, for five years pastor of the First Christian Church, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, has been called to the pastorate of the Central Church, Denver, according to a telegram received from the Denver church just after our forms had been closed last week. Mr. Van Arsdall was called from the Central church, Peoria, to Cedar Rapids, five years ago. This is one of the strong and well established churches of the Central states, and Mr. Van Arsdall has made good in his work. The membership of the church and the Sunday-school have increased steadily, and the church has been brought into the living link class. The church to which Mr. Van Arsdall is called is one of the most important among the Disciples, and the Christian Century congratulates the church upon securing so able a leader as Mr. Van Arsdall for their work. Dr. H. O. Breeden, who has been serving as temporary pastor of the Central Church will close his work the first of February and will be succeeded immediately by Mr. Van Arsdall.

Mrs. Frances Dwinnell Elliott, mother of Ashley J. Elliott, Peoria, Ill., Walter Elliott, missionary to China, and E. E. Elliott, assistant secretary of the Men's Brotherhood, has written a history of the Third Christian Church, Indianapolis, which has just been published by the Ladies' Aid Society of the church. Mrs. Elliott has marked literary ability, and has carefully prepared the history of this great church from the time of its organization in 1870 to the present, when it numbers more than twelve hundred members, under the leadership of that prince of pastors, Harry G. Hill. The book is offered for sale for fifty cents, postage five cents, and the proceeds will go to the building fund of the church. There are many former members of the church and many friends of the author who will want this skillfully and artistically prepared history of the church. Address the pastor, Harry G. Hill.

The churches of the Fourth District, Oklahoma, held their convention at Hinton the latter part of November. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: George Thomas, district evangelist; Mrs. A. M. Lucy, president C. W. B. M.; H. S. Gilliam, state superintendent of Bible-school work; J. M. Monroe, corresponding secretary.

The Norwood Avenue Church, Toledo, Ohio, is in a building enterprise. The cornerstone service was held October 31, with C. J. Tanner as principal speaker. The South Church of the same city laid the cornerstone of their new building on November 7, with Grant W. Speer as speaker. The East Church in that city recently closed the best meeting in the history of the church, with W. J. Cocke of Lexington, Ky., as evangelist. Fifty-three additions.

The annual report of the Ivanhoe Park Christian Church of Kanas City, where J. T. Ferguson ministers, showed the following results: One hundred thirty-five members added; the Bible school enrollment 362, among which is the wide-awake class of adult men, and one of young men who are getting a vision. The junior department is using the graded lessons. There has been a decided gain in every department. The C. W. B. M. holds the banner for the greatest per cent of increase. The amount of money raised last year for all purposes was $3,792, a gain of $1,215 over the previous year. For missions about $360 was contributed. Since Mr. Ferguson took this work two years ago the membership, the Bible school and the total receipts have been more than doubled. Another advancement is promised.

E. F. Leak, Newton, Iowa, writes facetiously about our request for news items that are really items of interest, saying he does not know whether the things he proceeds to enumerate are of general interest to our readers or not. But here are some of the items we glean from his letter. Mr. Newton is now in the seventh year of his service at Newton, and is receiving double the salary paid him the first year of his ministry with the church. The semi-annual missionary offering of the church, taken in November, amounted to $150. The C. W. B. M. day sermon was given by the pastor, with an offering of $30. A brotherhood has been organized which will be affiliated with the national organization. The church at Newton has voted to pay the tuition of one of its young men now studying for the ministry in Drake University. Never let a preacher hesitate to write for the news pages when he can send such items as these.

J. C. Todd, pastor of the church at Bloomington, Ind., has a noteworthy plan for the Wednesday evening prayer meetings. The program for the meetings for each quarter are printed on an attractive folder about the size of the usual church bulletin. The general topic for the last quarter of 1909 was "Three Months with the Shepherd of Tekoa." The special topics for each evening, with the scripture references are suggested and doubtless went far toward making a live and interesting meeting. The topics are: "The Prophet and the King." (Amos 1:-2 II Chron. 26); "How God Deals with Heathen Nations" (Amos 1-2:1-3); "The Sins of Christian Nations." (2:4-16); "The Roar of the Lion." (1:2, 3 and 4); "The Life Found in God." (Amos 5); "At Ease in Zion." (Am. 6); "Driving out the Preacher, (Am. 6.); "Doom or Discipline" (8-9:6); "The Prophet's God" (2:8-11, 3:3-1, 4:6-10, 7:9); "God and the Chosen People." (5:21, 7:1-6); "The Judgment of Sin" (2: 14-16, 3:12-15, 4:2, 3, 12); "The Star of Hope" (9:8-15); "The New Year's Message" (selected verses). These meetings are not all led by the pastor, but by different members of the church and two of the meetings are placed in the care of different organizations of the church.

Benjamin F. Hill and son, Harry, are leading in a meeting at Flora, Ill.

I. J. Cahill will hold a meeting at Van Wert, Ohio, in January.

W. H. Pinkerton will assist his brother and the church at Kenton, Ohio, in a meeting during February.

Otis Hawkins has resigned at Denton, Tex., and entered the evangelistic field the first of the year.

J. S. Clements and Edward McKinney are in a short meeting with the church at Olathe, Kansas.

O. P. Speigel, after seven years in the evangelistic field, has accepted the pastorate of the church at West Point, Georgia.

The Franklin Circle church, Cleveland, held a watch-night service with an address on "What the City Does for the Unfortunates" by Dr. H. R. Cooley.

P. C. Macfarlane and Robert Graham Frank of Liberty, Mo., were the chief speakers at a recent meeting of the brotherhood of the church at Nevada, Mo.

Euclid Avenue church, Cleveland, added $1,200 to the pastor's salary as a Christmas gift. J. H. Goldner now receives $3,000 for his services there.

Lewis R. Hotaling, who has been pastor at Hopeston, Ill., the past two years, has accepted a call to the church at Tuscola, Ill., and entered upon his new duties January 1.

J. K. Shellenberger, of Wooster, Ohio, has accepted the position as field secretary for the National Brotherhood of Disciples of Christ. He ought to make a good one.

O. W. Jennings has been called to the service of the church at Granite City, Ill. He began work January 1. The congregation has a $10,000 church property, and is planning to buy an adjoining lot and erect a parsonage.

J. N. Harman, Tazewell, W. Va., has accepted a call to preach for the church at Eustis, Florida, during the winter months, fillling the vacancy caused by the resignation of J. J. Haley, who goes to Modesto, California.

The choir of the Franklin Circle church, Cleveland, Ohio, gave "The Messiah" as a Christmas musical, Sunday evening, December 26. W. F. Rothenburger is pastor of the church and Ralph E. Sapp is conductor of the choir.

It is reported that H. O. Breeden, who closes his temporary pastorate with the Central Church, Denver, February 1, will go to California, where it is hopeed that the climate will be more congenial to Mrs. Breeden's health.

Marion H. Garrard, late of Laporte, Ind., is meeting with encouraging response in his work at Saginaw, Michigan. The church is in the midst of preparations for a meeting to be held by the pastor and William Leigh next February.

J. J. Haley, for many years pastor of the Seventh Street Church, Richmond, Va., has been called to the church at Modesto, Calif. This will be interesting news to many of our readers, who remember Mr. Haley as a frequent contributor to the Christian Century.

Two interesting subjects were announced by J. C. Todd, pastor of the church at Bloomington, Ind., for December 26. They were, morning, "God in Human Life"; evening, "The Nation's Free Boarders, or Social Parasites." Such topics indicate ability to make the connection between profound and significant truth, and the folk mind.

The church at Boone, Iowa, has just closed a short meeting in which there were seventy-two accessions to the membership. Mrs. Clara Hazelrig did the preaching, and without the assistance of a special leader of song. The pastor, H. F. Ritz, gave the meeting most enthusiastic support, and says that the church is now harmonious and working hard.

A unique history of the work of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society is just from the press. It is written by the missionaries themselves. Some one person has written the history of the work in each of the different fields. This book, which will soon receive fuller review in these columns, will sell at twenty-five cents.

GRADE YOUR SCHOOL

On the Installment Plan!

Every informed Sunday-school worker desires to have the graded system introduced into his school. But it seems like too big an undertaking to grade the school all at once. Hence nothing at all is done, and the school goes on in the same old absurd way of teaching the children the lessons provided for grown-up people.

The International S. S. Committee has made it possible to bring the graded system in, like the Kingdom of God comes, "without observation.". You can have your school graded without any agony—almost without knowing it, except in its beneficent results. Begin at the bottom now—with the elementary grades, the pupils under twelve years old.. Provide teachers and pupils with the Bethany Graded Lessons, based on the outlines already authorized by the International Committee. Later on—perhaps in nine months or a year from now—when the Committee authorizes an outline of lessons for the Intermediate grades you will be ready to adopt them and the Bethany Series will be ready with the helps for you.. And so on, through the Senior and Advanced grades, follow the International Committee and as fast as they provide the lessons you will be ready to adopt tnem.

The Bethany Graded Lessons may be commenced at any time. Purchase the main bulk of your supplies wherever you wish, but let us furnish you these fascinating lessons for your pupils under twelve. Send for Prospectus to THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO., 700 East Fortieth Street, Chicago.

W. J. Clarke has just closed his first year of work with the Clifton Church, Louisville, Ky. During this time there were seventy-five added—thirty-one by baptism, and over $500 raised. The Bible school has averaged 250, and all the other departments are prospering. The audiences have shown a healthy increase. The outlook is very bright. The minister has been instrumental, through evangelistic work for other congregations during the year, in adding ninety-four.

J. M. Rudy, pastor at Greencastle, Ind., has just concluded a meeting with the church at Bloomfield, W. Va., of which W. S. Bullard is pastor. The meeting lasted one month and there were one hundred additions to the church. There were no sensational methods, and Mr. Rudy's work commended itself to the entire community. Mr. Bullard is doing excellent service in this field, and has the highest regard of all good people of the city.

A fine example of what the tithing system will do for the finances of a church where the members will adopt it is seen in a report from the Tabernacle Church, North Tonawanda, N. Y. Twenty-one of the three hundred members of this church give one-tenth of their income to the Lord's work. These twenty-one members paid during the last year 63 per cent of the current expenses of the church, and nearly 78 per cent of the missionary offerings of the church. This means that 7 per cent of the membership gave 63 per cent of the current expenses and 78 per cent of the missionary offerings.

The Jackson Boulevard Sunday-school, Chicago, observed a giving Christmas for the first time. They will never be content to observe Christmas in any other way in the future. A beautiful program was rendered and generous gifts were presented by every class, which were distributed on Christmas morning among the needy people of the community. A reception was given by the church to the pastor, Austin Hunter, and wife, New Year's eve, followed by a watch-night service.

W. E. Reavis and the church at Stanberry, Mo., have been working hard during the past year to realize certain Centennial aims. In some of these they have been completely successful. The church has been freed of all indebtedness. A basement for Sunday-school and social purposes has been finished and equipped. The Sunday-school has been largely built up. There is a Junior Endeavor Society of eighty members. The Stanberry church now has one of the best equipped buildings in North Missouri, and a good parsonage.

Holly M. Hale, whom the writer of these notes knew well during his student days at Drake University, and who has recently been preaching for the Hillman Street Church, Youngstown, Ohio, has just been called to the pastorate of the church at Clarksville, Mo. Mr. Hale has been pastor of one of our churches in Pittsburg, and was with the Youngstown church only a few weeks, giving them temporary assistance. The church would have been pleased to retain Mr. Hale as permanent pastor, but could not promise sufficient salary to justify him in remaining with them. Roland Nichols, who will gain most of his support from the lecture field, will minister to the Hillman Street church.

The church at Armington Ill., where John C. Lappin ministers, just closed a very helpful series of meetings. T. L. Read of Chapin, Ill., served as evangelist and Miss Una Dell Berry of LaFayette, Ind., conducted the music. Mr. Lappin says: "Mr. Read's sermons have done a great deal to strengthen the cause in the community. His style is that of the expositor and he presents the truth with clearness and earnestness. Miss Berry made the music a strong feature of the meetings. Our community has not had a better soloist, and all bear testimony to her worth in a revival effort. The number added was small but it was a time of seed sowing and the harvest is ripening for other days." Mr. Lappin will assist Mr. Read in a meeting beginning Jan. 3.

"The Bible-school of the Central Church of Jacksonville, Ill., on Christmas sent nfty-five market baskets laden with meat and other provisions to the poor of the city. The members of the school the Sunday before brought offerings of money and provision to the church for the purpose. With every basket went two loaves of bread and a package of Sunday-school literature. The gifts to the needy took the place of the usual treat of candy and oranges. This is the school directed for several years by Clarence L. Depew, now State Bible-school superintendent, Charles L. Mathis is now leading the school in efficient work. Visits by Marion Stevenson, Knox P. Taylor, Miss Eva Lemert, and H. H. Moninger, have widened the vision of the school."

In Nanking, China, the Presbyterian, Methodist and Disciple boys' schools are being combined. The Presbyterian school has been the smallest of the three. For tow years now the Presbyterian-Disciple schools have been united. One hundred boys are in attendance. The results are most satisfactory. The fellowship has been delightful. The missionaries are so convinced by this two years of testing in union work that a larger union will be still better that they are very desirous of a speedy consummation of the large union. Full plans for the larger union have been carefully worked out. The missionaries on the field are unanimous in approval. The home Boards have all accepted the proposition. They hope to begin actual work under the union management the first of the next Chinese year. This will be next February. Each mission agrees to put in $40,000 gold in property or cash, furnish three teachers, and $2,400 gold per year for running expenses. This will provide not only for union but for enlargement. They are planning to erect buildings at once so that the union institution can receive between 550 and 600 students. Other buildings will be put up as soon as possible. One of the buildings first to be erected is a dining hall which seats over 500 at tables and about 1,000 when used as an auditorium. A number of dormitory rooms will be provided on the second floor of this building. As soon as practicable steps will be taken to secure the land for the entire completed plant and to make out the ground plans for the entire University scheme.

Yeuell at Lincoln, Nebraska

Several months have elapsed since I wrote to the Christian Century a report of our meetings. On my return from Europe last September we started at the 27th & Wabash Church, Kansas City, in a beautiful tabernacle erected under the direction of that earnest and able pastor, D. Y. Donaldson. The five weeks' meeting resulted in 195 additions to the church. Considering that we were on the campaign side of a church-building enterprise, which always scares a large number of prospective members, it was a truly large meeting. They are a wonderful people and before long they will be rejoicing in a new $40,000 church. Jesse Van Camp and his accomplished wife were with us and their splendid work and beautiful spirit added much to the success of the meetings. They are now in New York studying music. They have a great future. Van Camp is a marvel.

On the close of the Centennial we started at Beatrice, Nebraska, where our hopes had been centered for a year. The sickness of the pastor, J. E. Davis, and a scourge of diphtheria made an early close necessary. In the short time there were about fifty additions. The church called me for a return lecture during our Lincoln meeting.

Lincoln came up two or three weeks sooner than they expected, but the prince of pastors, H. H. Harmon, with a great official board backing him, prepared at once, and from the first service the meeting was on. The remarkable thing all through was that there was comparatively little personal work. To meet local sentiment I stated at the first service that no personal work in the congregation would be permitted. During the five weeks of meeting 213 persons walked to the front of their own accord. Thirty-two of these came at the Oliver Theatre from an audience of 1,500 men. Twenty of these were landed for church membership through the Y. M. C. A. Only six of the 213 were children. It must be considered that the First Church at Lincoln is a down-town church, with the typical down-town church problems. Few of the members live within a mile of the church and on stormy nights many could not attend.

The blizzards which swept the Northwest struck Lincoln hard, and much of the time whole sections of the city were snowed in and street cars unable to run. One night a carload of students from Cotner were kept on the track half-way from home until 4 o'clock in the morning. Several nights people had to go to the hotels over night. The M. E.'s had Evangelist Yatman going the round of the Methodist churches during our meeting and they finally had to close in failure without any converts. Benjamin Fay Mills was brought here to throw out a few more slurs on the Disciple type of meeting, but he came and went like a zephyr. Our people clung to their meeting, many suffering hardships to attend. They came up scarcely ever knowing of a soul likely to obey the Lord, but only one night passed without response. I preached "the doctrine" every night and conducted a question box and met inquirers.

The meeting was in no sense a union meeting of our Lincoln and Cotner churches, although we enjoyed the most cordial sympathy of all. The other pastors and churches attended strictly to their own regular work. This was deemed best for local reasons. Bro. Pritchard, one of our very best men, will conduct his own meeting at once at the University church. The college and students have been planning for this effort and a great meeting is assured. Cotner has turned out some great men. Our reception there was very enthusiastic. I thought of that great pastor-evangelist, R. W. Abberley, of Rushville, Ind., where we had one of our best meetings last year, and of the incomparable preacher and lecturer, Ernest J. Sias of Frankfort, Ind., where we had that record-breaking meeting for a single church with 835 baptized unto Jesus—both Cotner men. Chancellor Aylesworth is a modern Arnold in his influence with young men. Cotner is evangelistic to the core and true to the gospel of the New Testament.

Harmon is building up one of the brotherhood's greatest churches. Level headed, suave, diplomatic, fearless, scholarly, with a most charming wife, he is fast ranking as one of our great men. His treatment of the evangelist and wife was most considerate and kind. Like priest, like people—his people followed suit.

I have two assistants, Albert E. Buss, a great chorus leader and cornetist, and J. E. Sturgis, very effective as violinist and gospel soloist. We have no "Syndicate" methods. Buss and Sturgis work in perfect harmony. Both are soloists and leaders. Their consecration is a marked feature of their own work.

We started Sunday with Thomas Maxwell at Fairbury, Nebraska, and although it is right in the holidays, we have a fine beginning. Maxwell is another pastor who knows how to conduct his end of a meeting—a great gift. HERBERT YEUELL.

The Bethany Graded Sunday-School Lessons

Will the new Graded lessons make their way into the Sunday-schools and become the standard lessons of the Sunday-schools of the world as the Uniform lessons have done? There are many signs indicating that this is precisely what will happen.

1. All the authorities in religious pedagogy have been a long time agreed that it is better to suit the lesson to the learner than to compel the learner to adapt himself to the lesson, regardless of his stage of mental development.

2. The International Committee which has for thirty-five years selected the Uniform lessons has now begun the issue of an additional series called the International Graded Course, consisting, not of one Scripture lesson for the entire school, but of a separate series of lessons for each year or grade, chosen with direct reference to the age and ability of the pupils.

3. These lessons are being adopted by the best schools of all denominations. The Presbyterians report that about two thousand of their schools adopted the International Graded courses for children under twelve years, last quarter. This is phenomenal. The Methodists and Congregationalists had to go to press the second and third time to supply the unexpected demand for the graded lessons.

The New Christian Century Co. is supplying these lessons to the Disciples' schools. There is no single achievement in which the publishers of this paper take greater satisfaction than in connecting our schools with this most significant Sunday-school advance of the last fifty years.

The editors of The Christian Century, Mr. Morrison and Professor Willett, both regard the Graded principle as essential to the highest efficiency in religious instruction, and both believe that the Bethany Series is the truest, simplest and most artistic set of supplies for the elementary grades that has ever been put out.

Our pleasure in offering the Bethany Graded Lessons to the brotherhood is enhanced by the fact that our orders for supplies for the winter quarter have been much beyond our expectations. Many other schools have assured us of their purpose to adopt The Bethany Lessons at once. This series may be begun at any time. See full description on another page.

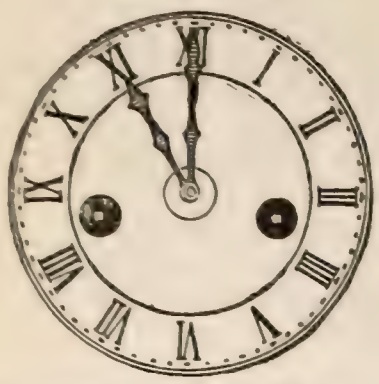
A Letter from Dr. Royal J. Dye, Bolenge, Africa

Nov. 11, 1909.

Dear Friends of the Home-land:

It is quite likely that you are anxious to hear something more about the work and the church at Bolenge. Since my return, there has been so much to do that it seemed almost impossible for me to get time to write letters. I trust you will pardon this delay.



The church at Bolenge, when we consider its ancestry and its heredity, is a surprise and a joy to all who know it and bear it upon their hearts. True, there are cases of reversion to the old life, and they do backslide now and then, but I think you can be certain of a larger proportion of them remaining true and faithful, than in your own congregations at home, and after your great revivals there. They have much to be desired in the way of perfection in the Christian graces and life, but they are struggling if they may attain unto the perfection of the Gospel. Possibly the very greatness of the change from the old life of the past generations to that of the Gospel ideals and standards has tended to make them more permanent than those at home who have simply to assume the name of Christian without much change of life. Possibly it means more to these children of the wilderness and swamps than to those of gospel lightened America.

Reasons For Enlargement

We believe our people will approach the annual offering for Foreign Missions this year with more joy and a larger purpose than ever before.

The first Sunday in March has come to be a day of opportunity and a season of rejoicing in most of our better churches. They look forward to it with the greatest expectancy. It is a time when they turn their eyes away from themselves and mere local problems to the great world-field and plan for its conquest. Nothing less than this will satisfy the heart of our Lord and be accepted as an adequate discharge of his great commission. Every local church coöperating with the great body of its sister congregations may cherish the ideal of universal dominion. It is thus a world-power and thinks in terms of world-thought, and cultivates the spirit of world-consciousness in which it lives and grows and serves. Such a church is in line with God's eternal purpose through Christ. Such a church has vision and purpose and inspiration to carry forward the task which has so well begun. Such a church is Scriptural in doctrine, consistent in Christian living, and is a radiating center of light, and all helpfulness. Such a church our Lord loves and owns and honors with his abiding presence.

THE TIME

OFFERING FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS
FIRST SUNDAY IN MARCH

The March offering should receive special attention this year, and an honest effort should be made to make it the largest in our history, for the following reasons:

1. This is the first offering in the Second Century of the history of our people. What we do this year will be recounted by generations yet unborn. Our giving should be on a scale to serve as a worthy example in the next hundred years to come.

2. The victories of the past Centennial year should be to us only a step to higher things. We should not think of receding from any high mark we have made. The churches as churches made the great record of $146,081, a gain of $17,733, or an average per church of $43, and the average increase per church was nearly $6. There was a gain every month of the year, and a gain from every source of receipts except bequests. The gain in five years has been $129,567, or an average annual increase of $25,800. The gains in ten years have been $197,900, or an annual average increase of $19,700. It would be a great misfortune for any church to drop out or drop down this year. Our cry should be for more churches, giving, and for a still larger general offering per church. Our motto should be: An offering from every church, a gift from every member. Thirty-two new Living-links were added to the growing list. Provision was made for the home for the children of missionaries, and a mission boat was built for the Upper Congo.

3. The past year's work on the mission fields should impel us to still better things. There were nearly 1,700 baptisms; sixty-two schools and colleges enjoying an attendance of about 4,200 students; nearly 10,000 were enrolled in the Sunday-schools; about 400 orphans were supported; and 131,170 patients were treated, an average of about 361 per day. Marvelous work, indeed! Time would fail us to tell of the work of the native evangelists, the evangelistic trips of the missionaries, the light scattered by the various printing presses, of the faith and hope that was brought to hearts and lives formally in the midnight darkness of heathenism.

4. It is commonplace to say that we are only playing at missions. This fact should be stamped upon our memories and burned into our very consciences. Only about one-half of our churches give anything. A humiliating fact. Of those that contributed last year, 1,131 churches gave $10 or less, and 614 gave $5 or less. Only about one-fourth of our brotherhood give anything. That is to say, one-half of our churches and three-fourths of our people stand entirely aloof from this world-wide enterprise of evangelizing the world, as enjoined by our risen and reigning Lord. Ought we not to do more?

5. The country is prosperous. This is a strong reason. The financial clouds that hung over the country seem to have passed away. Every department of business is prosperous. The crops have been especially good, and they command excellent prices. Farms are advancing in value, and the cities are growing at a marvelously rapid rate. Peace and plenty are ours. We are the richest nation in the world, and the rapid growth of our wealth is the astonishment of mankind. We can not plead poverty nor hard times. God leaves us entirely without excuse. The Disciples of Christ are a rich people, and are growing in wealth with amazing rapidity.

6. What others are doing and aiming to do should provoke us to larger giving. Thus, during the year 1908 the Presbyterians of the North gave $1,347,265 for Foreign Missions; the Methodist Episcopal Church gave over $2,000,000; the Baptists of the North and the Congregationalists gave about $1,000,000 each; the Seventh Day Adventists gave $4.35 for each member. One religious body aims at an average gift of eight dollars, another of five, and others of four. If we give a penny a week we would give $625,000; if we give a street-car fare a week, $3,125,000. By enlisting a larger number we shall raise our average.

7. It will help to bring a new and larger and deeper spiritual life into your church. In tone and temper, and those fine qualities of the spirit which are the first production of the Christian life, the missionary cause will steadily advance. Here the reflex influence of missions is clearly outlined and deeply engraved. This reason is certainly ground for extraordinary effort.

8. We claim to be a New Testament people. We are. Our final appeal is to this the greatest of all missionary books. We dare not evade or neglect the teaching of the Scriptures upon the question of missions. The duty of sounding out the gospel is as clearly enjoined as baptism or the Lord's Supper. If we speak where the Book speaks, we must enforce the imperative obligation of preaching the gospel to all the world.

For all necessary March Offering supplies, address, F. M. RAINS, SECRETARY, BOX 884, CINCINNATI. OHIO.

sleeping sickness camp. There are no government or philanthropically endowed retreats for the victims of this dread scourge. So we discussed this problem with the native church. A fine house was donated by the widow of one of the deecased elders of the Bolenge church, and the entire church membership went to the place about a mile up river and cleared the ground and prepared the house for occupation, gathering together great piles of fire-wood for the needs of the sick. Eleven have already found shelter and Christian succor in their helplessness. Two of these bid fair to recover. Two have already died and others are in very serious condition. Food and water is carried to them daily by the members of the church. This is a voluntary charity and if you could only understand the conditions and treatment awarded these poor unfortunate before the gospel made brothers of all grades of society and all classes of men, you would agree with us in such a belief of the power of the Gospel that you would wish to make your life count more and more for the extension of that message to the last man on the face of the earth. Join us in this greatest of all works of the church, brethren of the home-land. Have your more personal share make it more real than ever.

You are remembered frequently by the church here as we pray you to remember us and it. Pray for God's presence and Power with us here during the Christmas gatherings.

Yours in His glad service for Africa's redemption. Royal J. Dye, M. D.

News from the Foreign Society

The Central Christian Church, Denver, Colo., has decided to become a Living-link church by making an offering of $600 to the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. H. O. Breeden is the pastor.

The Great Commission is not a suggestion; it is a command. "Go." "Preach the Gospel."

A good friend of the foreign work writes as follows: "Whenever you can find another medical missionary as good as Dr. Dye, write me and I will unbuckle another notch next year and support him too, but do not forget that I want the same sort of a man as Dr. Dye. I want a man that can do things. I would like to hear from you about the boat for the Congo. Has it gone? I fear that my money will all be gone. If it needs much more help it will be bad, for I am very anxious for the boat to get there. Tell me how the matter stands financially." In answer to him and many other friends, will say that there is a lack of about $4,000 on the boat and about $3,000 on the transportation.

Last week the Foreign Society received $5,000 from a friend in California on the Annuity Plan. This is the second gift of $5,000 from this friend on this plan. We rejoice to have this gift. We trust that many others will follow the good example.

Last week the Foreign Society received a gift on the Annuity Plan of $400 from a friend in Kentucky, who has given on this plan before. This aged Disciple is making wise use of his money while time and opportunity are his. The society also received $200 from a friend in Ohio, who had formerly given $500. There is a steady growth in the Annuity Fund.

Part of the "S. S. Oregon" is now on the wharf at New York, ready for shipment to Bolenge, Africa. The whole boat will go out soon. It will probably be on the bosom of the briny deep when these notes are read.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for twenty-eight days of December amounted to $9,324.03, a gain of $2,917.00 over the corresponding time last year. The churches as churches show a gain in their contributions of $344.55. There is a gain of $6,589 shown in the receipts for the first three months of the year. This is a good start on the first year of the new century of our people. Let us keep up a gain every month of the year as we did last year.

A brother in Ohio has recently written his will in which he provides about $10,000 for the Foreign Society. Every Christian man should remember the Lord's work in his last will and testament.

Last year California gave $19,204 through the Foreign Society. The churches as churches gave $7,214, or an average of $76 for each contributing church. The general average for our churches is $43, but California jumps up to $76. That state gave more than twice as much last year as it gave five years ago. The churches as churches gave more than three times as much.

The Work of E. L. Powell

Preacher—"Brother Man"—Organizer

By James Small

It was my privilege lately to help E. L. Powell and the congregation at 4th and Walnut streets, Louisville, Ky., over three Sundays in a revival. The audiences were large from first to last. A. W. Shaffer led the singing. Bro. Powell has been the minister of the congregation for twenty-three years and is unquestionably the leading minister of the city of Louisville. There are a few things in his makeup and life that tend to make him the great power he has been and is.

He is a Christian gentleman. When you have fully emphasized "Christian" then you can turn around and emphasize "gentleman" just as strongly. His manliness is first of all the secret of his power. He is free absolutely from pretense and avarice and phariseeism as a man can well be.

"Brother Man"

He is a "Brother man." This is a significant fact which makes him daily a harbor of rest and good cheer to the fellows who are storm tossed and who have missed the real cue of life. He is among the busiest men on earth. He fulfills the saying of Thomas Babbington McCauley to a nicety: "If you want a thing done, give it to a busy man to do."

A Great Church

He has a great chruch. There is no end of talent in the congregation. The men predominate by long odds, too. Bro. Powell is emphatically a man's preacher. In a large congregation of a Sunday evening there are three men for every woman in the audience. He loves his people and they love him with a devotion that is wonderful. His unselfishness is at once catching and noticeable. He seems to be more conscious of everyone else in his church, and indeed, in Louisville, than he is of himself. In a word, he loves his fellow-men. His power to place individual responsibility on his membership is remarkable. He makes them feel to the very depth of their being the sense of being identified with him in a mighty work, and he is humble enough to make them feel he is a fellow-worker identified with them. You feel that every day E. L. Powell lays upon the altar the tribute of a sanctified manhood, and he is sharing the afflictions that are left behind that the kingdom of God may be built up in the world.

Theatre Meetings

His MacCauley theatre meetings are so well known that the mention of them seems commonplace. The truth is, the MacCauley theater is Bro. Powell's civic throne. From that platform he yields an influence which the mightiest politician in Louisville covets and which is really unknown, I am inclined to believe, in any brotherhood. When a preacher can wield an influence for civic righteousness, and has the ability to make telling addresses on behalf of his city, he ought to do it right along, but if he cannot, he had better stick solely to "Gospel" preaching to do his effective work. Bro. Powell is cherishing the purest ideals and is working hard to realize them. Louisville is to him a city of hope, of labor, of possibilities, of friendships and of genuine Christian worth. He has a number of enterprises in his church. Some of them are not alone for the benefit of his congregation, but for the city. Several years ago the young ladies of the congregation started what they called a "Santa Claus Association," the mention of which shows its object. It soon became such a power that it was turned into a city association, and now all the churches are using it to gladden human hearts at Christmas time. The mention of Bro. Powell as an orator is commonplace, too. One thing may not be known. He preaches the greatest sermons from his own pulpit. He knows how to royally stand by an evangelist. No man on earth ever got better support from a yokefellow than the writer did in his meeting with Bro. Powell. His ringing message over the telephone to my wife, my singer, and to me was: "Now, Small, I want you to live like kings and queens at the Galt House and dress in purple and fine linen when you please—tell us what you want and it will be forthcoming." What a privilege it was to work with such a prince, and with such a set of fine officers in church and Sunday-school, and with such a splendid church!

Rev. E. L. Powell, Beloved Pastor of Louisville.

They will soon begin to build their new $175,000 church. It will be but a few blocks away from the old place. They have half a square of ground and enough for a parsonage, which they will build close by the church. The committee has lately returned from viewing about one hundred churches in and out of our brotherhood, and the church has already settled on a design. The front appearance is to be very much like the old historic church, only the columns will be larger and more numerous. When the church is completed Bro. Powell tells me he will secure an associate minister, who will help him to push the Sunday-school and church work. I helped T. S. Tinsley in a few days' meeting when we were through at the First Church. Bro. Tinsley has a fine church and is beloved by his five hundred people. Louisville made more demands on an evangelist's time for addresses outside of the regular work than any city I was ever in. I found a delightful fellowship among all the churches and institutions in the great city of 260,000. I shall remember kindly my work there and ever pray God's blessing on the work and busy, cheerful and generous workers.

Kansas City, Mo.

As We Go to Press

Zionsville, Ind., Jan. 2.—First week of meeting through holidays and zero weather resulted in thirteen additions. Church does not hold crowd. Benjamin Smith is holding his fourth meeting of four successive years of his ministry here.—The Kendalls.

Little Rock, Ark., Jan. 2.—Dr. Scoville has tried a new experiment here. We adjourned nine days for holiday vacation; came back found full house and great enthusiasm. Fifty-three more added; thirty-four today; 434 in twenty-five days. Our pastors here are loyal yoke-fellows and throughly consecrated to their divine calling. Dr. Scoville was never more powerful.—W. J. Minges.

Lafayette, Ill.—Jan. 2.—Thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. This has been a remarkable meeting in many respects for the evangelist. It has strengthened his faith in God; for with God all things are possible. For Brother Camp and the brethren it has meant, "Never give up, but hold on in Christ's name." God has added to himself, such as shall be saved. The closing days souls were made to confess Christ at every service—all adults but one boy. The evangelist was ably seconded by Miss Elsie Roth, who led the singing onto such a victory. Our party, my daughter, Jean Thompson, Miss Elsie Roth, and myself, go to Keokuk, Iowa, next.—Thompson.

A Word from the Board of Church Extension

Since October 1 the new receipts for Church Extension amount to $17,977.86, a gain of over $5,500 over the same period of 1908. This gain is extremely encouraging. On the basis of this gain in receipts the Board has promised some large loans in prominent cities to new congregations to erect modern church buildings equipped for up-to-date Sunday-school and church work. These new congregations are in Seattle, Wash.; Louis-

A Woman's Experience

A consecrated woman has made gifts to the Foreign Society on the Annuity Plan as follows:

March 12, 1898	$1,000
March 12, 1901	200
January 7, 1905	100
September 10, 1906	500
August 13, 1909	1,000
Total	$2,800

This good woman has no care about the investment of this $2,800. No taxes, no repairs, no insurance, nor other incidental expenses. The money bears 6 per cent interest to her every day. No time is lost by money lying in banks awaiting investment. There is no possible danger of loss. She receives her check every six months without interruption or delay. While she is free of care her income is absolutely certain, and she knows her money is helping on the Lord's work on the mission fields. Of this amount $1,300 is in a mission home in Japan, and $1,500 is in much-needed school buildings. She is perfectly satisfied.

This experience is worthy of your serious thought. If you would like to examine our illustrated booklet, sent free of charge, please address, ville, Ky.; Indianapolis, Ind.; Tulsa, Okla.; Butler, Pa.; Marietta, O., and Portsmouth, O., to save a $30,000 building from sale for liens. We believe the brotherhood will approve this action with still larger gifts. In receipts and promised loans we have made a very creditable beginning for the first year of the New Century.

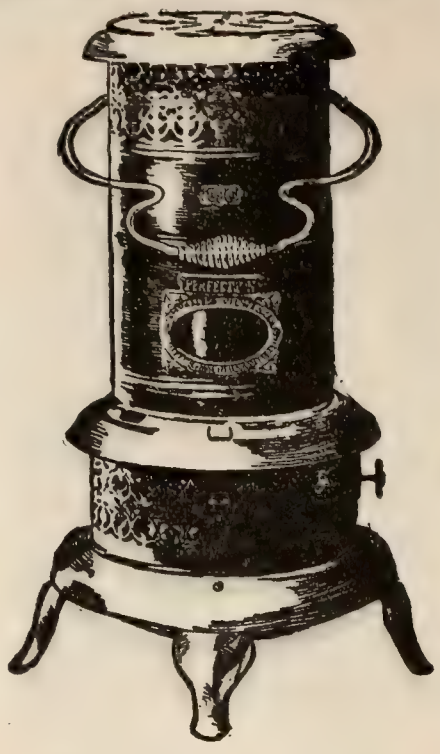
New congregations elsewhere have been promised loans since October 1. It should be noted these loans are promised all over the United States and in towns and cities of varying populations. Here is the list: Princeton, W. Va., $2,500; Arlington, Calif., $2,000; Nevis, Minn., $350; Seattle, Wash., Finley Ave., $600; Indiana, Pa., $4,000; Midway, Ky., $1,500; Waurika, Okla., $600; Lindsay, Calif., $600; Mosier, Ore., $800; St. Elmo, Ill., $1,500; Wister, Okla., $400; Council Grove, Kans., $1,500; Stamford, Tex., $750; Farmville, N. C. $2,500; Howe, Okla., $150; Whiting, Ind., $900; Joliet, Mont., $1,200; Durango, Colo., $1,200; Brunson, S. C., $500; Powell's Point, N. C., $800; Calumet, Okla., $400; Britton, Okla., $800; Wynona, Okla., $400; Hydro, Okla., $500; Sumter, S. C., $2,000; Needles, Calif., $800; Little River, Kans., $1,500; West Liberty, Ky., $1,800; Plainview, Tex., $2,000; Nickerson, Kans., $4,000; Indianapolis, Ind., Columbia Place, $1,200; Corvallis, Ore., $600; Paducah, Ky. (Colored church), $600; Brady, Tex., $800; Stewart, Miss., $300; Aransas Pass, Tex., $500.

This is not all. Before we went to the Centennial your Board of Church Extension promised $185,850 to 107 mission churches that were eager to get their new buildings. These promises varied from $200 grants up to a $10,000 grant and they covered twenty-eight states and territories. The congregations struggling to build in the promising small towns as well as in cities, have alike received the promise of help from this Board which is the servant of the brotherhood. We must pay these loans as buildings are being completed or these congregations will be embarrassed by liens and by failing to keep their promises in paying their bills. We are doing a great and needed work with this fund. If your congregation cannot send what we suggested in our apportionment letter, please raise what you can some Sunday in January and thus have fellowship this year in this work.

New congregations in Spokane, Wash.; Boise, Idaho; Portland, Ore.; Los Angeles, Calif.; Akron, O.; Artesia, N. M.; Dallas, Tex.; Sumter, S. C.; Minneapolis, Minn.; Everett, Wash.; Columbus, O.; Oakland, Calif., and Winnipeg, Manitoba, are looking to the Board of Church Extension for large loans to build up-to-date, well-equipped plants this year. Others will be coming for aid. These cannot build without loans from this Board. Shall we hesitate, or shall we buy up the opportunities now?

The Church Extension Society has some ambitions for 1910, the first year of the New Century. The Board asks for $100,000 of new receipts to add to its permanent fund of $757,621.39 which was reported at Pittsburg. The demands would compel the Board to ask for more, but reason tells us we could not count on more. Our people are not easily roused or excited. If we get $100,000 of new receipts this first year of the New Century we must make a gain over our Centennial Year, which showed new receipts to Church Extension of $71,676.19. That was a gain of $20,182.84 over 1908. We made no great gains in any department of work in our Centennial Year, and we should have no great falling off in receipts this first year of the New Century. There is room for growth.



The great cities of America are calling for heroic work. Our Board has been keeping in touch with our brethren in the cities. The one word given out by all of them is that getting proper equipment for church and Sunday-school work is the great problem and that large loans from the Church Extension Fund are imperative. Let us set our goals and reach them. We must have increased receipts in order to make large loans in the cities which are now demanding our attention and best effort. Shall we do a worthy work this year not only in cities but in rapidly growing new towns? We can and we shall.

Smokeless

Until science discovered a way to construct the Automatic Smokeless Device, and make it completely dependable, all oil heaters had one common great fault—smoke.

With the advent of the Automatic Smokeless Device, and its practical application to the PERFECTION Oil Heater

(Equipped with Smokeless Device)

the smoke problem was successfully solved.

The Perfection Oil Heater is the only heater equipped with this which insures a steady, full-glowing heat, with the wick turned up as high as it will go, without a shred of smoke. Reverse the motion, turn the wick down—there's no odor.

The smokeless device automatically locks and prevents the upward movement of the wick beyond the proper exposure. That is the secret. This splendid result gives leadership to the Perfection.

You may now have all the heat you want—when you want it—and where you want it—without the annoyance of smoke or odor.

Brass font holds 4 quarts of oil, which permits a glowing heat for 9 hours. Brass wick tube—damper top—cool handle. Cleaned in a minute. The Perfection is beautifully finished in Nickel or Japan.

Working at the Baptism Problem

A Typical Chance for Christian Love to Triumph

CAN THE BAPTISMAL DEADLOCK BE BROKEN?

That the hoary controversy between those who for baptism practice immersion only, and those who practice sprinkling, pouring or immersion according to the option of the candidate, has long since come to a deadlock ought to be evident to every observer with an eye for facts.

There are no convincing sings that indicate a decisive gain or loss by either side of the controversy. There is no startling exodus from affusionist to immersionist churches, nor vice versa. Between the two sections there is about an even exchange.

The remarkable growth of Baptists and Disciples is matched by the growth of Methodists, Presbyterians and Episcopalians.

Manifestly if after two centuries of controversy the dogma of immersion is still in dispute the consummation of Christian union is a long time off unless some other solution can be discovered outside the realm of dogma.

What is the controversy all about? There may be some of our readers who would wish a succinct setting forth of the position held by each side. Let us consider first the immersionist position.

1. The Greek word, baptizo, always means to immerse, or its equivalent.

2. The church in Apostolic days practiced immersion only.

3. All the allusions to baptism in the New Testament point to its being performed by immersion.

4. Jesus was Himself immersed.

5. Jesus commanded His disciples to baptize all nations, i. e., to immerse them according to the definition above given.

The optionist argument is not so easy to state.

1. The informed optionist agrees with the immersionist as to the meaning of baptizo, the apostolic precedent, the New Testament allusions and the immersion of Jesus.

2. He denies, however, that apostolic precedent binds this particular practice upon the church for all time.

3. He denies that Jesus commanded immersion, as such. He does not believe that a particular form of initiation into the church was consciously in Christ's mind when He announced His great commission. The optionist owns the supreme authority of Christ with no whit less of fealty than does the immersionist. But he contends that baptism means more than immersion, just as marriage means more than the ceremony and as being sworn means more than raising the right hand. It was the spiritual meaning of the baptismal act, he says, that Jesus had in mind and not the particular form by which it was signalized.

And this mode of reasoning throws the door open for the church to provide alternative forms of initiation, leaving to the individual the privilege of choosing for himself. As one of the alternative forms the optionist churches always include immersion in water.

So, in brief, run the arguments of the immersionist and the optionist sections of the church.

What attitude, now, shall a body of Christians who have set themselves to bring about the unification of these two sections of the church take toward this baptismal deadlock?

Manifestly its influence for unity will not carry, for if it simply says: "We will search the Scriptures to find which side to this controversy is right." For both sides of the controversy, have been searching the Scriptures on this subject for generations, and they have come to a deadlock in their understanding of what the Scriptures mean. If now this body of peacemakers decide that either optionist is right, or immersionist is right and thereupon conceive their mission as one of proselytism from the side which they have decided is wrong, they become just another sect, another party in the strife over dogma and leave the problem of unity unsolved and, indeed, untouched.

But if this body of Christians starts not to act as a peacemaker among estranged brethren, a healer of the wounds of schism, they will seek for a higher ground of unity than the dogmatic level on which the disputants now stand.

Dogma is the cause of the division on the baptism question. Dogma never will provide the solution. To continue the baptismal argument is futile. To allow a mere form to stand in the way of the union of God's people is sinful.

A problem of Christian statesmanship today is to inquire if there is not some point at which a moral appeal, a plea weighted with the urgency of Christian love, may be lodged in such fashion as to make somebody morally responsible for the further continuance of this obstacle to union.

We believe there is real moral responsibility. We believe the ethics of the New Testament could have no more typical application than in the solving of the baptismal controversy as a means to Christian union.

Where does this moral responsibility lie?

Our answer is that it lies on the consciences of those Christian people who practice sprinkling and pouring in addition to immersion for baptism.

Let us see why the optionist side to this controversy can truthfully be said to be morally responsible for its continuance as an inhibition to Christian union.

The form of baptism is a matter of conscience to the immersionist. He insists on immersion for himself because he believes the Scriptures and his Master's demand it. He insists upon it for his church for the same reason. He believes that for him to accept any other administration for himself or to sanction its performance by the church in any other manner would be disloyalty to Christ and the Bible.

The form of baptism is not a matter of conscience to the optionist. It is a matter of indifference, he believes, to Christ, and, therefore, to himself. Immersion has, to his mind, the same validity as sprinkling, and if he is a minister he willingly practices immersion where it is requested.

But it has not yet occurred to him that he is using his liberty as an occasion of stumbling, that in the exercise of his right to eat or not to eat he is perpetuating a division in Christ's church for which he is morally responsible.

This is the response we make to our correspondent, "A Friendly Outsider," who takes us to task for making ourselves the keepers of others' consciences. "Have they any more right to respect your conscience than you have to respect their's?" he asks and then adds, "I can imagine the fine scorn with which such a man as Paul would treat a position like that."

Nothing more appropriate could be done than to bring Paul into the baptismal controversy. Let us assume that if Paul were here he would take the optionist side and say of baptism as he did of meats and circurcision that it was a matter of indifference.

Would Paul stop there? Would he go on stubbornly claiming his rights? Surely not, if he were the same Paul who wrote to the Corinthians.

He would ask what is this liberty of yours costing the church?

And when he was told that it was one of the prime factors in separating Christ's followers into sects, he would likely inquire if there was any good reason why immersion should not be practiced, if anything vital or important would be lost by practicing immersion. And he would have to be told that there really was nothing involved at all, that they all already practiced immersion frequently.

What would be Paul's counsel? Clearly if the ethics we teach the children in the Sunday School on temperance days is sound Paul's counsel on this problem is not left in doubt.

As a people the Disciples of Christ have talked much about Our Plea. All the time what we meant was Our Argument.

We have never made our plea to the conscience that is morally responsible for this divisive factor in the church. We have made our argument in season and out of season.

After all the years of controversy why not try pleading with those to whom the baptismal form is a matter of liberty, to consider the welfare of Christ's Kingdom above the assertion of their abstract rights?

This is the real business of a Christian union movement.

And it is only the engagement in such a business as this . . . will save us from becoming a sect harder and more selfish than the rest.

Editorial Survey

Mrs. Sage's Great Gift

In this age of great gifts none have been wiser than that of Mrs. Russell Sage in creating the Russell Sage Foundation. John D. Rockefeller says it is quite as difficult to give millions as to make them. It doubtless is a more perplexing task if the donor is anxious that his dollars shall do good only and help only where help is needed. The gift of millions must be philanthropic rather than charitable if such a distinction can be drawn, i. e., it must have the largeness of statesmanship in it and take on institutional features rather than be almsgiving or the individual ministration to personal needs directly.

The Sage Foundation is an endowment "for the improvement of social and living conditions." It might be supposed it was a great charity for the building of model villages or tenements, but it designs rather to find the causes of poor social and living conditions and stimulate larger efforts to eradicate them. To this end it employs experts and conducts investigations, makes grants to societies that have relief in hand, and seeks to educate the public in regard to prevention and cure of all kinds of social maladies.

Three of the most widely spread charities it expressly does not attempt, viz.: relief of individual need, higher education, and the work of churches. Just because these are the conventional and best remembered of great human causes, the Sage Foundation chooses to leave them to the attention of the interested while it seeks to find the more needy, because less remembered fields and to develop new and needed forms of philanthropy.

Among the causes it has promoted by the contribution of funds and expert workers are those of the care of children, the extension of the playground movement in the cities, the prevention of tuberculosis, establishing school-gardens, the prevention of blindness, and the extension of charity organization in the cities. It called Hastings H. Hart to the children's work, Luther Gulick to that of playgrounds, Francis McLean and Miss Richmond to that of charity organization. Each of these were the first in the special lines of work to which they were called. The Foundation thus seeks to put the social expert on the task and make efficiency the watchword.

In the matter of investigation it has made exhaustive reports on workingman's insurance, the evils of the salary loan business, the desirability of establishing employment bureaus, the problem of the retarded child in the public schools, methods of emergency relief in case of great catastrophies (such as the San Francisco earthquake), and greatest of all, it took up a social survey of the city of Pittsburg which was first undertaken by the magazine, Charities and the Commons (now The Survey), and developed it until it assumed such proportions as to make it the most pretentious piece of social investigation that has ever been conducted in America, and second only to the great work of Chas. Booth on the Life and Labors of the People of East London. This Pittsburg Survey has become the forerunner of such investigations in many places and a type of intelligence regarding city conditions that will awaken the whole country as it has awakened Pittsburg. A masterly study of the standard of living among workingmen's families in New York has been issued also.

Among other things done it has secured the appointment of a working head of the Red Cross in the person of Ernest Bicknell, one of the most efficient charity organization workers living, borne the expenses of such conferences as that on child saving and aided many efforts designed to educate the people in matters relating to their own welfare.

It is in a true sense a Foundation. It is able to investigate and then educate the public on its discoveries. It may found new institutions to meet unsupplied needs or help those already founded but which have not yet become well enough known to stimulate public benefaction. It saves much charity by teaching the public the means of prevention and interesting the public in helping good causes as they come, as e. g., in the case of the war on tuberculosis. It aided greatly the campaign to get states, counties, and municipalities aroused until they have voted millions to eradicate and prevent the terrible plague, while it was at the same time spreading leaves and pamphlets and in other ways educating the public to avoid the disease.

Its latest undertaking is that of working out a type of model dwelling for the workingman in the cities. It is thus adaptable to every need that arises, and will be able through the changing conditions of the years to meet the new needs that arise.

The Great Gifts of a Year

The great individual gifts of the past year surpass all previous years with the exception of the one in which Mr. Rockefeller gave $32,000,000 at once to his General Education Board. Rockefeller's total gifts for the year amount to $12,130,500. Those of Andrew Carnegie were $4,652,250, a much smaller amount than he usually disposes of in a twelve month. Mr. Carnegie is past seventy and did not nearly spend his income last year. He will surely die disgracefully rich. He has about exhausted the library possibilities and that of church organs does not take large sums, as he measures sums of money. He is possibly perplexed to know what to give to that will not be specifically religious and that is not already being cared for by the state, the church, or the public in adequate manner. If he were more convinced of the good in organized christianity he would find worlds of room for his philanthropy. Mrs. Sage's gifts for the year amount to $1,201,761, and D. K. Pearson distributed $541,000 to colleges, Y. M. C. A.'s and City Missions. Other great givers who are less known for their philanthropic spirit were in part: L. A. Hinsheimer of New York, $1,000,000 to charity; Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, $1,000,000 to build tenements for tubercular families; Henry Phipps, $1,000,000 to John Hopkins University; Simon Weinstein of New York to education and charity, $1,200,000; Chas. E. Ellis, of Philadelphia, $2,500,000 for a home for fatherless girls; Elizabeth Bingham, of Boston, $2,500,000 for a hospital; Jno. C. Archbold, $1,000,000 to Syracuse University; Henry Frick, $2,000,000 for a public park in Pittsburg; W. R. Moore, of Memphis, $1,000,000 for education; Theo. Harris, of Louisville, to church, $1,000,000; Chas. McKim, of New York, to American Academy at Rome, $1,000,000; Edw. Ginn, of Boston, to cause of universal peace, $1,000,000; Mitchell Valentine, of Westchester, N. Y., to charity, $1,000,000; Caroline Stokes, of New York, to charity and education, $3,050,000; F. B. Colton, Brookline, Mass., to college for girls, $1,000,000; Jno. F. Baker, of New York, for convalescents' home, $4,000,000; George Crocker, of New York, for investigating cancer, $1,500,000; Amherst Wilder, of St. Paul, $2,200,000 to charity; Chas. Crittendon, $2,000,000 to rescue homes; W. G. Park, of Pittsburg, to charity, $1,000,000; J. A. Burnett, of McAlester, Okla., to church, $1,000,000. Teachers' College, of New York, received a million from an unnamed donor, and charity in that city received a like sum in the same way.

There are fifty-nine gifts of $500,000 or more recorded, and two hundred and eighteen of $100,000 or more. There are doubtless a great host of smaller bequests and gifts amounting to some thousands apiece which have not been noted, and these accounts do not take note at all of the millions of subscriptions to church and mission work and of all forms of charity, reaching from the great cities to the remotest country places. These are simply the large individual gifts. It represents but a part of the benevolence in this most benevolent of all ages.

The most notable giving of the year was that of Jno. S. Kennedy, who disposed of $32,000,000 in his will. His was not only notable giving, but it was notable in the fact that so large a part of it, over $20,000,000, went to church, church schools, and missions. Mr. Kennedy was a large giver to charity in his home city of New York, but he was not obsessed of the provincial idea that charity both begins and ends at home, for he spread his benefactions round the world in his recognition of the world-wide claim of humanity on the best that civilization offers, by making the largest single gift ever received in the United States for foreign missions.

Edw. Ginn's gift to the cause of universal peace was one of the innovations, but is a cause which will demand wider recognition from philanthropists from now on until wars shall cease to be. George Crocker's bequest of $1,500,000 to a cancer research fund is notable among the increasing great endowments of science for the sake of humanity. The tuberculosis crusade received large sums, most notable of which was Nathan Strauss's half-million. John D. Rockefeller's million for the war on the hook worm was one of the most startling and original benefactions of the year. The Y. M. C. A. received $2,500,000 of the amount here recorded, but this includes none of the vast amounts given for its maintenance. Schools for the colored people in the South were often remembered, but with smaller sums for the most part. The small colleges also were made the recipients of a large sum in the aggregate, and Christian missions very generously remembered.

Some Things Tom Johnson Has Done

The country at large knows of Tom Johnson through his contest for three-cent fares. He was defeated in the last election, but has largely won his battle. The settlement gives seven tickets for a quarter, or 3½ cent fares, with a cash fare of 4 cents and a one-cent charge for transfers, as the maximum fare allowed under any circumstances. But the actual fare now is to be three cents, with a penny extra for transfers. If this does not give a 6 per cent profit to the company, the increased fare may be inaugurated. At no time is the company to make a larger profit than 6 per cent, and the city is to have complete supervisory charge of operation of cars, with the privilege of purchase at the end of eight years. The arbitrated valuation is a little less than $23,000,000, which is a million less than the compromise offered by the mayor last year. The agreement is embodied in an ordinance giving the company a twenty-five year franchise and will be submitted to a public referendum.

But this is not what made Cleveland notable as the "best governed city in the world." Here are some of the things Tom Johnson did that earned for it that very enviable reputation:

Abolished old water intake and erected one five miles out in lake, at same time changed discharge of sewage, putting it so far down the lake that it cannot contaminate the water of the city.

Established meat and dairy inspection, abolished tuberculosis milk.

More than doubled the amount of street paving and almost doubled the mileage of sidewalks. From one of the dirtiest, made Cleveland one of the cleanest cities, relieving property owners in business section from necessity of cleaning through private funds and established the water cleaning system for pavement.

Installed high-pressure water system for business section, and thus lowered insurance rates.

Reduced the cost of street lights from $87.60 to $54.96, of gas lamps from $22.00 to $12.86, and put Welsbach burners on where there had been only open burners, of gas from $1.00 per thousand feet to 75 cents for manufactured and 30 cents for natural gas.

Consolidated departments for inspection of smoke, electricity, plumbing, and streets with the building department and created a building code that has been copied in many cities, including London, England.

Inaugurated civil service in water and health departments, though not required by law, and abolished small-pox; erected comfort stations in the down-town districts, play-grounds in the congested centers, public bath-houses on the lake front; established a regular visitation of physicians to the schools to watch for preventible diseases, also a system of ash and garbage collection, a system for governing traffic by police that is called model; more than doubled the number of street lights, and gave the parks to public occupancy by tearing down off-the-grass signs and inaugurating sports and out-door recreation that invite all to come.

Abolished the contract system of public work—the most fruitful source of graft in municipal life—just as far as it was possible, and substituted direct labor, thus greatly reducing cost; established a purchasing department with a system that makes honesty almost obligatory; reduced the bills of 90 per cent of the water users by putting in meters, while those of 10 per cent were increased, saving the common citizens of the city thus $1,000,000.

Made the department of weights and measures effective until it is demonstrable that the people are saved $1,000,000 annually by being assured honest weight and measure; saved $20,000,000 worth of lake front or submerged land to the city (if the decision secured is upheld), and reduced the cost of garbage collection and destruction from $3.24 to $1.69 per ton.

Gambling has been suppressed, the park area greatly enlarged, a city forestry department established, the police and fire departments removed from politics and each put under one responsible head, the river straightened and thus a large area opened to factories.

The one single grade crossing that had been abolished has been increased to twenty-five, the railroads have been defeated in an effort to obtain a $3,000,000 plot of ground for a depot free of charge and compelled to negotiate with the city.

The most remarkable work of all, perhaps, is that of the Warrensville farms, the Golden Rule in the police department, and the school for street children. These will be noted at some other time.

With it all, not even Johnson's bitterest enemy can charge graft anywhere. The debt of the city has increased $14,000,000, while its assets have increased $36,000,000, and the per capita indebtedness is today among the lowest in the country, being but $54.00, as against Cincinnati's $136.00.

The worst charge brought, that can obtain recognition, is that to forward his plans the mayor did not hesitate to use the entire city force of employes as a sort of reformers' machine, not as the machine politician would use it, by means of graft and maladministration, but as an effective organization, each man working in his place and with his fellows for the cause. In the eight years that Tom Johnson has been mayor of Cleveland, he has made himself a world-wide reputation, a unique place in the municipal world, and become the municipal prophet for the new order of things in city administration.

Where Labor Lost and Won

The switchmen of the railroads centering at the twin cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul have practically lost a strike that they might have won. Their cause was just, according to the opinion of well-informed men, including the mayor of Minneapolis. The governor of Minnesota took a keen interest in their cause and forwarded arbitration. But, thinking the winter months and the general unrest among railroad employes would give them the force, they refused arbitration at first and later refused an otherwise satisfactory adjustment unless the roads would take back all who had quit work. Labor cannot afford to refuse arbitration. It wins its just contentions by the utmost publicity and the ways of peace that appeal to public sympathy. It puts itself on a par with the arrogance it denounces in the corporations that proclaim they have nothing to arbitrate when they seek to use an apparent advantage in the same ruthless manner.

A Battle of Giants

The American Federation of Labor has declared war on the Steel Trust. It will be a battle of giants. Labor may be defeated for a time by the sheer power of great material organization bent upon corporate ends, but labor must triumph in the end because public sentiment will decide the matter and public sentiment is fast coalescing in favor of organized labor. The average man believes in co-operation and sees the utter hopelessness of labor aside from organized co-operation. The trust, on the other hand, is not in high public repute, and the old idea that an employer could hire whom he pleased at whatever wage he was able to bargain for does not apply to the new corporate and highly organized way of doing business. In other words, capital cannot combine into corporations and refuse to recognize the right of labor to combine into unions. Massed capital cannot hope to be long able to deal with labor unmassed. Capital has no more right to say to labor: We will not recognize you in a corporate capacity, than labor would have to say to capital: We will not work for you when you corporate. Labor would be quite as well justified in declaring war on all combinations of individual capital as corporations have to declare war on labor unions.

The Pittsburg Survey revealed the labor conditions of the steel and coke district. They are bad beyond the worst any one has suspicioned. The Steel Trust pays notoriously low wages to all but its highly skilled labor. It is for the "open shop" and the individual contract with labor. Yet it is the greatest combination known to industrial history. It is seeking to establish absolute independence of organized labor from the mine to the finished product. Organized labor sees in its success not only defeat in the steel industry, but a defeat that will weaken it in all industry and threaten to either crush effective labor organization altogether, or to so cripple it that all the trusts and great corporations will be absolutely independent of and defiant toward it. The Federation will try to raise a fund of $1,000,000 to begin the contest.

Purpose of "The Daily Altar"

We hope our readers are devoting a suitable amount of time and attention to our new department, "The Daily Altar." We have not opened that section of the paper as a mere ornament. It would be very easy to devote the space to other matter of value. More than this, its preparation is a work of care, requiring no little thought and time. It would be easy to gather a set of quotations from the Bible and the poets, after the fashion of many such anthologies in the daily and weekly press. But in such scrappings there would be lacking the unity, directness and value which we have sought to embody in these daily aids to devotion. If a reasonable proportion of our readers avail themselves of the help furnished in this manner, the department will more than justify itself. But this can only occur through the practice of having a fixed time for personal or family worship. We have aimed particularly at the encouragement of the latter, knowing that many families would be glad to devote a few minutes a day regularly to this custom if they knew just how to go about it. Our plan makes this very easy. Any member of the group can read the brief portion set down for the day. This practice should be begun at once, even if some days have already gone by since the series began. We shall be glad to have reports and suggestions from any of our readers regarding the value of the department, or its improvement.

Professor Fisher's Passing

The death of Professor George P. Fisher of Yale University removes one of the notable figures in American theological education. Although not actually engaged in teaching for the past few years, and of late much weakened in mind and body, Dr. Fisher has kept an abiding place in the affection of a large circle of students as well as of that wider group who secured their best helps on American church history from his various text books. Dr. Fisher was always an interesting lecturer. His scholarship was not profound, and his temper was not of the smoothest, as his students had many opportunities of knowing, but his kindness was unfailing, and those whom he took to his heart in the intimacies of his home life had occasion to remember him always with gratitude.

The Next Congress

We made announcement some weeks ago of the next meeting of the Congress of the Disciples. Secretary Van Arsdall explains the partial arrangement entered into with the Baptists at the time of our joint Congress in this city last year. We very much hope that plans will be made for such a joint congress each alternate year, leaving both Baptists and Disciples free to carry out their own individual plans on the intermediate years. It is not too early to begin preparing for the Congress at Bloomington, Indiana, in the spring. The date has not yet been set, but of course it will be arranged so as not to conflict with other important spring meetings. The value of the Congress has been proved beyond all question by its past results.

Eusapia Paladino

We took occasion some weeks ago to mention the Italian spiritist, Eusapia Paladino, who at that time was sitting in this country at the special request of the members of the Society of Psychical Research. The results of her seances seem to have been but little satisfactory to those who were hoping for further light upon the phenomena of spiritism. The testimony of those who witnessed her performances was that they were of a very ordinary type, easily explicable either as tricks or the work of a fairly sensitive psychic. Some months ago President G. Stanley Hall asserted that the trivial and frivolous character of the manifestations of most mediums seems to be a revelation of the nether side—the night side of human nature, rather than of its higher attributes. And Professor Huxley is on record in the words, "The only good that I can see in a demonstration of the truth of spiritism is to furnish an additional argument against suicide. Better live a crossing sweep than die and be made to talk 'twaddle' by a medium hired at a guinea a seance." Dr. Quackenbos in his report of Madame Paladino's New York searces asserts his belief in the genuineness of the phenomena, but adds, "I have never heard a spiritualistic medium say anything that was not readily comprehensible on the theory of thought transference. At the present stage of investigation there exists no convincing evidence that the spirits of the dead are concerned in seance phenomena, or that telepathic communication with the dead is possible."

"What Shall the Preacher Preach?"

In another column will be found a communication from F. B. Thomas with the above title. It is a serious inquiry as to what was the precise meaning of the letter we printed editorially in our issue of December 26, under the title "Does the Preacher Know?"

We could easily conceive of a preacher asking the question which Mr. Thomas has asked, with the feeling that the all-sufficient answer would be, The Gospel, of course. It is probably true that every preacher believes himself to be a messenger of the good tidings of Jesus to the world. And it may even be said with confidence that every conscientious minister believes himself to be preaching the Gospel as Jesus would have him preach it in this generation.

Yet it is perfectly clear that many ministers who are convinced that they fully understand the message of the Cross are preaching it in such a manner that it neither strengthens nor inspires their people. How shall they correct this mistake? We understand Mr. Thomas to have asked this question in all good faith, with the serious purpose of having light thrown upon it if such a thing is possible.

We should like to begin the answer by saying that we have no theory that men should preach the so-called modern views of the world or the Bible or of education. It is perfectly true that our modern world is living in the atmosphere of evolutionary thinking, of critical investigation of the Scriptures, and of awareness regarding the new studies of the mind which fall generally under the name of the new psychology. Yet we make no insistence that a minister shall preach evolution, biblical criticism nor any modern theory of mind or of education. We believe that he will be immensely helped by the possession of these aids to a timely knowledge of the age in which he lives. We cannot quite see how a minister will perform his full duty to a generation that is thinking in terms of these modern systems of knowledge while he is discussing and interpreting these movements of thought without having sympathetic knowledge of their current and goal. And yet it is not of these things that we are thinking when we speak of adjusting the preacher's message to the present time.

But the Gospel has to be interpreted in terms of the world's need if the preacher is to be effective. Nothing is more pathetic than to hear preachers talk about "saving souls," without appearing to possess any adequate idea of what is meant either by souls or salvation. If the message of the Cross means anything to this generation, it must mean that men and women are to be brought into terms of friendship to God and to each other by the application of the principles which Jesus taught. Conversion is no miraculous revolution of character. It is the intelligent appreciation of the fact that the life that Jesus lived in the world is one which is not only imitable in its essential values, but immensely worth while. That its significance for the making of character lies not in any abnormal or miraculous features it possesses, but rather in its perfect adjustment to the divine life and of human experience.

As long as the Bible is conceived as a supernatural book, relating narratives regarding men whose lives were wholly removed from the common experiences of the world, so long it will fail to have value for every-day living. The moment it is understood to be a book disclosing certain characters which have value for all generations just in proportion to their perception of the nature and purpose of God and their passion to express the ideals of God in their own life, that moment it becomes a vital, inspiring and convincing document for all men.

As long as the church is understood to be a divinely organized institution to whose founding Jesus gave his attention, so long will it appear to most men to be a mere ecclesiastical ark of safety, assuming to be the only place where men can find refuge from the wrath to come. But the moment it is understood to be the free association of men and women who have caught something of the spirit of Jesus and wish to associate themselves with each other and with him to promote his views of life, and to make men everywhere understand God as he understood Him, that moment the church assumes a new dignity and power in the minds of men.

Similarly, salvation is not the act of getting men and women into the church. That is the very smallest part of it. Many who are so brought in are far from being saved. And some are actually hindered from salvation by coming into the church, precisely because they are given a totally wrong conception of the greatness and all-embracing nature of salvation as conceived in the New Testament.

The minister who is willing to pay the price of finding out what to preach by the study not of texts but of contexts, by emphasis not upon verbal forms but upon the essential message of Jesus' life, by attention not to superficials but to the realities that ordinary men and women are so quick to understand and rate at their true value, is the man who will never fail to preach a living and effective message.

He will see that the business of Christianity is to inspire people with the passion for right living through their perception of friendship for God and for one another. He will aim at the transformation of individual character not so much by securing the acceptance of doctrines or the observance of ordinances, but by filling the heart with the ideals of Jesus for purity, humility, sincerity and good will. He will see that the gospel applies to domestic life in sweetening the relations of the members of the family to each other, in giving parents fresh courage and consecration in the training of their children to right ideals of living, and to some just recognition of the privilege and beauty of family religion.

Such a preacher will make it clear to the business men of his congregation that the ethics of Jesus fairly applied, make impossible dishonesty, misrepresentation of facts, and the disposition to get the better of others in trade. He will make it clear to such as are engaged in industry that it is the business of the employer to see that the people who work for him are paid a just and living wage, are protected from the fatal results of carelessness in the handling of machinery or from the results of inadequate attention to provisions for their safety, that the hours of work must not be excessive, especially where women are employed, and that childhood must be safeguarded in its inalienable right to freedom from factory and mine labor, and to the privileges of education and proper play.

The preacher who is rendering adequate service to his people will take an intelligent interest in the problems of the working people, not as a mere exploiter of social theories, but as a genuine and sympathetic man, entering as fully as he is able into the actual human experiences of the men and women whose toil makes possible the conveniences and luxuries with which the age abounds.

He will be sensitive to the questions of civic righteousness, municipal purity, the suppression of the drink traffic, gambling, impurity and vicious literature. He will be a guide to his people in matters pertaining to public education, both of childhood and of maturer years. He will interest himself in every institution that makes for the moral and physical uplift of his town or city. And he will see that in the proper exercise of these very functions of leadership and guidance, he has the power to interpret the life of Jesus Christ to the men and women who wait upon his ministry, or who are a part of that outside group on whom the man of insight and of power is constantly exerting an influence.

If any minister of the Gospel is pursuing these methods of bringing the message of the Cross to his fellow men, we are very certain that he is little likely to fall under the reproach of preaching an outworn and ineffective message. If, on the other hand, any minister is tempted to say that these things we have been enumerating are not the Gospel at all, but only side issues, with which the preacher has no business to concern himself, we have no hesitance in saying that that preacher's conception of the Gospel is fatally defective, and that he will never be able to render to his people the service which they have a right to expect.

The preacher that this generation demands is not the man of towering intellect, of colossal information, of oratorical gifts, or of pleasing social manners. These all have their value, no doubt, but they are not the essential things. The minister for the age is the man who has seen the vision of God, has felt the power of Christ to transform his own life from selfishness to service, has a sympathetic and intelligent appreciation of the struggles through which his fellow men are passing, and is attempting to bring to them the same great values and virtues which he seeks for his own life. In other words, he is the man who is taking the life of Christ seriously as both an ideal and a motive, who believes that it is realizable for himself and for all men who are willing to pay the price of friendship with the Lord. Such a man will not lack a vital message for his people.

The Brotherhood and Ministerial Supply

The Brotherhood officers are giving us a splendid illustration of their conception of the service their organization can render the kingdom of God. Secretary Macfarlane has sent literature to many pastors asking them to set apart the third Sunday in January, commonly known as Education day, for the purpose of instructing and quickening the hearts of the people in the vital matter of ministerial supply. It is a notorious fact that the ministry is at a discount in the minds of young men about to choose a life-calling. Among the Disciples the inadequacy of the less than five thousand settled ministers to maintain and develop nearly twice that many congregations amounts virtually to a scandal. No more pressing need is upon us today than to turn the tide of disfavor toward the ministry into one of enthusiasm for it. Every church should have young men of evident gifts in training for the holy ministry. And the logical and most effectual agency to make a favorable sentiment toward this high calling is the Brotherhood. Let the boys of the church hear the men discussing this subject and calling for volunteers and there will be hundreds of these youths who will say, Here am I, send me! There is, to our mind, a singular appropriateness in Mr. Macfarlane's call for the Brotherhoods of all our churches to hold a volunteer service on Sunday night following the pastor's sermon of the morning, or on a week night preceding the pastor's message. Get the men behind the big problem of the church's leadership and the few mothers who yet pray for their sons to become ministers will become a great host. Moreover, nothing can better commend the Brotherhood idea to the churches than just this kind of practical and vigorous grappling with the essential problems of the kingdom.

How May I Know a Christian?

It is a common opinion that the present age cares nothing for forms. This opinion has little to support it. Many a man who imagines that he is perfectly indifferent to forms is never happier than when he goes into his lodge room, arrays himself in gorgeous robes that would delight a barbarian noble, and follows to the letter a ritual more elaborate than that of any church he ever entered. What the man means when he preaches against forms is that he does not like some forms. Others he likes very much. In his zeal against what he rejects he forgets what he accepts. What is true of the lodge man is true of all men. There are forms which represent for us all that is best and noblest in life.

In a lecture on poetry, F. W. Robertson brings out the fact that it is imagination that gives value to our symbols. "The truth is that here, as elsewhere, poetry has reached the truth, while science and common sense have missed it. Why is it that on the battle-field there is ever one spot where the sabres glitter faster, and the pistol's flash is more frequent, and men and officers crowd together in denser masses? They are struggling for a flag, or an eagle, or a standard. Strip it of its symbolism—take from it the meaning with which imagination has invested it, and it is nothing but a bit of silk rag, torn with shot and blackened with powder. Now go with your common sense and tell the soldier he is madly striving about a bit of rag. See if your common sense is as true to him as his poetry, or able to quench it for a moment."

It is said that the average man is indifferent to the forms of the church or even hostile to them. How far this indifference and hostility extend it is impossible to state. Of their existence there can be no doubt. And there can be no doubt as to one reason for their existence. By some teachers of religion the ordinances of the church have been made to possess magical power. Science has brought into discredit the art of the magician. Those who have been wrongly instructed concerning the ordinances have no use for them the moment they reject the magician's view of man and nature. A reaction in favor of the forms that express the fundamental truths of our religion awaits its proper instruction concerning these forms. We must teach the Christian view of them. Magic belongs to heathenism.

The Creed

A believer in Jesus as the Messiah and the Son of God does not think of the confession as a form. It is natural for him to announce his belief. But the church calls upon him to express it publicly and in a particular way. He may doubt the propriety of this requirement. He has his own way of letting the world know what he believes. Why should he be bound by the custom of the church? On reflection, however, he will probably conclude that there is reason back of the church custom. It is a basis of coöperation. It is democratic. All who enter the church submit to the same test. This confession has been on the lips of saints of all ages. If it is made from the heart, it may rightly be regarded as marking an epoch in the life.

The Initial Rite

In baptism faith in Christ is symbolized. Baptism is a dedication of the life to the service of Christ. It is an announcement that the one who submits to it is ready to be taught his whole duty to God and to man. The view that makes it a stopping place is an inheritance from paganism. He who thinks he is saved because he has gone through the forms of being baptized but is not manifesting the fruits of the spirit, love, joy, peace, long-suffering, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, and self-control, is deceiving himself. He is a pagan; he has gone through with a magical rite; he has not had Christian baptism administered to him.

The Standard of Life

In Rom. 6:17, Paul refers to the standard of life accepted by the Christian. On this verse Sanday says: "To suppose, as some leading continental scholars have done, that some special 'type of doctrine,' whether Jewish-Christian or Pauline, is meant, is to look with the eyes of the nineteenth century and not with those of the first." We accept an outline of life which we expect to fill in. While there is liberty in Christ, still there is a sort of character common to all Christians. This is the standard of life, the form, which we accept for ourselves on becoming Christians.

Where Two or Three Are Gathered

The Charm and Value of Christian Companionship

By Rev. George L. Parker, in the Congregationalist

"What was the use, Aunt Mary, of those old-fashioned prayer-meetings?"

I asked the question as Mrs. Murphy asked Mrs. McGinnis, "how she was today," more to make conversation than to study the decline and fall of a religious institution. I suppose that I am one of those who have the modern spirit of being interested only in what is. What has been and shall be is crowded into a small corner or the world these days, and neither the historian nor the prophet are "captains of modern industry."

My query, therefore, put to my ancient Aunt Mary in the quiet of a vacation afternoon was chiefly to get her to talk. Like all good conversationalists and preachers, it was not what Aunt Mary said but the way she said it that made one listen to her; her talk might or might not be brilliant flashes, but the chain on which it was hung was pure gold, visible between both words and pauses. Her personality shone out at every sentence. Pages and chapters of her history opened themselves before you as she talked until, by the time she had finished, you owned a new possession, a part of Aunt Mary's self.

She had so built herself on the plan that it is more blessed to give than to receive that she gave herself to her listener; and I always left her feeling that part of her had passed into me by some mysterious process of absorption known to the mystics of India, perhaps, but not to us. Her Puritan face, with its angles covering and protecting the tenderness beneath them, as a rocky sea cliff protects the sunlit meadow behind it, would not have appeared very "absorbable," I fear, to a mild devotee of the East. He would have found it hard digesting!

I was a senior in the Theological Seminary. For weeks our wise heads had been discussing the midweek meeting. Such phrases as "out of touch with our day," "an outworn institution," "needs to be brought up to date," "needs the social emphasis," "people don't care for it any more," had flown back and forth on nimble wings. It was really a wonder that some of us were not struck by our own lightning; but our background of clouds of ignorance duly protected us.

However, we were sure that in our waiting pastorates (how eagerly waiting!) our reforming zeal should first of all be directed against the outworn prayer-meeting. It was high time to be at it! So while I really asked Aunt Mary the question in order to stir her into talk, I nevertheless did have a technical interest at heart. Her seventy-eight hale and hearty summers might (though the chance was small) possibly have something to say on the subject.

Looking up from her knitting and off toward the orchard where the young July apples hung in the still heat, she began her process of giving herself away to me:

"I don't know," she began quietly, "as we ever thought about what use those old-fashioned prayer-meetings were. Folks had a good many things in those days that they didn't need to call as 'being of use.' There wasn't really any use to our old gate there in the garden, for it was open most of the time; but it gave us children more fun, as you young ones call it, than all the rest of the garden. It was a kind of border mark. And later on (Aunt Mary's eyes looked beyond the orchard) some of us had to thank that garden gate more than anything else for all the happiness that ever came to us.

"There wasn't much use in it. The hinges were off of it most of the time, and the chickens got through if they wanted to; but it was a meeting place and a border mark. It seems to me the old prayer-meeting was something like that, too. Maybe, James, that an old broken gate is a good place to lean on and look over into heaven. And maybe if it hangs open on one hinge it's all the better. Though of course one can't rightly say there's any use in it."

I saw that Aunt Mary had started, and I hardly knew whether another question would help or hinder, but I risked it.

"But did you ever discuss any practical problems at those old prayer-meetings?"

"No, I can't just say we did. We didn't know just what practical problems were, I suppose. We had troubles and sorrows, and we talked about them. And we had some joys, and we talked about them. I've heard the minister pray for sick folk by name, and the next day some of us that didn't like Jenny Edwards went to see her, and we saw enough to make us think a heap better of her. She was so patient!

"And I heard him pray for some young married people, too. He never preached on marriage, but the way he prayed on it made us young ones know it was a mighty sweet and serious thing. But I don't think we thought much about what you call practical problems. We kind o' thought everything was a problem, I suppose, and that the prayer-meeting was the place for everything. We didn't quite divide ourselves up into small parts, like practical and religious, the way you do now. Our pieces seemed all sewed together like our old bed-quilts. They don't seem to like those so much today."

Seeing that I would need a long day if I asked her about the social emphasis, I omitted that and took the clew that she had given me in her word "religious"—for I still had some idea that it is a great word in spite of the fact that "social" has come to be a substitute for it.

"But, Aunt Mary, life is hard these days, you know, and men need a real religion. They won't come to a prayer-meeting for anything unreal." My words were harsh, but I tried to make her see by my tone that I, too, thought that even in cold reality there is a place for tenderness.

"We never thought we were unreal. Our religion on midweek nights was awful real, James. There's a lot of things that are real even though they haven't got any names to them. I was reading the other day about a prayer-meeting where all they talked about was nervous diseases and how one ought to be quiet and calm; and this was called a treatment by suggestion. Now, I don't know what all this means; but we had worries and nerves, too, I guess, in those days. It's the same thing, isn't it, if one gets worn out from seeing too many folks, or if one just gets worn thin and troubled because they are lonely. Our nerves wore out because we didn't use them enough in company. And the prayer-meeting kept many of us from nervous breakdown, as you call it.

"We wouldn't say it suggested anything to us, but I suppose that's what it really was. Seems to me we had our own company there, and that made us think of company in heaven; it sort o' reminded us of something we came near forgetting. Why I remember walking home from those prayer-meetings when you would a' thought we were coming from a party. The village street was dark, but we could see the stars, and we had got so close together at the meeting that we didn't need these electric street-lights to see each other's faces by. We would all walk along together, until we came to Deacon Hallam's house. He would close his door behind him, and we'd go on again to Martha Person's house.

"So we dropped the meeting as we went along; kind o' making it last as long as it would, and every time it grew smaller those of us that lived farthest seemed to get closer together, and the meeting got better. When our house came last I went in the door many a time with the whole prayer-meeting just locked up in my own heart, and I was glad my door came last of all.

"Seems to me St. John writes the way he does just because he lived longest, and that Isle of Patmos of his wasn't any island at all. It was just a place he'd gotten to in his own heart because all the other apostles had died and left him alone. They'd dropped off one by one same as we did going home from meeting, and he had his Master all to himself for a while same as $ used to. But of course (and Aunt Mary looked far away again, beyond the orchard), when it came that one of the young men took to walking home with me I learned a good deal about what it means when two are gathered together in His name. And that verse, when two or three are gathered together, seems to me just all there is to say about prayer-meetings."

"Well, Aunt Mary," I said, for I saw she needed a word from me to keep her going, "I never saw much deep meaning to that verse, for I pray better when I am alone."

"Yes, you may pray better, Jamie (a name she seldom called me), but it isn't good prayers that count. Prayers are like people, it depends on the company they keep. Every prayer has got to be tied on to somebody else, for if we just lived alone, I don't think we would need to pray. It seems to me our Master prayed alone only to learn how to pray in company, and it is most wonderful that we don't hear of his praying in his temptation in the wilderness; he was too busy fighting; but when he prayed at the Transfiguration and, at the very last, in the Garden, when we might think he wouldn't want anybody around, he took the three disciples with him. That certainly was carrying out his own words.

"That 'where two or three are gathered together' is very wonderful. I think it shows that Jesus loved company. (I wondered if Aunt Mary was touching the social emphasis in prayer, but I refrained from telling her this new name for what she seemed to be saying.) Yes," she went on, "he loved company; I don't think he wanted to be alone. He was thinking all the time about other people, and to think about them he had to be with them all the time. He had to see how they looked every moment, how their expressions changed when he said anything; and their tell-tale faces more than anything else told him what they most needed, that he should pray for them. He saw Simon Peter with an ugly scowl on his face one day, and then he said, 'Never mind, Simon, I am praying that your faith will hold out.'

"He was a sociable man, Jesus was, and two or three, with him in the midst, was just what he liked. I can't see but he was mixing among people most of his time. And they liked him, too, just the way we like sociable people. The common people heard him gladly because common folk like to get close together and they saw he did, too. I suppose he was a settlement worker, but he didn't call himself a name like that. He didn't make a profession of it, nor take a course of training for it—he just naturally felt 'when two or three get together I must be there,' and there he was, and is now.

"You see, Jamie, when you sit alone the way I do now most of the time, you just aren't anybody. Nobody is ever born alone, and nobody ever really dies alone. There's always somebody around in both cases. There's bound to be. And everything we do, we do because we are mixed up with a whole lot of company. I suppose our Master might have come to a desert island and sent his gospel to us by signals and messages, but he didn't. He just came right down to see how we lived, and to live with us."

"But he isn't here now," I suggested. Aunt Mary was carrying me along, and I felt I could do no more than wait and see.

"Yes, he is, too; and that's why a prayer meeting is a good thing even if it is of no use and has no problems. You see, Jamie, you aren't rightly yourself until you begin to talk with some one else. Everything we do we do for each other; it is all just because somebody else is alive.

"When two or three are gathered together there is where each one is really himself or herself. All that they are comes out then. And something else is there beside; something that isn't any one of them, but all of them taken together. It is like a lot of numbers put together. You add them up and that's the sum. But you still have the separate numbers and the sum, too. So Jesus says when two or three are gathered together there is something else, something extra, and he is that extra. 'I am in the midst'. He is the spirit that comes when people come together.

"Somebody calls him the Unseen Guest. But I don't think he is a guest; he just comes because he dosen't like to be alone. And that's what I always thought about prayer meetings, Jamie, if they are real prayer meetings. There isn't any use in them, there isn't any use in anything so far as that goes—but there's company in them. And in our old-fashioned prayer meetings we certainly got company. I think we got the Master's company, Jamie; I think we did."

Aunt Mary's eyes looked beyond the orchard again; then she turned to me with her keen, soft eyes—

"Don't people need real copmany these days, Jamie?"

"Yes, Aunt Mary; but we've almost forgotten how to find it. We see so much of each other that we see nothing of each other. Perhaps the old prayer meeting did have some use after all."

"I always thought it did, Jamie."

The Religious Outlook

By Dr. Errett Gates

A New Book

There are indications that the age-long conflict between Science and Religion is drawing to a close. This conflict is now passing into its third period. The first period in their relation was one in which religion was mistress and science was servant and handmaid; the second period was one in which science proclaimed her emancipation from religion and declared war against her; the third period is one in which science and religion are agreeing to terms of peace on the basis of a just and appropriate division of territory.

It is coming to be recognized by a modest science and a sane religion that their activities, in a very large measure, lie in separate fields, which indeed border each other on one side with mutual interests, but whose frontages lie on exactly opposite sides and look out in opposite directions. The one has for its interests and outlook, the known; the other, the unknown. The faculty appropriate to the one is sight; to the other, is faith.

Science and Religion

This is not to say that there is no faith, no uncertainty, in science; and no sight, no certainty, in religion. There is uncertainty, hypothesis, speculation in science; and there is certainty, reality, in religion. But the certainty of each rests upon a different foundation. The mistake of science in the past has been her proneness to deny certainty and validity to all the facts of faith and the spiritual life, because they did not fall within the range of her observations. The mistake of religion has been to deny the right of science to draw conclusions in conflict with her dogmas. Each has claimed the whole universe as its own, and has forbidden trespassing upon her territory by the other.

This attitude of science and religion toward each other is changing. Such notable scientists as Romanes, Fiske, Le Conte, and Lodge, in recent days, have taken the part of religion against a proud and skeptical science; and such eminent religionists as Beecher, Smyth, Munger and Abbott, have taken the part of science against a dogmatic religion. It has looked hopeful to see the veterans of this conflict sitting down together in each other's camps. They have come to a better understanding with each other. There are not many leaders in either camp who will deny the independent rights of the other. The result is that science is more believing and religion more rational.

The Right to Believe

All this is by way of introduction to a new book, brought to the writer's attention by a commendation by Prof. Palmer, of Harvard—"The Right to Believe," by Eleanor Harris Rowland, Ph. D., Instructor in Philosophy in Mount Holyoke College. It is a small book of 202 pages, published by Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. Its six chapters are: The Necessity for a Belief, Does God Exist, The Nature of God and Man, The Divinity of Christ, The Problem of Evil, and Prayer. I shall be greatly mistaken if it does not prove to be one of the most stimulating religious publications of the season. It is unpretentious, lucid, strong and suggestive. It abounds in quotable passages whose language and thought seem perfectly fitted to each other. It is full of the courage of positive conviction built up on the foundation of solid scientific knowledge, wide-awake contact with inquiring students, and candid appreciation of the value of religious beliefs.

It takes nothing for granted, and does not claim more for religious faith, to begin with, than the most parsimonious scientific wisdom and worldly experience will allow. Its starting point is the skeptical attitude of modern science toward religion which declares: There is no scientific foundation for religious faith. The author frankly accepts the challenge and is content to start where science allows: "To be as thorough as possible, then, let us begin by doubting every shred of religious belief."

Why Believe

The author is interested to know why we believe at all. "If we have found difficulties with religion, if we can live easily without it, why not throw it overboard at once, and live a quiet life without? This is the method we employ with other outgrown ideas. We believed in Santa Claus, we had difficulties in making him square with the rest of experience, so we abandoned him altogether." "If we find a belief in God, in immortality, in Christ, in prayer, difficult and irrational, what possible compunction need we have in dropping the subject forever?"

The author answers this question in the several chapters of the book. She says: "There are but two alternatives to face, with any belief—religious or otherwise:—either it is true, or it is not true; there is no middle ground."

It is this "middle ground" on which the scientific skeptic, the indifferent worldling, and the superior rationalist take refuge, and of which the author does not leave enough to serve as a mote in a brother's eye.

"To sum up our positon as far as we have gone: granting that we have lost religious faith because of honest doubt, we can not go from one unproved position to another; we must prove our disbelief as well. In other words, we must be on the defensive and prove that there is no God, that Christ has no authority, that the soul is not immortal, and that man is not a free agent. Let there be no misunderstanding. Eventually, as rational beings, we must accept one position or the other. These religious statements are true or they are false. But in the meantime we must doubt and criticise both sides impartially. We must hold both opinions as real possibilities, in order to discuss them. Logically we are not yet ready to make up our minds but actively we are as if we had decided one way or the other."

The Desire to Believe

Concerning the existence of God, the author reasons: If we cannot prove his existence, neither can we prove his non-existence. The unbeliever is no more rational than the believer. Why, then, does the believer have a God, and the unbeliever refuse to have one? Simply because the one wants a God, while the other does not want one." Unless we have a real and vigorous longing for a God, a love for the idea of His existence, we shall not hope for Him, and unless we hope for Him there is no reason why we should believe in Him. We should otherwise naturally hope for an easy Godless world that makes no demands on us, and as naturally believe in one."

"Then the important question for every doubter to ask himself is, "Do I really want a God?" If he honestly wants one, he may proceed with us to expound the character of the kind of God he wants, and to ask what kind of evidence of His existence he wants."

Faith More Rational than Unbelief

The man who believes in God has a right to believe in him, not only and not merely because he wants to (for that is the only reason the atheist has for his unbelief), but because it is the "richer of two possibilties." "Why not say unhesitatingly, 'Of any two unprovable alternatives in regard to the existence or nature of a possible fact, that alternative is most rationally believed which satisfies the highest demand of the highest type of normal human beings, and, being accepted, only that life is rational which lives absolutely as if that alternative were true?"

"The best men throughout the ages have been convinced that there was a God, or have been profoundly unhappy because they were not so convinced. The best moments of our life are when we consider His existence the most probable, and we have the witness of the high moments of others as well as of ourselves."

This book represents the present stage of the conflict between science and religion. It is one of the most convincing defences of the Christian faith that has appeared in recent apologetic literature. It is at once a recognition of the incontestable place of science in our modern world, and a criticism of its limitations, in the interest of the Christian's right to his faith, unmolested by science. The grounds of man's religious faith are found in his spiritual needs; and his right to his faith is based on its actual worth. While the author nowhere states the name of the philosophy underlying the discussions of the book, yet it is a thorough-going application of Pragmatism to fundamental Christian beliefs.

Estimate of Christ

The following extracts will show the author's attitude toward Christ, in her discussion of "The Divinity of Christ":

"Unless we can imagine something higher than we want (than Christ's character), we must confess that this is the highest."

"A thing must be the best if it is all that we can conceivably want; and if we have the best and do not want it, we are like aliens who have wandered into paradise, and find it not to their taste."

"It is nothing against his revelation (Christ's) that other men had had visions of the same ideal." "Far from weakening the Christian message when it comes, it is an added support to it that the highest strivings of the human mind all pointed in one direction." "Who would believe in a religion that ran counter to the ideals of all good men who lived before, and what more could a God do than quietly to set his seal upon the best, and live it before our eyes."

If the reading of this book does not stir a man's thought it is because he has none to stir.

The Old World and the Centennial

Address Delivered at Pittsburg by Leslie W. Morgan

General Secretary of the Christian Association of Great Britain.

The desire for Christian union was conceived in the breast of Thomas Campbell before he left Ireland. It was in the New World that it was given birth. Moreover it was to the capricious waters to the north of Ireland that the consecration of Alexander Campbell to the Christian ministry was due. He and his mother had set sail for America in the early autumn of 1808. A storm arose and the little vessel was soon driven before the wind onto the rocks off the coast of Scotland. In the midst of their peril the youth of twenty vowed that if the Lord would grant them escape he would devote his life to the Christian ministry. To what purpose he was saved, we are here to testify today. It was too late in the season for them to set sail again that year, and hence opportunity was offered for him to enter Glasgow University, to begin the preparation for the ministry to which he had consecrated himself. It was here that he came into contect with such men, and read such books as prepared his mind for the hearty acceptance of the principles laid down in the Declaration and Address, the proof sheets of which he read upon his arrival in America in August of the following year.

These men and the sentiments which they held must enter into any record that is made up of the contribution of the Old World to the New.

Coxlane Before Brush Run.

Nor did the leaven which produced these men fail to work in other quarters as well. There was celebrated on Whit-Monday, May 31 of this year, at our church in the Cathedral City of Chester, the one hundredth anniversary of the Church of Christ, Coxlane, North Wales. Hence today is not the first centennial celebration. Coxlane is before Brush Run!

And who knows but that if the Old World had not given up her sons, Thomas and Alexandre Campbell, to the New World, this celebration might have been held today in London instead of Pittsburg.

The first quarter of last century saw the organization of churches in Bristol, London, Shrewsbury, Wrexham and in a few places further north, but the churches for the most part remained ignorant of each other, and of the greater movement in America, until the year 1833. It was in this year that Peyton C. Wyeth, a young American art student, entered a little Baptist chapel near Finsbury Pavement, London, on a certain Sunday morning. He knew Alexander Campbell and accepted his teachings, and in conversation with one of the officers of the church after the service, he told him of the Campbells and of the movement in America. This officer was William Jones, himself a religious author of some note in his day. He was attracted by what Mr. Wyeth told him and a correspondence sprung up between himself and Mr. Alexander Campbell. Soon after this Mr. Jones started the British Millennial Harbinger, with the hope of bringing the Scottish Baptist churches in England into line with the new movement. But he soon grew faint-hearted for fear of creating dissension among his brethren.

Coming Together.

However certain churches which stood for New Testament Christianity got into touch with each other, and in 1842 the first general meeting was held at Edinburgh, when there were in the autumn said to be forty-two churches and 1,300 members. The next meeting was held in the autumn of 1847, at Chester, when the chair was taken by Alexander Campbell, who had come over in the spring of the same year, in answer to the earnest solicitation of the British brethren. It was then reported that there were eighty churches and 2,300 members, but two years later, while there were said to be ninety-two churches the membership was given as only 1,029. Evidently the methods of computation in vogue in other times and places were in popular favor,—guessing at half and multiplying by two.

For the next twenty or thirty years the figures were sometimes up and sometimes down, but the hearts of the brethren were strong.

In 1845 the late Timothy Coop of Wigan and Southport, came into the work, and in the middle of the 70's became the storm center around which great changes were wrought in the work in Great Britain.

Mr. Coop had visited America and had caught the spirit of progress and of an intensified evangelism. H. S. Earl had already evangelized in England in 1861-64, and had demonstrated the possibilities of such work.

Upon Mr. Coop's second visit to America he appeared before the Board of the newly formed Foreign Christian Missionary Society, and offered to give the Society 1,000 pounds for every 20,000 pounds they would devote to the evangelization of England.

The proposition was accepted. H. S. Earl had already returned to England and had begun work at Southampton. M. D. Todd and W. T. Moore soon followed at Chester and Southport. The more conservative of the British brethren did not take kindly to what in that day was the new evangelism.

Dissention and Division.

The principles which were emphasized were the same, but some of the applications were different. Dissensions arose and in 1880 a division took place and the churches of the American type formed themselves into a missionary organization called the Christian Association.

This, of all times and places, is not the time or place to say anything that would widen the breach or increase the difficulties of the situation, for this celebration is not that of a faction or of a party, but of our whole people. Indeed it is a pleasure to testify to the faithfulness and devotion, and the measure of success that has attended the efforts of our brethren of the older churches.

But it is not in an old and conservative country that we can look for the best interpretation and application of such a plea as ours. Its very simplicity constitutes both its strength and its danger. The religious history of Britain is full of attempts to return to New Testament Christianity; but they mostly have gone or are going the way of all the earth. Their literalism soon goes to seed and their legalism soon crowds out all that is vital and spiritual, and they become the prey of dissension and division.

It is not so in a new country. The very vigor of a young country's growth cracks the shell of an undue formalism and breaks the bonds of an over-strained legalism. There are growing pains, to be sure; but after all they are only growing pains.

The organization of 1880 cannot boast of great numerical success. There are now but twenty churches with only just over 2,000 members. The older churches have done better numerically, with their period of fluctuating membership largely past when we had only begun, and they now have about 190 churches with a total membership of 13,000 or 14,000.

Discouraging Conditions.

It is no wonder that the workers in England often grow discouraged, as the work is viewed from certain angles, and especially in its details. Some one has said that the reason so many people are pessimists is that they lose sight of generals in the deluge of adverse particulars.

Let us look at the situation. First, within. We have no colleges and in the very nature of the case cannot maintain one. But our young men have gone to our American colleges by the score,—more than sixty missionaries and preachers having been given to the general work. It is a drain upon our resources, for they seldom return, but our churches are happy to live to serve.

Looking without, we see on the one hand the established Church, firmly entrenched behind the law of the land, and surrounded with vested interests, regarding with arrogance all the Free Churches. And on the other hand we see the Free Churches themselves sailing so near in to the haven of New Testament Christianity as to have taken much of the wind out of our sails. Or to change the figure, they have verily stolen the thunder of our fathers.

Let us compare our position with that of the Free Churches.

Similarity with the Free Church.

A point of emphasis with us nas been our hatred of ecclesiasticism. But however skilled we may have shown ourselves we can give the Free Churches of England no instruction in the use of invective as applied to this matter. We would have indeed to show ourselves men of valour if we hoped to distinguish ourselves on this battle field.

We have stood for the right of any truly Christian man to preach the gospel. The descendants of Oliver Cromwell will not soon forget that his blood was made to boil within him as he saw a man horse-whipped in the streets of London because he claimed the right to preach the gospel without a license, or that Cromwell declared that he would live to see the day when this intolerance would be put down in England. Nor will the descendants of Bunyan forget the main principle for which he languished in Bedford. The Baptist and Congregational churches of England and Wales have three times the number of lay preachers as they have regular ones, and the local preachers of the Wesleyan church outnumber their regular ministers by four or five to one.

Do we oppose binding creeds, man-made and oppressive? Who are the two thousand clergymen who went out from the Church of England because they would not sign the Articles of Conformity? They are the men who have flamed the way for every Free Church of today, and that for which they stood has not been forgotten.

Do we stand for Christian union? The Free Churches have stood for no special theory of Christian union, but for that very reason, perhaps, some of them have been all the more ready to unite. All are federated, and for the present the most of them are satisfied to not go beyond it; but it cannot last; union is in the air.

What Should We Do.

In this situation what shall we do? Withdraw, because the field is too nearly ripe, or remain, because the harvest is so nearly ready together?

Evidently it is no place for negation. Of all places in the world England is the place for constructive tactics. This demands strong men. Almost any one can tear down; only skilled workmen can wisely build.

Our negations and our protests that have won us victories in other places have been taken from our lips and given to the world with a force and power scarcely possessed by a Campbell or a Stone, but we have a message,— we have the divine creed, and there can be no other; we have the name, and many admit it; we have the ordinances, that must at least be held up by the united church as the ideal for the individual; we have the principles which will give liberty to the individual and unity to the church; we have not only the passion for union which enables us to preach it with power, but we have the divine basis for union, which alone can make its consummation desirable; we of all people ought to be able to show the Free Churches the real logic of their position, for they preach better than they know.

With these positive truths to be emphasized we would be recreant to our duty if we shunned the task.

What would a Campbell do? The answer may be found in what was done in 1812; they joined hands with the one denomination in th t day that was willing to take the profered hand, and then from that vantage ground proceeded to sow the seed it New Testament Christianity beside all waters.

We may never be able to build up a great organization in England that we can call "ours;" but there is no better field for showing that we are not a denomination, and that to build up one is the furthest from our desire and aim. Indeed, the situation is a powerful challenge to the sincerity of our claim!

Must we either become a denomination, or else abandon every field where the sentiment in favour of Christian union is such that we cannot make it our exclusive hobby, especially in its negative phases? No, certainly not, but it may be necessary to lose sight of ourselves sometimes, that Christ may be glorified.

The stampede for Christian union is on, and if we are as wise and tactful as a cowboy, yea, if we are not recreant to our duty, we will ride before the advancing host and seek to direct the stampede.

Suggested Policy.

In a word now, let me suggest a policy and say what we have done and are doing to carry it out. From the first we have supplied preachers and missionaries, from a country of preachers and from a land steeped in missionary zeal. These have gone forth in numbers quite out of proportion to what is usual, considering our numbers. We have organized a few churches, but this is not our supreme aim. From the first we have circulated literature; the Christian Commonwealth for a score of years went into the homes of thousands, breathing the spirit of Christian union; literature in the form of tracts, leaflets, Gospel Posters and handbills are being circulated more largely than ever before; eighteen months ago advertisements were inserted in six of the leading weeklies of London, asking for correspondence with those who were interested in Christian union. Replies were received from every part of the kingdom, and some hundreds of letters have been exchanged. Four preachers have come into our work as a result, and others would do so if there were openings; distributors of literature have also been obtained in other places. Recently two churches have come over to our position, and recently negotiations were under way with a small group of churches with the same object in view.

A church of a thousand members would be of value to us, as an example of what the proclamation of the simple gospel can do, but of infinitely more value to the cause of Christ in general and to Christian union in particular, would be a thousand individuals in a thousand different communities, lovingly yet earnestly advocating the cause of Christian union on New Testament lines. There are probably these and more, we may never know the number, but we will pray and work for their increase. The glory may never be ours, but the joy of no sincere Christian will be the less because of that fact.

This, then, is our task and labor of love. The time is ripe; the day is at hand; the end is almost in sight; if we would be in at the finish,—at the "kill"—at the killing of sectarianism—let us not lose sight of the green fields of England.

What Has Become of the Chuch?

By Robert Graham Frank

In the Kansas City Star of Christmas day I found a most interesting and thought-provoking contrast. The leading editorial of that day was on "Kansas City's Christmas." It set forth, with fine appreciation, what was being done in the city to make the Chrismas season one of universal good cheer. Special mention was made of the charity which was being dispensed by the various benevolent and fraternal organizations. The anonymous order of Good Fellows, the Mayor's Christmas tree, the Salvation Army, the Fraternal Order of Eagles, the Grand Opera House, with its free matinee, and many other dispensers of Christmas joy came in for their well-merited share of praise, for they have each contributed to make Christmas of 1909 the happiest Kansas City ever had.

In an adjoining column to this editorial I found "In Kansas City Forty Years Ago," a feature that the star is running now. It happened that forty years ago Christmas came on the same day of the week as this year, so the clippings from the Star of December 25, 1869, related to Christmas just as the present editorial did. Now, here is the point of my story. The account written forty years ago, just as the account of this year, tells of the joy of the Christmas-tide and of the provisions made for dispensing that joy, but the one of 1869 gives mention, in considerable extent, to the Christmas festivities and activities of the churches and does not so much as mention any other organizations, while the editorial of 1909 tells of all sorts of institutions, but does not so much as mention the church.

I could only wonder what this change meant. Studying the contrast presented in this striking way brought some question before me. I could not explain the omission of the church from the present organized dispensers of charity and good cheer on the ground of the Star's enmity to the church for so far as I know it has no such enmity. Neither can I satisfy myself on the supposition that the churches have declined in influence in Kansas City during the past forty years. They have grown greatly both in numbers and in influence during these years, and I am sure have had a worthy part in making the Christmas season a happy one for all whom they could reach with their cheering ministry. But why no mention of the churches in the editorial today? Has the church created the Christian spirit and given the dissemination of it into other hands? Has the church fallen behind other organizations in its willingness or its ability to reach and minister to the worthy poor? What is the explanation of the contrast? I have not answered the question with any satisfaction for myself as yet, but I pass it on hoping that it may provoke thought in other minds and possibly call out a comprehensive, sympathetic and satisfactory answer. It seems worthy of study.

Our Readers' Opinions

EDITORS' NOTE.—For many weeks we have been reciving communications from our readers criticising the position taken by us in recent editorials on the baptism question. While our space will not allow the publication of all these articles, yet we are no less appreciative of the unprinted ones than of those we print. We are presenting in this department three statements which seem to us to represent in tone and point the great body of our correspondence called forth by our critique of Col. S. H. Church's address at Pittsburgh. There is no doubt at all that a great ferment of thought is in process in the minds of a multitude of brethren concerning those points of teaching involved in the Disciples' program for union. Happily the moment has come when a minister may state his mind on the baptism question or any other question without suffering ostracism from the fellowship of the Disciples. In The Christian Century, at least, we wish our readers to know that they have one paper from whose opinion they may differ without being pilloried. On our editorial pages we print a statement of our opinion which, without answering these communications point by point, undertakes to suggest a point of view from which our particular differences may reconcile themselves.

An Open Letter

Editors of the Christian Century: In common with many others I have been interested in the contribution which you make to the baptismal question as set forth in the editorial pages of The Christian Century of November 11th and 18th. In this article I wish to present a criticism of the position which you take, or rather of the arguments with which you buttress your position.

Simply stated that position is as follows:—On the basis of modern thought the exclusive method of baptism by immersion can be defended, must logically be practised by our brotherhood, and will be one of the marks of the united church. In other words an analysis of your editorials reveals three essential points, which, for the sake of clearness, we will number.

> 1. "The whole subject of baptism will be lifted out of the field of dogma and baptism will stand for just what it is and for what it is worth in the life of the Christian and of the church."
> 2. "Having rid ourselves of the dogma, it may fall out that there are other more cogent and persuasive reasons for maintaining the practice." If we substitute "will" for "may" in the sentence, we have the conclusion that you express in other places.
> 3. "So long as there is an immersionist conscience in Christendom there will be no union on an optional procedure in the matter of baptism."

The first two points belong together—the latter belongs to a different category.

By the first statement you proclaim yourself to be a thoroughly modern man. For you the day of dogma has passed. All external authorities—even that of the Bible, regarded as an external authority—is forever judged by that which they really accomplish in the production of character and of influence in the world. This principle, which you no doubt apply to the whole field of dogmatics, is clear and thoroughly modern.

Now on the basis of this you defend the exclusive practise of baptism by immersion. This means that in your opinion immersion has character producing results that sprinkling or pouring do not have. More than this, to be logical, you must affirm that these results are so great and so outstanding as to justify the exclusive practice of immersion in the face of other well established methods.

The question now becomes something like this,—Does a critical study of those churches that practice immersion only, and of those individual Christians who have been immersed, justify your position? We think not. Compare for instance the Greek and Roman churches—the former of which is immersionist, the latter not. There can be no question that in influence and vitality the Roman church has stood on a higher plane than the Greek. Harnack says that when one studies the conditions among the orthodox of the Greek church he gains the impression that religion could hardly fall lower. Or compare, let us say, the Baptist and the Disciple with the Methodist and the Presbyterian churches. Have the former by their exclusive use of immersion, gained in character and influence something which the others have not? Apparently, No. On the contrary could not our affusionist brethren defend the position that those churches which insist on an exclusive method of baptism have acquired a legalistic spirit that has to an extent deadened their spirituality and lessened their power? If you should immerse twenty people and sprinkle twenty people, do you think, other things being equal, that those immersed would show greater results in character and spiritual power than the others? General observation would not so indicate. Your argument is faulty in that it does not accord with the generally observed facts of experience and history.

The third point in the discussion is of an entirely different nature and must not be confused with the others. It would seem to run this way.

> So long as there is an immersionist conscience in the church there can be no union without the exclusive pratice of immersion.
> We are the heralds of Christian union.
> Therefore we must adopt the exclusive practice of immersion.

This has a strange sound as coming from the pages of The Christian Century. We have grown accustomed to the effort to find an irreducible minimum as a basis for union, which many have hoped might be simple loyalty to the spirit of Jesus, but you argue not in this fashion. According to your theory there can be no union until the conscience of the church becomes standardized. This sounds strange as coming from a modern man who has been trained to regard the subject matter of conscience and truth as changing and developing. Let us go further. There is a foot-washing conscience in the church. There is to be no union without the universal practice of foot-washing. There is a seventh day conscience in the church. There is to be no union without the exclusive use of the seventh day. There is an anti-organ conscience in the church. There can be no union without the abandonment of organs. There is a conservative and a liberal conscience in the church. There can be no union until all the church becomes either conservative or liberal. On what different ground are you than was Ben Franklin when he argued against the use of organs on the ground that they were divisive, and that in their use the conscience of some was violated? If we have to wait for union until the conscience of the church becomes standardized we fear that our hope will be one of those, that long deferred, maketh the heart sick. If our brotherhood took your position seriously and carried it out logically, there would be an obstacle placed in the path of progress that would make the efforts of our conservative brethren look like a mole hill in comparison.

Our fathers were consistent at this point. The Bible was to them the authoritative word of God—the final court of appeals. They did not care one bit for pragmatic results, but asked only for a "Thus saith the Lord." On that basis they consistently defended their position. But you are on different grounds. Many will sympathize with your attempt to find, on the basis of modern thought, good ground for the exclusive practice of immersion, but they will be compelled to look far beyond any arguments that you have as yet adduced.

Brooklyn, N. Y. WALTER S. ROUNDS.

[The question as to whether in the program for Christian union we must reckon with the feet-washing conscience, the anti-missionary society conscience, etc., is largely academic. As statesmen in the enterprise of Christian union we are to meet each problem on its own merits. No single rule will cover all cases. And yet if a single rule is demanded, we can discover one easily enough. It would be this: If deference to the anti-missionary conscience, for example, involves a loss to the Kingdom of God greater and more serious than a divided church involves, then, manifestly, the right course is to choose division. Likewise with the anti-organ question. We would not hesitate to say that the extent of such conscience in the total area of the church should be considered also. Thus it is absurd to say that the great body of the church should adopt feet-washing because twenty thousand Dunkards have a conscience on the subject. The immersionist conscience is different from these: different from the latter in that it covers a wide area of the church, different from the former in that the universal adoption of any form upon which we may find ourselves able to agree affects not one whit the vital interests of the Kingdom of God.—EDITORS.]

As Other See Us

EDITORS' NOTE.—The writer of the following communication is one of the best known leaders of thought in the Congregational denomination, an author of theological and religious books widely read among ministers of all denominations and not less among Disciple ministers. For years he has manifested great interest in the Disciples of Christ, studying their history and their contemporary writing and work. We appreciate the friendly criticism no less than the gracious compliment which he pays The Christian Century and its editorial utterance. Our readers will, we are sure, hear his opinion with utmost respect.

Editors Christian Century: I am delighted and refreshed by the weekly visits of the Christian Century. It is a live paper, and is facing in the right direction; namely, in the direction that the thought of the world is moving. It is sure of the future. I wish it might find its way into every home of your large brotherhood now, and I cannot imagine another enterprise which would furnish to some of your wealthy men a better investment in abiding and far-reaching spiritual results. I read quite a number of papers, but generally put my hands on the Century first, and never fail to receive from it inspiration and help. Again, and again I have found myself offering thanks that a paper of such fairness of spirit and loftiness of purpose has a place within your brotherhood.

I was especially interested in the excellent reports of the Centennial Convention, and felt that if I was not something else, equally good, I would like to be a Disciple. Although an alien from the commonwealth of Campbell, I have a profound interest in you as a religious body, and entertain the strongest possible hope regarding your future. You have within you a great amount of vital force. You are bound to grow and expand. You are coming out of the house of bondage to legalism, and are entering into the promised land of a true spiritualism. You constitute one of the important movements within the church of today. "The great religious reform of the nineteenth century," from which you date your rise is not a spent force. You are still going on, not however, without an occasional retrograde tendency. There is great ferment of thought within your borders, which will manifest itself increasingly in advancement along many lines. Your present positions are not final. You cannot go back even to apostolic Christianity; all you can do is to carry forward into the present something of the apostolic spirit and something of the essence of apostolic teaching And I believe that God has raised you up in his providence to make some important contributions to the Christianity of today; and to help in the blessed consummation of a united church, for which the Saviour prayed, and for which the ages wait.

I have rejoiced greatly in the noble stand which you have taken for union. It is undoubtedly the question of the hour, and it is just as undoubtedly the question for whose solution you were called into being. You are therefore right in calling your people back to ground originally occupied in the "Declaration and Address," which was the ground occupied by Peter and the other apostles, who knew no ground of union save the good confession of faith in Jesus as the Son of the living God. It was given to you as a people to be the solvent of the sects; but instead of being true to your mission you have allowed yourselves to crystalize into one of the closest and most sharply defined sects in Christendom. And this has come about by your demanding conformity and a certain form of an outward ordinance as a condition of union.

It is a thousand pities that Colonel Church loaded down his memorable and significant Centennial Address (which you had the courtesy and courage to print) with irrevelant and untimely things; but all the same it put in a few center shots, the effect of which will be felt in the days to come. Especially to the point was the declaration, "Instead of being able to offer our organization as a groundwork for Christian union, we find ourselves merely one more sect, holding to a compulsory interpretation of Scripture which presents a greater obstacle to fellowship than any artificial creed, and shutting out millions of men who would otherwise be tempted to join the church. Suppose that all the churches in the land were to propose to you today to accept your offer of union, which you have been making for a century. You would destroy this glad approach at the first conference by requiring them all to be baptized over again. Brethren it is unthinkable!" Colonel Church is right; and never while the world lasts can the union for which you pray and labor be effected upon that basis.

The only tenable position is that taken by Ernest O. Kooser in the Century of December 16th, in an article entitled, "A Counter Opinion," where speaking of the clearness, fairness and justice with which you have set forth the position of the Disciples, he expresses disappointment that you should have assumed the role of keeper of the consciences of others, by demanding the practice of immersion as the only basis of union. This is the broken link in your chain of argument, and certainly your active contention will be powerless until it is mended. I know what your answer will be, you will speak of your "immersionist conscience;" but what of others who have consciences of a different nature? Have they any more right to respect your conscience than you have to respect theirs? I can imagine the fine scorn with which such a man as the Apostle Paul would treat a position like that.

The whole question of forms of religion, whether it be doctrinal statements, ecclesiastical polity, or religious ceremony, belongs to the peculiarities of piety over which only God's little children quarrel. The outward divides, the spiritual unites. And surely in the present day when the dangers that menace our common faith have regard to the essential things, it does not seem worth while to spend our strength upon these subordinate things. To do so is to man our forces on the outposts while the citadel is being assaulted.

I believe with Mr. Kooser that for your church to find deliverance at this point is for it to go forward in its conquering might, as one of the greatest agencies for the union of a divided church in the present day; but for it to miss its opportunity means that it will go back from its present Kadesh Barnea where the promised land is in view to years of wandering in the wilderness.

Some time ago I was out on a lake still fishing. When the time came to turn homeward, I began to row with might and main, but there was no visible progress, because I had forgotten to take up the anchor. You are doing splendid editorial rowing; your prow is pointed right, but you have forgotten to take up the anchor. That you will take it up sometime I doubt not. The sooner the better.

A Friendly Outsider.

An Appreciation

Editors Christian Century: Mr. Kooser's article in a recent "Century," called my attention anew to a matter which has puzzled me ever since reading Col. Church's address and your critique in the issue of November 18. If you have not yet replied to Mr. Kooser and can do so and therein include an explanation of the point I now raise, I would appreciate it greatly. You say, "His (Mr. Church's) argument that the practice of both immersion or affusion according to the option of the candidate . . . . called forth our pronounced dissent." Now, I have read and reread Col. Church's article, and cannot find that he makes any such argument. He says, "I am not suggesting for a moment that sprinkling should take the place of immersion." His nearest approach to your statement is this: "Why should not the minister in the case of adult applicants who have already been baptized, advise immersion and stop there, being governed thereafter by the declared conscience of his convert?" As Col. Church is talking of those who have already been "baptized," he is not proposing that the adviser of immersion administer sprinkling to any one. But if said adviser sprinkles no one, how can he or his church "practice both immersion or affusion according to the option of the candidate?"

I wish to thank you for your kind and impartial reference to the papers of myself and G. Lyle Smith on the Declaration and Address as related to present-day problems. Your estimate of the fairness of Texas Disciples is, I think, not overdrawn. Some people down here, of course, would like to read the vendors of the unexpected "out of the party," but in most instances, the right of personal opinion is clearly recognized.

I also appreciated a reference you made in that article to Dean Robert T. Mathews. When I was a homesick student in the College of the Bible in Lexington, Ky., Brother Mathews was pastor of the old Main Street (now Central) Church. His cordial greeting every Sunday morning at the church door, his counsels in the Sunday-school class-room and his interest in the young men about him drew me to him. He was a good man to know.

With best wishes for the "Century," as the best present interpreter of the Disciples' plea to the modern mind, I am yours sincerely,

Dallas, Texas. Edward C. Boynton.

[Mr. Boynton's difficulty in understanding Mr. Church's argument is typical of that of most persons who have read the Pittsburg address. We are not quite sure just what in his discussion of baptism Mr. Church means to get at. The statement upon which our mind fastened itself was this: "The Methodist policy, which leaves it optional for the candidate to choose his own form of baptism, is much nearer the mark of a free church than ours, which confines him to a form of baptism of our choice." This we took to mean that the Disciples should therefore adopt an optional procedure in the practice of baptism. If it doesn't mean that, we do not see that it or the elaborate argument which forms its context, means anything. In addition to this statement, we found in the newspaper report of Mr. Church's address (upon the basis of which, not upon the authorized copy, our first critique was written) this proposal: that the minister "advise immersion in the case of adult applicants, and stop there, being governed thereafter by the declared conscience of the convert." This, of course, we took to mean, both when we heard the address spoken and upon reading the newspaper report, that if the applicant's conscience called for sprinkling or pouring, the minister was to govern himself in an accommodating manner. Later, however, when the authorized copy of Mr. Church's address came to us for publication in The Christian Century, we observed that the sentence above quoted was made to read "—advise immersion in the case of adult applicants who have already been baptized and stop there, etc." Such a statement, of course, raises an entirely different question from that involved in the statement concerning the practice of plural forms of baptism.—Editors.]

Worthy Second Thought

We have a double pleasure in publishing the following from E. F. Daugherty, pastor at Wabash, Ind. The custom of clipping the good things one has found in his journals will be a valuable suggestion to others. And besides, we will be pardoned for wanting to share so fair a compliment with our readers. Such good words as these make an editor's life really worth living!—Editors.]

My Dear Mr. Editor: Every six months I clip my periodicals, and in my semi-annual clean-up it amazed me to note that "Century" articles led the field in the amount of pabulum that had dented my mentality and impressed me as worthy of second thought and preservation in my files. So I want to express appreciation for the marked improvement of the past six months in the "Century." It is increasingly thought provocative—stimulating—and withal is so dominated by the upward and onward rather than downward and backward look that its reading is a delight. May your editorial facileness and force fully flower, for as a "bud" you have been a most gratifying stimulus to me. Incidentally, I pay up a "leetle"—and enclose card with bill of fare the Wabash faithful will feed upon for some weeks. Very truly yours, E. F. Daugherty.

Grandmother's Coverlet

BY IRMA B. MATTHEWS.

It was a June day and they are supposed to be perfect, but this day promised to be all that is not expected of it.

Ellen gazed dolefully from the window. "It is no use," she said, turning away with a sigh, "it is simply going to pour all day, and there will be no going to the woods this day."

"Well," answered Dessie, brightly, "I do not see as we can help it and there is no use having clouds both within and without. We may as well make the best of it."

"Tell you what," cried Marion, "say we ransack the garret today. You know grandmother said we might whenever we wished, and I am sure we will find enough there to help us pass the day."

The others agreed to this and were soon racing up the stairs that led to the garret. They were city girls, those three, and cousins, and this was the first time they had visited their paternal grandfather at the same time. Now they were to spend the summer and have the time of their life as they all declared.

Ellen's mother had objected to the plan at first. "What, you three crazy girls!" she exclaimed. "Why, you will drive mother out of her wits!" But Ellen's father had only laughed and said, "I guess you do not understand mother very well. She will enjoy it, in fact I am not sure she will not be the worst one among them." So they had been allowed to carry out their plan, and Ellen soon decided that her father was right, for their grandmother seemed to enjoy all their fun as much as any of them. This day they had planned to take their dinner and spend the day in the woods in true gipsy fashion. Grandfather had promised to show them how to broil meat over the coals and roast potatoes in the ashes, and now the rain had spoiled it all, but as Marion sagely remarked, "There were more days coming, it was not as if this was the last one."

They entered the old garret and looked around. Everything was in perfect order and what a lovely place it was. The girls drew long breaths. On one side were rows of old chests that they felt sure contained the clothes of years passed and gone. In one corner stood a spinning wheel, silent now, but what stories it might tell them if it could only speak.

"I say, girls," cried Dessie, "supposing we open some of these chests and dress up in the clothes. I am sure we will find clothes in some of them."

The girls agreed and immediately with much laughter they began to overhaul some of the chests in question. Nor were they disappointed. Forth from their depths they drew clothes the likes of which they had never seen excepting in pictures. In a short time they were all attired in some of them. Ellen turned, and as she did so her eyes fell on Dessie. "Oh, Marion," she exclaimed, "look at Dessie! She looks just like grandmother. I mean like the picture of her that hangs in the sitting room. All she needs is her hair dressed differently. Here, Dessie, let me fix it," and she deftly drew her cousin's hair to the top of her head and fastened it with a high comb she had found. "There, now, is she not perfect?"

"I feel as though I was a thousand years old and had lived years and years," Marion murmured dreamily as she looked down at her own gown. "Perhaps I shall never wake up again. Who knows?"

"Pinch her Ellen," laughed Dessie, "that will waken her fast enough. She is dreaming again, and I dare say has forgotten all about us."

But Ellen did not heed her. She was diving again in the depths of a chest eagerly bent on a voyage of discovery. Suddenly she uttered a low cry.

"What is it?" asked Dessie. "Did something bite you?" For answer Ellen held up a blue and white coverlet that she had found. Well worn it certainly was, but it had lost none of its beauty. The pattern was one of white stars over a blue ground on the one side, and the reverse on the other.

"What a beauty!" cried Marion. "My, but wouldn't people at home rave over such a thing as that? I tell you what, our grandmothers could do some things that we might well be proud of, if we were only able to do them."

"Do you think grandmother did this?" asked Ellen.

"I'm sure she did," answered Marion, "but supposing we ask her."

"Agreed!" and the girls rushed down the stairs, forgetful for the moment of their strange attire.

"Grandmother," began Ellen, then stopped, for grandmother was regarding them with a queer twinkle in her eyes.

"Oh," she said with an evident sigh of relief, "it is you, is it? For a moment I thought I was visited with ghosts from the past."

The girls laughed and Marion answered, "Had such been the case, grandmother, you would have been one of the ghosts, see," and she pointed to Dessie.

"She does look much as I did fifty years ago, I acknowledge, but what have you here?"

"Oh, yes, I forgot," continued Ellen. "We found this in a chest in the attic, and grandmother, it is so beautiful that we wondered if you made it."

Grandmother took the half-worn blue folds from the girl's hands and passed her own over it in a carressing manner.

"I have not seen this before for years," she answered musingly. Yes, dear, I made it, from the time the wool left the sheep's back until the spread was completed, the work was all mine. There is quite a story connected with the making of it."

"A story, O grandmother," cried the girls in chorus; "please tell us," and they seated themselves prepared to listen, for well they knew the indulgent grandmother would not deny them.

"Yes," she continued with a soft little smile. It was part of my wedding outfit. In my days girls were brought up to expect to marry, and when still quite young they began their wedding chest. I do not believe I was more than twelve when mother gave me mine and I began on what was afterwards to be my outfit. We had to do all our own spinning as well as weaving in those days and spun flax as well as wool, so linen sheets were among the things I made and put in my chest. Each of your mothers, my dears, have one of those linen sheets."

"I know," said Ellen, "mother embroidered hers and uses it for a spread, and it is the envy of all her friends."

"Yes, people do not make those things now days. Well, I was seventeen when at last mother gave me leave to make a coverlid. It requires much skill and I had to serve a long apprenticeship on other things before she would let me undertake it. I shall never forget how proud and delighted I was when she told me I might begin it and also that I might originate my own design. Many were the dreams I indulged in as I spun the wool. The whirr of a spinning wheel makes fine music to dream by. Into those threads went many girlish dreams of the Prince Charming that was to come some day and carry away my heart."

"Oh, grandmother," cried Ellen, reproachfully. "Do you mean to tell us that so pretty a maid as I am sure you must have been had had no lovers at seventeen?"

Grandmother's pretty face flushed and she laughed. "I did not say so, did I? There had been suitors, I admit, but none that I chose to fancy. There was one in particular that caused me a good deal of trouble, for he persisted even when I gave him plainly to understand that I wanted nothing to do with him. He was a good, steady fellow, too, and mother was a little provoked at me that I continuer to flout him.

"'I am afraid you have some high flown notions in your head,' she said to me, 'such as are not becoming to a maid like you. Henry is a likely lad and will make a good husband,' but I stubbornly refused to see it, but I am wandering away from my story. I had the yarn spun at last and then came the coloring of half of it. Mother had long before taught me the use of the dye tub and the dyes that she used, so that I had no trouble with this, and it was a proud day for me when mother helped me put it in the loom.

I had chosen a design of stars scattered over a white ground with a zig-rag border, and mother said she thought it would be very pretty. Then the real work began and it was not so easy as one might imagine. I was obliged to work slowly, but as the thing grew under my hands it seemed a very part of me, and I wove still more fancies into it."

Grandmother paused for a moment, then continued smilingly. "I believe it was about half done on Thanksgiving day, and we had received an invitation to a merry-making at one of the neighbors, four miles distant. It was the custom to attend all such affairs, so I suppose it was only natural that mother should be put out when I stubbornly refused to go. I insisted I had much rather stay at home and work on my coverlid, but the truth was I knew Henry would be there and would make things anything but pleasant for me with his unwelcome attentions. Mother knew also what the trouble was, but I carried the day and early in the morning father, mother and the boys drove away, and I returned to my work singing as I did so. I am afraid I smiled to myself more than once as I thought of Henry's chagrin when he found that I had failed to appear, but I worked fast, my fingers fairly flying, and when I stopped to get my dinner I found my work had grown quite a bit.

It is not always a pleasant thing to eat one's Thanksgiving dinner alone, and I admit that I should hate to do so now, but still I enjoyed my meal that day hugely. Mother had left everything for me, so I had nothing to do but eat it. I had finished and sat dreamily watching the fire that roared in the huge fire place for a few minutes before returning to my work, when I was startled by the door opening and in walked two stalwart Indians. To say I was frightened was putting it mildly, for a few moments such unreasoning terror had possession of me that I could not stir. We had rarely been visited by the redmen and they were always peaceable, but that did not seem to occur to me at that time. I think they noticed how frightened I was, for the face of one of them lighted up with something like a smile, which appeared to me as one of fiendish delight at finding me thus alone, and he muttered something to the other, then addressed me: 'White squaw get Ingun something to eat,' was what he said. I did not dare to disobey, and in a short time although trembling so that I could hardly stand, I had set before them the best that I had.

"They watched me as they ate, or at least I imagined that they did, and I was sure that their muttered words were about me. I had not the slightest doubt but what as soon as they finished eating they would kill me and then set fire to the buildings, and I tried to think of some way to get away. At length the way seemed to open, for one of them called for some water and there was none in the house. My heart leaped as I explained that I must go to the spring after it. He grunted an understanding and I took the pail and went out, closing the door carefully behind me. Once outside, however, I did not go toward the spring, instead, I ran down the road as fast as I could, never once pausing to look back and every moment expecting to hear the cry of the pursuing savages.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and to Family Worship

SUNDAY, JANUARY 16.

Theme for the Day.

To live our lives as in the sight of God; to enter the place of worship with reverence and joy, and to make every act of life a response to the call of Christ.

Scripture.

God is spirit, and they that worship him must worship in spirit and truth.—John 4:24.

Lines.

Love, we are in God's hand.
How strange now, looks the life he makes us lead;
So free we seem, so fettered fast we are!
I feel he laid the fetter: let it lie!
—Robert Browning—"Andrea Del Sarto."

Prayer.

Almighty God, who canst give the light that in darkness shall make us glad, the life that in gloom shall make us joy, the peace that amidst discord shall bring us quietness, let us live this week in that light, that life and that peace, so that we may gain the victory over those things that press us down, over temptation and over all indifference. May our private worship grow more sweet and rewarding, and our presence in the house of God more desirable and satisfying, as we rise from duty to privilege and from faith to the vision of Thyself. Amen.

MONDAY, JANUARY 17.

Theme for the Day.

The joy and value of friendship.

Scripture.

My companion and my familiar friend, we took sweet counsel together.—Psalm 55:13, 14.

Lines.

For we were nursed upon the self-same hill,
Fed the same flock, by fountain, shade, and rill;
Together both, ere the high lawns appear'd
Under the opening eyelids of the morn,
Oft till the star, that rose at evening bright,
Toward heaven's descent had slop'd his westering wheel.
—John Milton ("Lycidas").

Prayer.

Our Father, we are grateful for the friends Thou hast given us, and for all they add to our happiness. Assist us in the cultivation of such a spirit as shall make friendship with us a desirable possession. And help us to know that true religion is nothing else but friendship with God and with our fellow men. Amen.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 18.

Theme for the Day.

Such intimacy of spirit with Jesus as transforms us from our old selves into his likeness.

Scripture.

I have been crucified with Christ; yet I live; and yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me.—Gal. 2:20.

Lines.

By all of Him we have in Thee,
Leave nothing of myself in me.
Let me so read thy life, that I
Unto all life of mine may die.
—Richard Crashaw ("The Flaming Heart").

Prayer.

Loving Father, life is very sweet to us, but we learn daily to see more of its true meaning as we come to know more fully the mind of Christ. He has taught us all that we know of Thee. Believing that his message of Thee is to be implicitly trusted, we draw near to him in faith and love, and know that in likeness to him we cannot be far from Thee. Satisfy our souls, we pray Thee, with the realization of this desire. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 19.

Theme for the Day.

Love, the secret of the life of God.

Scripture.

I have loved thee with an everlasting love: therefore with loving kindness have I drawn thee.—Jer. 31:3.

Lines.

Thou art too hard for me in Love;
There is no dealing with Thee in that Art,
That is Thy Masterpiece, I see.
When I contrive and plot to prove Something that may be conquest on my part,
Thou still, O Lord, outstrippest me.
—George Herbert ("Love").

Prayer.

Gracious Lord, we have come to know something of the meaning of love, because we know Thy own love, manifested in Jesus. We love, because Thou hast first loved us. Teach us all its divine mystery, its sacrifice, its suffering and its joy, that we may thus learn Thy secret, and become more like Thee. Amen.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 20.

Theme for the Day.

The certainty and glory of our "house not made with hands."

Scripture.

For we know that if the earthly house of our tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. For verily in this we groan, longing to be clothed upon with our habitation which is from heaven.—2 Cor. 5:1, 2.

Lines.

As this my carnal robe grows old,
Soil'd, rent, and worn by length of years,
Let me on that by faith lay hold
Which man in life immortal wears.
—George Wither ("The Prayer of Old Age").

Prayer.

Father, our days are gliding swiftly by, and each one brings us nearer the bound of life. Yet Thou art showing us that the life that is hidden with Christ in Thee has no bounds of time or space, but goes onward into larger and better life. In this assurance we rejoice. Help us to grow more confident in our hope of life eternal, and more certain that our best purposes cannot fail of realization. Amen.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 21.

Theme for the Day.

The spirit of fearlessness which Jesus manifested, and which may also be ours.

Scripture.

Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be fearful.—John 14:27.

Lines.

And all is well, tho' faith and form
Be sunder'd in the night of fear:
Well roars the storm to those that hear
A deeper voice across the storm.
—Alfred Tennyson ("In Memoriam").

Prayer.

Our Father, we trust in Thy providence and love. In Thy hand are the deep places of the earth, and the strength of the hills is Thine also. We thank Thee for the life of our Lord; and for his death. We are brought near to Thee by his cross, and have entrance into the holiest through his resurrection. Inspire us with his unfailing confidence and hope. Help us to overcome all fear in the spirit of love and faith which he evermore revealed. Believing in Thee with all our hearts, may we in the strength of that faith achieve the victory that overcometh the world. Amen.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 22.

Theme for the Day.

The value of goodness.

Scripture.

Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the wicked, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful. . . . He shall be like a tree planted by the streams of water.—Psalm 1:1, 3.

Lines.

Man is his own star, and the soul that can Render an honest and a perfect man,
Commands all light, all influence, all fate;
Nothing to him falls early or too late;
Our acts our angels are, or good or ill,
Our fatal shadows that walk by us still.
—John Fletcher ("Upon an Honest Man's Fortune").

Prayer.

Our Father who art in heaven, we want to live lives of goodness, gentleness, truth, and courage. We want to be useful, because there is much to do, and we have not long to stay. We want to be happy, and we know that goodness is the best road to happiness. We want to help our fellowmen to achieve the same virtues which we desire. Thou wilt help us in the attainment of our good purposes, for we ask in the name of our Savior, Jesus Christ. Amen.

A STORY OF THE TRUSTS

BY JANE RICHARDSON

CHAPTER VIII (Continued).

"Not another word, Mr. Mullins! We talk of rounding up cattle, not men! My employees are my friends; I went to school with some of them; we grew up together and I would not lift a finger to interfere with one of them in the free exercise of his opinions. If I can change their views fairly and honestly, well and good! For myself, I have always held my present opinions from principle. I've remained in the party because there's nothing better, but I believe in an honest party. If you expect me to use coërcion in any guise, you have mistaken your man! The committee may send here any literature, any pamphlets—they want circulated and I will give them out. My men are intelligent and if your printed stuff is worth anything they'll know it and profit by it; if it is rot, they'll know that! This is the most—it is all that I shall promise. And I must ask you now, to excuse me."

Virtually dismissed, Mullins rose, and said angrily:

"I'm sorry I intruded. I meant no offense!"

Elsewhere his money might have "talked" to some purpose; but with Dick Randall, an American employer of the best type, still unperverted, it was impotent.

As Mullins drove away, the horses tossing their heads, jingling their silver-mounted harness, he muttered wrathfully:

"The dog—the stuck-up hound! Thinks he's better than I am, does he?—I'll show him! I'll get even with him for this day's work! He'll have cause to remember it!"

CHAPTER IX.

In the Meantime.

Meanwhile Bannister was received by Mrs. Crofton with the most flattering cordiality. Recently she had shown a desire to sit down stairs, enjoying the warmth and cheerfulness of the open fire which the chilly mornings and evenings of September made necessary. She was swathed as usual in a soft shawl, and was busy with a complicated piece of knitting. She did not rise when Bannister was shown into the room, but extended her hand and greeted him in the most friendly manner.

"I noticed in the Clarion that you were here," she said as he seated himself near her, "but in these days when men think and talk of nothing but politics, I did not dare to hope that you would find time to remember me!"

"I take the time to remember you far oftener than you would believe, dear Mrs. Crofton, even in the heat of the campaign!" he said meaningly. "I had a meeting at Hooperburg last night and am now on my way back to Indianapolis. I have been Mr. Mullins' guest and we have just taken a little spin behind his new horses. He dropped me here."

"Yes, I noticed them—beautiful creatures! We do not know their owner personally; I think that he worked for Col. Crofton a good many years ago—a teamster, or something of that sort," she remarked with subtle insolence, at which Bannister could hardly restrain a smile.

"He has grown very rich, I believe, but we have never called on the family."

"No," he replied, not quite so loyal to them as he should have been since he had not scrupled to eat their salt, "I couldn't imagine you would find them especially congenial."

Mrs. Crofton gave a little sigh, and changed the subject by resuming her knitting, saying:

"I can both talk and listen better if my hands are employed, if you will permit; I am now too old to correct the tiresome habit."

"No one would admit that! Mrs. Crofton," gallantly disputed Bannister.

Fortunately Mrs. Crofton had never been exacting as to the quality of compliments so she smiled affably, wielding her knitting needles gracefully.

Throughout the summer Bannister had found many pretexts for writing to her, sending her gifts of books and magazines which were courteously acknowledged, sometimes with a casual mention of Eleanor, who was the real subject of his assiduity. He sat at his ease talking for some time on different topics. The subject that was foremost in both their minds had not been put into plain, blunt words, but, as with Mullins in another scheme, there was a perfect understanding between them.

"Was your meeting successful?—but I need hardly ask you that."

"Oh, very!—at least the band was there, and the glee club, the old soldiers, and all the other able-bodied voters in the township; so I suppose it may be counted a success. To tell the truth, campaigning is very irksome to me. It would ruin me politically if it were known, but I haven't much genuine interest in all classes and conditions of men; there are too many of both and most of them are quite impossible."

Mrs. Crofton did not in the least comprehend this dark saying, but she smiled acutely.

"I hate shaking hands, having my fingers crushed in the paws of some Ursus Major, or fumbled in the damp clutch of another and worse sort of a citizen. I am discriminating, too, in regard to the babies offered for the candidate's kiss; and I don't like the women who attend the meetings. As I can't remember either names or faces, I fear I have not the requisite qualifications for a successful campaigner."

"But I'm sure, Mr. Bannister, your speeches must be wonderfully clever; I remember your graduation oration as if it were yesterday."

This was not an opportune remark, as at that time, the relations between him and Eleanor were very strained indeed. It was the beginning of their final alienation. Bannister had the grace to be embarrassed slightly, but Mrs. Crofton showed none and went on with her praise, which was saved from fulsomeness only by the charm of her tone and manner.

"You were wonderfully eloquent; you had such a flow of language—it was quite remarkable! Col. Crofton said then, that there was a brilliant future before you and you certainly bid fair to verify the prophecy."

It was another questionable compliment, in the making of which Mrs. Crofton seemed specially gifted.

Bannister felt with a pang of regret, that a good many years had passed in which the prophecy might have been at least partially fulfilled.

After his wife's death his mind had gone back instinctively to Eleanor Crofton, who by contrast, was supremely endowed in mind and character. That he was even less worthy of her after the misspent years that had lapsed did not occur to him; nor did the moral disparity which existed between them. He now decided that she would help him reform, make amends and lead a better life. He had the whole devil's apology at his tongue's end.

At last he brought himself to ask: "Is Miss Crofton at home?"

"No," returned Mrs. Crofton placidly, adding, as she had once before, "I know she will be very sorry to have missed you."

Bannister was not equally convinced of this.

"I suppose you have heard of the wonderful club that she has organized amongst the girls in this neighborhood?"

"Yes; I've heard of it."

"She has gone to see one of them this morning, about some new fad they have taken up," said Mrs. Crofton plaintively." "I tell her she is unfitting them for their proper station in life, but she will not listen to me."

Bannister devoutly hoped that this was a mere figure of speech for if it were true he should fail in securing her as an advocate; and on that he had confidently relied.

"Yes; I think that sort of a thing most unwise," he acquiesced—"there is nothing more mischievous than educating the lower classes."

"That is what I tell Eleanor constantly; I'm sure we agree upon this subject, Mr. Bannister, as we do on others as vital."

What these questions were she did not specify, but Bannister felt that he was certain as to one at least.

"I'm afraid Miss Eleanor is overdoing," he said gently, "she never was very robust, and the participation in the troubles and worries of all Wakefield must tell strongly on her strength."

"It does, indeed; but I've ceased to remonstrate—" then fearing that she might have blundered she said quickly:

"Please don't think that she is ill, or anything of that sort. She never was in the least degree an invalid. What she gets through with in the course of a day would try the strength of a strong man, yet she never complains of being tired!"

Bannister remembered vividly that it never was her habit to complain. He recalled with admiration which intensified his re-awakened passion, that her patience under chafing conditions was heroic.

"There is quite a rivalry between her club and a class of young men from the shops who are studying all sorts of foolish and useless things with Judge Brainard. He and Eleanor are in constant consultation. It's very absurd! They see each other often enough, I'm sure, to arrange the management of a half dozen clubs!" she said with well-assumed ingenuousness.

In a flash he recalled the encounter of commencement evening—Brainard's manifest annoyance and embarrassment.

It was a clever stroke on the part of Mrs. Crofton. She knew men wonderfully well on their weaker side and was firm in the belief that there were few who, taken unawares, could not be swayed and controlled by an appeal to the great fundamental instincts—love, hatred, jealousy, revenge.

Had not Bannister made up his mind resolutely before, this hint of growing intimacy between Eleanor and Brainard would have roused his determination. He was stung instantly with jealousy. His resolution was fixed; and Mrs. Crofton, pensively regarding her knitting, mentally congratulated herself that she had said the right thing.

"As I have told you, Mrs. Crofton," Bannister spoke hurriedly and nervously, "I return to Indianapolis at noon, and I confess I wished to see you alone and came on a very special errand. I trusted that Eleanor would not be present. Is there the slightest hope for me?"

"Hope for you, my dear friend, what are you talking about? The election?—some affair you have in hand with Mr. Mullins?"—and she laughed with gentle malice under which Bannister colored, but she gave him no opportunity to explain himself and continued:

"You know I'm totally ignorant of politics; I don't know the difference between a ballot and a precinct, and I do not care to know. I remember that Mr. Mullins used to work for Col. Crofton; and that he has become rich but, as I've already explained, we do not visit them." She laughed again as softly and maliciously as before.

"You know perfectly, dear Mrs. Crofton, what I mean," he said with a geniality that masked his vexation.

She had never forgiven him for not holding Eleanor to her engagement, as she was convinced he could have done. His marriage had furnished ground for an additional grudge. Her revenge had been long delayed, but it had come! She was delighted to see him humbled, pleading, and covered with confusion.

"But, my dear Horace—Forgive me!—but it seemed so natural to go back to the old times—the old name—"

To go back to the old times was what he most wished to avoid as she was perfectly well aware.

"To go back to the old times—" she repeated meditatively, then sighed softly. "But," she continued vivaciously, "I'm not a mind reader nor have I the gift of 'second sight'—the last acquirement of old age; I haven't the slightest idea what you mean. You must pardon my stupidity."

"Do you think—that Eleanor could be induced to—"

"Give up the Neighborly Club? She would not for me—she might, perhaps,—for you!"

Bannister was getting irritated by her silly trifling though he dared not show it; but, he thought, there are reasonable bounds to all punishment.

"Could she be induced to consider—a proposal—" he persisted, and Mrs. Crofton became grave in a moment, her malice was satisfied; she knew when to stop.

He hesitated; it was hard to utter what he wanted to say.

"A proposal—" she repeated, promptingly, "there are many sorts of proposals. You are not very explicit, my dear Horace."

"I want to marry her!" he said with blunt directness that left no ground for further parleying.

"You will pardon me for recalling circumstances which must be as painful for me as for yourself." She spoke in the mildest voice now once more, and with well-dissembled regret. "You are aware that you made such a proposal before—long ago—you cannot have forgotten what great unhappiness it brought,—at least to some of us."

"A man at that age," said Bannister, speaking thickly, ashamed and feeling all the misery of the false position into which he had fatuously thrust himself, "is a fool—a calf! He does not know his own mind—or rather, he has no mind to know! There has not been a moment of my life since that time that I have not realized what I lost when I gave up Eleanor. The loss of her ruined me; if she would only relent,—forgive me,—let me make amends—"

"Oh, dear me, don't talk of 'making amends!' I'm sure Eleanor would not admit that you had done anything that called for amends!"

He winced; how unerringly she could aim and deliver her savage pin-pricks.

"No; of course I don't mean that!" he began eagerly.

"I think that Eleanor has rejoiced in her free, untrammeled life."

"Untrammeled!" thought Bannister. "Is the woman made of flint?"

The smooth voice went on: "Aside from the anxiety that our dreadful poverty has given us both—and my feeble health that has made me somewhat of a burden, most unwillingly, I assure you"—he smiled skeptically in spite of himself, but she did not see it—"I think Eleanor has been a happy woman, and since she has taken up this club she seems more than ever contented. I noticed only yesterday that she seemed really younger than at eighteen!"

How vividly Bannister recalled her at eighteen; the slender graceful figure, the lovely face, the masses of silken hair; he had forgotten nothing, as Mrs. Crofton well knew.

"I have said so myself," he replied earnestly. "But I think you will acknowledge that the separation was not wholly my fault. When she could have done so, she made no effort to hold me." He stopped; even he felt that it was the speech of a poltroon. As if the proud, high-spirited girl would have betrayed what he had made her suffer, or have lifted a finger, or have stirred an eyelash to have held the allegiance of any man whose loyalty she believed there was reason to suspect!

"She made it easy for me," he said passionately, "and perhaps you do not know that, when I did realize I had made a dreadful mistake, she sent back my letters unread!"

"No, I did not know it," she said, "I have never had her entire confidence. But when she fully decides a matter she does not often reconsider it."

"But now everything is changed," urged Bannister. "It is as if I were another man. I am another man, older, wiser, better able to appreciate her, and above all, better able to take care of her!"

That was the main argument in Mrs. Crofton's own mind; but, of course she would not have confessed it, even to herself.

"I admit the truth of what you say. But no one can speak for Eleanor in this matter. She is as yielding and tractable as a child to a certain point; beyond that no human power can move her."

"But only tell me you are on my side."

"Once more?"

"Once more!" he said swallowing his mortification in impotent bitterness of spirit.

"What must I do? What shall I say?"

"Tell her how truly I love her, how I long for her happiness, that if she will only give me another chance I will leave nothing undone that lies in my power to make her happy."

"I will tell her," said Mrs. Crofton; "but I cannot foretell her answer."

She was sincere in her opinion that Eleanor's decision could not be forecast, but she would deliver the message reinforced by every argument at her command. She did not confide this to Bannister, however; she preferred that he should look upon her championship as something reluctantly and doubtfully conceded.

Bannister thanked her gratefully and then seeing Mullins' horses at the door he rose to go, begging her to write as soon as she had anything to tell him. "But do not hurry her," he said as a final word of warning.

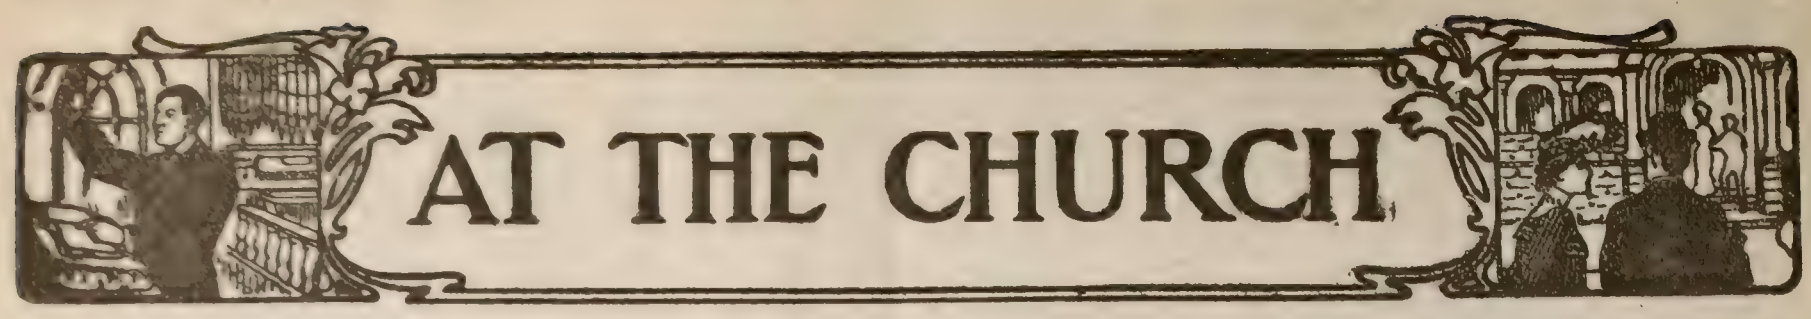
THE FRENCH FOR IT.

A French lady living in America engaged a carpenter to do some work for her at a stipulated price. She was surprised later to find that he charged more than the price agreed upon. When she attempted to remonstrate with him, however, her English failed her and she said, "You are dearer to me now than when we were first engaged."—Success.

"What Shall the Preacher Preach?"



By F. B. Thomas.

Editors Christian Century: Your editorial of December 30, "Does the Preacher Know?" is most interesting and brings up to me still another question which I would like to have answered—"What Should that Preacher Preach?" I have tried to picture in my mind the preacher mentioned in the quoted letter, and to imagine his message which falls so short of the desire of the writer. What do you suppose he preaches? Do you suppose he preaches what are ordinarily called first principles to the exclusion of any other conception of the gospel? Don't you suppose he preaches whatsoever things are true, honorable, just, pure, lively, of good report, every thinkable virtuous thing, as essential to Christianity of whatever age? And do you suppose he is a missionary preacher leading his people to the unselfishness of Christ as they send the message of salvation around the world? Really, I am worried about this whole matter. I wish I knew what vital thing it is he leaves out of his sermons and why he fails in his preaching to win his people. "What to preach" seems to be a most debatable question at present. This poor preacher may love his Christ and his people with unusual devotion and may sacrifice beyond the ordinary for the success of the kingdom, but he lacks something to make his ministry popular and effective. What is it? Isn't the gospel something static—fixed and determined? Don't you suppose this preacher preaches often of how the gospel leads to a fuller life; how it emphasizes the brotherhood of man and how the manner of life that now is must be patterned after the beautiful life of Jesus; how the Christian shall go onward into the unity of faith, and the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a full-grown man, "unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ?"

Or might the trouble be in the disgruntled layman who has been filling himself up with a certain phase of the gospel, making himself the specialized crank instead of the preacher? Could this wail which you print be a protest from a certain class of individuals in the church who, ever restless and feeling the power of their own creature genius, want to get away from the moorings and make a re-statement of Christianity?

Now I am writing for information. I want to know what has been added to or taken from the "first century gospel" which makes it better adapted for this present generation. I want to know if there has been anything of love added or taken out? Any commands which in the first century were urged, unnecessary now? Is the Christ of the New Testament too small for the present age? I want to know if you think there ever will be a statement of the gospel which will remain unchangeable? Do you have any idea Christ could recognize his gospel out of the mouths of men after 1900 years of human mutilation? There is so much turning and twisting and hacking, at the Christian religion, so much of disagreement between the highest intellectuality—the highest the greatest the disagreement—so much uncertainty as to "grounds for faith," don't you think that by and by "all unity of faith" will be lost and that some time in the future religion will be without organized expression, resolving itself into a more personal acceptance of obligations toward God which are pleasing for the individual to undergo?

I am a perplexed preacher when I read the current literature and my message may show a tinge of my perplexity; but when I read the gospel out of the New Testament my message is straightforward and convincing as is attested by the success of my ministry here. Will you please answer my question, "What Should that Preacher Preach?"

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The New Message*

One of the significant features of the First Gospel is its habit of grouping the teachings of Jesus in some three or four small collections, rather than distributing them throughout the narrative of the public ministry. The latter is the method of the other Gospels. Especially is it true of the Gospel of Luke, which, perhaps more than any of the rest, preserves for us the sequence of events in the life of Jesus. On the other hand, the Gospel of Matthew gathers into one series of utterances the teachings of Jesus regarding the kingdom of God (chapters 5-7), into another, the instruction of the Master to the Twelve and to the Seventy (chapter 10), into a third, a representative group of parables (chapter 13), and into a fourth, the substance of Jesus' discourses regarding the "Last Things" (chapters 24, 25).

Sermon and Text.

The "Sermon on the Mount," as it has come to be called, is probably both the report of what Jesus said on some particular occasion and of what he was accustomed to say in all of his preaching. It dealt with the great theme of the kingdom of heaven, and the sort of conduct which made one worthy of citizenship. If one were to search for the text of this wonderful body of teaching, he would probably find the nearest approach to such a central utterance in the words, "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven," (5:20). But the sermon is not an orderly discourse. It is rather a collection of impressive sayings regarding the nature of that society which Jesus desired to see take the place of the one which he found in the world of his day.

The Contrast

And surely no more startling message could have been imagined that he gave as the interpretation of the social order he wished to inaugurate. If the watchwords of that age were to be gathered for inspection, they would be found to include such terms as wealth, enjoyment, pride, feasting, cruelty, welfare, oppression and lust. Jesus had the audacity to insist, for the first time in history, that these were not the keys that unlocked the doors to success, but their exact opposites. In this marvelous declaration he affirms with the emphasis of finality that poverty, mourning, meekness, hunger and thirst, mercy, purity, peacableness, and suffering for the sake of righteousness are the secrets of happiness and power. And the astonishing thing is that twenty centuries of experiment since that day have proved beyond question that he was right, and the world of his day and of many days since was hopelessly wrong.

Place and Occasion.

We do not know when Jesus spoke these words. He had moved his home from Nazareth to Capernaum. He had been going about Galilee with some of the disciples on a preaching journey. Probably on some occasion soon after his return his growing fame attracted to his home an increasing crowd of curious people, and he took them up the hillside where they could have greater freedom from annoyance and confusion. The double mountain peaks called the "Horns of Hattin," some miles south-west of the Sea of Galilee, have been regarded as the scene of this discourse. But there is no reason to suppose that Jesus would travel miles into the country merely to reach a conspicuous mountain, when the slopes back of Capernaum would afford an ample and far more appropriate place for such a gathering. It is not of particular moment that in the narrative in Luke, which might be regarded as parellel to this, the discourse was given in the plain, after a night of prayer in the mountain, and the choice of the Twelve. The attention of the two evangelists may have been fixed upon different features of the occasion, or they may refer to different discourses.

Abruptness of the Sayings.

It is of interest to notice that we have the older and simpler utterances of Jesus in the Third rather than the First Gospel. As reported by Luke, Jesus said "Blessed are ye poor," not "poor in spirit," which expression partially turns the edge of the abrupt and startling words of the Lord. "Blessed are ye that hunger," is far more convincing as a saying of Jesus that the longer and more obvious, "ye that hunger and thirst after righteousness." Jesus saw with supreme insight into human life that men were searching for happiness and success down pathways where these blesisngs were not to be found. He wanted to turn their thought to his own way of life as the revelation of the pathway to the highest good for himself and all the world. And those who have taken him seriously and have tried the experiment of really following his program have come with a shock of surprise to the discovery that he really knows.

Rewards or Results.

It is an additional surprise to see that what Jesus announced as the result of these courses of action does not come as a reward but as the inevitable consequence of such an attitude of mind, or such a condition of life. The poor are not promised the Kingdom of God as a future good; they already have it. The rich are not debarred from it, but they are so busy with other things that they miss it. The mourners are the ones who seek comfort because they need it, and to all such the Kingdom of God, the divine enterprise in the world, offers instant opportunity for present satisfying service and future consolation in the regaining of the lost. The meek, the quiet in soul, the humble-minded, are already the true possessors of the best the world affords. They are neither exhausted with the effort to excell in the acquisition of "goods," which so often turn out to be only second-best things, but they are free from the responsibilities to which wealth compels subjection.

And so of all the rest. Neither the world nor the church is prepared to take Jesus seriously in these matters as yet. Both acknowledge the "general value" of the teachings of the Lord, and trim off the edges of his sayings about the harder things, like poverty, sorrow and purity. But the saints of all the years have known, and the number of those who are willing to pay the price of sainthood grows a little from year to year. And every soul knows something of the truth when the experiments have been tried and the accounts cast up. For at the end of every pathway in which we have sought happiness and success these wonderful beatitudes face us afresh, and we know that He who spoke them is right.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

DOES RELIGION PAY?

By W. D. Endres.

Topic, January 23: 1 Cor. 3:13-23.

What is the good of affirming at length that religion does or does not pay? Rather let us observe what it does and each can decide for himself whether or not it is worth while.

It transforms the individual life. Scarcely any one who will read these lines can not call to his mind any where from one to a half dozen individuals in his own community who have been transformed from veritable demons into saints. Drunken, shiftless, worthless men have been made over into men of frugal habits, inspired by high motives and worthy ideals. Thoughtless, idle, desolute women have been restored in character and life purpose, by the transforming power of religion. Jerry McAully was redeemed from the life of a prize-fighter, a drunkard, and a gambler—an all-around vicious sport—and he spent the many years of his remaining life rescuing erstwhile companions from their miserable degradation. Harry Monroe, who conducts the Pacific Garden Mission at 100 Van Buren street, Chicago, was leading a similar life "when the light shone in on him" and from the day of his conversion until the present hour, his mission has been open seven nights in the week, and each night from three to a dozen are lifted from the filth of Chicacgo slums and started on the way to a better life, the vast majority of whom are permanently redeemed. William A. Sunday, one of the most noted evangelists of this country, in his early days was a base-ball player and a sport, but religion, through the Pacific Garden Mission, redeemed him to a righteous life, and he is today preaching the gospel of Jesus with a zeal and an enthusiasm that would rival the prophets of Israel.

Whether you make religion the cause or not, as a matter of fact, the highest form of civilization, i. e., that which is the most efficient in the development and enrichment of human life, is found among the Christian nations, while the non-Christian nations present the lowest. We should remember also that the islands of the sea, since the planting of the gospel by such men as John Williams, J. G. Pattison, and John G. Paton, have passed from the lowest to the highest forms of civilization. Moreover, the larger nations which are laden with the heathen forms of vice are being chcanged into modes of life which are conducive to the highest good since the introduction of our religion.

This is what religion—at least our religion—actually does, and you may answer the question, Does it pay?

Church Life

It is none too early for the pastors to begin earnest preparation for the Foreign Missionary offering.

"Our Readers Opinions," this week contains several articles that will be interesting reading for many members of the Christian Century family.

Educational Day, January 16, should be observed by every church. Too long have the Disciples given their educational interests second or third place in their offerings. The Illinois Educational Association may be depended upon to urge the interests of Eureka College. Every Disciple of the state should be a member of this organization.

Once more we ask the preachers to send us summaries of their annual reports. Give us the facts about your work during the last year. The growth of the church, and the Sunday-school, tne amount of money raised for current expense and for missions; any special lines of work pursued during the past year, and the present spiritual tone of the church. These reports will be published next week or the following week.

A number of hearty appreciations of our new department, The Daily Altar, have been received, ranging all the way from the enthusiast who wrote, "Hurrah for the Daily Altar," to the college professor who tells us that he began to use it in his home on the morning of January 1. "It is refreshing, a change and I believe can be made very helpful," he says. "Hitherto we have had a program of weekly readings (Sunday mornings) in connection with the daily breakfast devotions (grace) but your plan strikes me as excellent." If we can have some part in deepening the religious life of the homes of our readers by this department we shall be fully repaid for our pains.

W. S. Johnson has been leading in a fine meeting at Webster City, Iowa.

E. P. Wise is leading the church at East Liverpool, Ohio, in preparing for a new house of worship.

E. T. Murphy has been supplying the pulpit of the Monroe Street Church for several weeks past.

The Sunday-school at Ann Arbor, Mich., has trebled its attendance in a campaign led by Miss Eva Lembert.

Judge Strode was the principal speaker at a meeting of the Berean Brotherhood of the First Church, Lincoln, Neb., Monday, January 3.

Evangelist S. G. Slayter has accepted a call to the First Church, Minneapolis, where Perry J. Rice, now of El Paso, Texas, was the former pastor.

Led by the Enthusiastic Joseph L. Garvin the board of the First Church, Seattle, Wash., is working to place a church paper in every home in the church.

Charles Clayton Morrison, editor of the Christian Century, will supply the pulpit of the First Church, Bloomington, Ind., Sunday, January 16.

The congregation of Plainview, Texas, has a new $15,000 building ready for dedication the first of March. Jewell Howard has been called to the pastorate.

J. E. Davis began his fifth year of service with the church at Beatrice, Neb., January 1. Sunday evening, January 2, he presented to his congregation a review of "The Calling of Dan Matthews."

A. I. Martin, minister at Lanark, Ill., now has a beautiful oak desk with typewriter attachment, etc., in his study. A Christmas gift from the church.

R. H. Heicke and Charles E. McVay, singer, are in a meeting at Fort Madison, Iowa. Mr. McVay has an open date for March as singer and helper.

"Christ, the New Year, and I" was the simple style in which J. C. Todd, at Bloomington, Ind., announced his New Year's sermon. His text was, "Christ liveth in me."

We have a fine report of the church at Sullivan, Ind., were J. M. Vawter is the pastor, which we shall publish with the other summaries that are to appear in a week or two.

There were more than one hundred accessions to the church at Okmulgee, Okla., in a meeting which was held there just on the eve of Pastor B. F. Hill's departure for evangelistic work.

E. B. Barnes, pastor of the Lyon Street Church, Grand Rapids, Michigan, has sent in his summary of the annual report of his church, and adds the cheering words, "We have had a great year and begin the new with high expectations."

The First Church, Lincoln, Nebraska, took up a special offering the last Sunday in the old year to meet expenses of the Yeuell meetings, and other obligations, that the church might come up to the new year entirely free from debt.

The Netz sisters, too well known, among the Disciples to need commendation, are assisting the churches of East Liverpool, Ohio, in simultaneous gospel meetings. On Sunday afternoons and evenings the meetings were held in the largest theater in the city.

J. R. Golden closed his first year of work with the West Side Church, Springfield, Ill., December 31. All departments of the church have shown fine progress in this time and the church extended Mr. Golden an indefinite call at its annual meeting, January 5.

P. C. Macfarlane and Mrs. Macfarlane honored our office with a call last week. Mr. Macfarlane is enthusiastically pushing the great work of the Men's Brotherhood, and incidentally making himself quite indispensable to the progress of the cause of the Disciples.

The young people of the Second Church, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, F. E. Smith, pastor, gave a reception to the members of the church Friday evening, December 31. A dinner was served followed by interesting speeches with the pastor as toastmaster.

It is the custom of the Lyon Street Church, Grand Rapids, Michigan, to hold a memorial service the first Sunday of the new year, in honor of the members who have passed beyond during the past year. The pastor, E. B. Barnes, says that the service has great value to the church.

S. H. Zendt after a five years' pastorate at Oskaloosa, Iowa, has accepted a call to the Second Church, Bloomington, Ill. During the five years of this pastorate there were 553 accessions to the church in Oskaloosa, and the pastor and his wife greatly endeared themselves to the people of the church and the community.

The First Church, Milwaukee joined the other churches of its neighborhood in union prayer meeting the first week in January.

Gary L. Cook, superintendent of Bible-schools for Indiana, spent Sunday, January 2, at Carlisle, where L. V. Barbe is pastor. Mr. Cook's work is being received with generous appreciation.

"The Christian Visitor," Vol. 1, No. 1, published by the church at Liberty, Mo., has just reached our desk. The Visitor is to be published weekly and the members and friends of the church are asked to subscribe at fifty cents per year. The paper is well gotten up, and will doubtless prove of great service to the church, of which R. Graham Frank is the pastor.

President R. H. Crossfield is to begin a meeting with the Ninth Street Church, Washington, D. C., January 9. The church has made extensive and careful preparations for the meeting. Geo. A. Miller is the pastor. Mr. Crossfield has just closed a meeting with I. J. Spencer and the Central Church, Lexington, in which there were 66 accessions to the church.

The church at Lyons, Kan., of which J. Walter Reynolds is pastor, begins the New Year by publishing "The Lyons Christian." The initial number is an interesting sheet. This church has a good building, well equipped for modern work. Mr. Reynolds, a "Hiram" man, has been with the church since June. They enter the new year with bright prospects.

The Church at Colfax, Ill., where Norman H. Robertson is minister, recently closed a short meeting in which W. B. Clemmer of Rock Island, Ill., did the preaching. The church is greatly strengthened and stimulated by the work of Mr. Clemmer. His work is strong and constructive and he ought to be kept busy all the time. There were 26 additions.

J. H. Berkey, pastor of the Union Church, Monroe, Wisconsin, has resigned to accept a position with the "Lincoln Temperance Chautauqua System." Many of our readers will remember that Mr. Berkey led in the forming of this Union Church from several small churches, one of which was a Disciple Church, and another a Baptist. The work has been well united, and Mr. Berkey can now give his time to other work without endangering the unity of the church.

The following subjects are announced for the prayer meetings of the First Church, Bloomington, Ind., during the first quarter of the new year: A series of book studies; a different book each evening. "Uganda's White Man at Work," "The Transformation of Hawaii," "With the Tibetians in Tent and Temple," "Bolenge," "Korea," "The Why and How of Foreign Missions," "The Uplift of China," "Breaking Down Chinese Walls," "Our Mission and Missionary in China."

The men's class at the Christian Church, Bellevue, Pa., William Ross Lloyd, minister, has grown from twelve in two years to 237. Dr. Gerwig, the teacher has been for eighteen years secretary Allegheny school board, and President Taft has just appointed him census supervisor of the city. The men's class sent out about forty baskets for Thanksgiving and Christmas to the poor. Enough in each basket to last an ordinary family for about a week.

The following Sunday evening lecture-sermons were delivered by M. E. Chatley, pastor of the church at Bowling Green, Ohio, during November and December: "The Ideal Young Man," "The Ideal Young Woman," "The Ideal Husband," "The Ideal Wife," "The Ideal Home, "The Ideal Church Member." The lectures were well received. This church begins a meeting with home forces Sunday, February 6.

GRADE YOUR SCHOOL
On the Installment Plan!

Every informed Sunday-school worker desires to have the graded system introduced into his school. But it seems like too big an undertaking to grade the school all at once. Hence nothing at all is done, and the school goes on in the same old absurd way of teaching the children the lessons provided for grown-up people.

The International S. S. Committee has made it possible to bring the graded system in, like the Kingdom of God comes, "without observation." You can have your school graded without any agony—almost without knowing it, except in its beneficent results. Begin at the bottom now—with the elementary grades, the pupils under twelve years old. Provide teachers and pupils with the Bethany Graded Lessons, based on the outlines already authorized by the International Committee. Later on—perhaps in nine months or a year from now—when the Committee authorizes an outline of lessons for the Intermediate grades you will be ready to adopt them and the Bethany Series will be ready with the helps for you. And so on, through the Senior and Advanced grades, follow the International Committee and as fast as they provide the lessons you will be ready to adopt them.

Our advice to all schools, then, is: FOLLOW THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE. No independent course yet devised is better than that provided by the International Committee, if indeed there is one so good in all respects. Besides, there is advantage in the whole Sunday-school world studying together when our leaders really lead—as the International Committee is now doing.

The Bethany Graded Lessons may be commenced at any time. Purchase the main bulk of your supplies wherever you wish, but let us furnish you these fascinating lessons for your pupils under twelve. THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO., 700 East Fortieth Street, Chicago.

The offering of the First Church, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, for Ministerial Relief was $114. This places the church on the honor roll of those giving $100 or more and makes the church a living link in Ministerial Relief. There were only eleven such churches in the brotherhood last year. The church is also on the honor roll of the "Veteran Legion Supporters," having supported the work for five or more consecutive years.

The men of the churches of the Disciples of the Northwest gathered in a restaurant in Seattle a few evenings ago to plan a vigorous campaign for the enlargement of our work on the Pacific coast. Representatives were present from Seattle, Tacoma, Spokane, Everett, Puyallup, Bellingham and Yakima. Addresses were made by, W. A. Moore, Tacoma; A. C. Vail, Seattle; Joseph L. Garvin, J. L. Greenwell, T. J. Shuey, B. H. Lingenfelter, of Seattle and F H. Groom, Tacoma.

R. P. McPherson who for five years was in Dunkirk, N. Y., and who built up the church there from a feeble beginning into quite a vigorous congregation, resigned October 1. Being strongly solicited by the church, the American Christian Missionary Society and the New York Christian Missionary Society, he will resume charge of the Dunkirk Church about the first of February. He has had flattering calls to other fields and also could continue in the evangelistic work, but under strong pressure brought to bear upon him, he returns to Dunkirk.

E. L. Day, until recently pastor of the church at Brazil, Ind., began his service with the church at Noblesville, Ind., January 2. A local paper commends highly the work of Mr. Day in Brazil, where he had been for eight years. During this time there were 600 accessions to the church. The reports made by the different departments of the church at its recent annual meeting showed every phase of the church life in healthful and vigorous condition. The closing day of Mr. Day's ministry, the church raised about $750 to meet interest on church debt and other incidental expenses.

At Ashland, Ky., where W. D. Ryan is the pastor, a new church is to be erected in the early spring. The contract has been let. The building is to be of unique architectural construction. It will have a pillared entrance resembling the Greek temples. The auditorium will seat about twelve hundred people, and there will be a great many separate class rooms for Sunday-school use. The building will be of light colored brick, and will be the best church edifice in that part of the state. On this account the citizens of Ashland, who are not members of the church are taking a great interest in the erection of the new building.

J. H. Wright closed his third year's pastorate of the Christian Church, Lovington, Ill., Sunday evening, December 26, with a strong sermon, his subject being "Some Divinely Authorized Messages to the People of Lovington." Following the sermon by Mr. Wright, the pastor of the M. E. Church, eulogized the retiring pastor and on behalf of the community wished Mr. and Mrs. Wright success in their new home with the Christian people of Arthur, Ill., where they began work January 1. Mr. and Mrs. Wright enjoy the esteem and confidence of the community in the fullest sense and that they are to leave is a matter of general regret.

We regret to note the death of E. B. Widger, pastor of the Christian Church, Jefferson City, Mo. Mr. Widger's death occurred Tuesday, December 28. In the four years that Mr. Widger was pastor at Missouri's capital city he greatly built up the church and led them in the erection of a beautiful new building. completed but a short time ago. For some weeks Mr. Widger who was fifty-one years of age had been suffering from bronchial trouble, but was taken to bed only three weeks before his death. The Christian Century joins Mr. Widger's many friends in Missouri and Kentucky, his former home, in expressions of sympathy with the family.

W. S. Lowe, pastor Central Church, Kansas City, Kans., writes: "We begin the New Year with all local expenses met and a small balance to our credit. We have made a net gain of twenty-seven in membership during the present pastorate of five months. At our annual meeting all departments reported to be in splendid condition. We continue as living link in the city mission work through the state and city mission boards. All is well and the future is bright. We are now beginning a great union revival with Hart and Magann as leaders. Have a large tabernacle seating 4,500."

Marion Stevenson, National Superintendent of Bible Schools, says: "The financial support of the National Christian Bible School Association's work is coming in very slowly. Such a work as we are undertaking through the National Christian Bible School Association ought to appeal to all of our schools, and should receive a larger and more ready financial support than has been accorded it up to the present time. No larger or more important educational work is being planned and undertaken among us than the one carefully planned by the directors of the N. C. B.

Under the leadership of its president, Rev. Joseph L. Garvin of the First Christian Church, Seattle, the King County Anti-Tuberculosis League has just held a successful "Button Day" at which $7,500 in cash was realized. This makes a total of $17,500 which has been raised during the past few months, for which work Mr. Garvin is conceded the major part of the credit. The League has acquired eighty acres of valuable land on the east side of Lake Washington, a few miles from Seattle, and is engaged in the erection of a sanitarium. The City Council of Seattle appropriated $2,500 to be used for the erection of the building, and an equal amount for the salaries of nurses. One of the largest restaurants in the city gave its entire net profits for the month of December to the League.

The second Medical Missionary Conference will be held at the Battle Creek (Michigan) Sanitarium, February 15 to 17 inclusive. The first conference of this kind, we understand, was held at the same place a year ago, and it proved so successful that it was decided to undertake to make it an annual feature. The meeting was presided over by Bishop Thoburn; and several prominent missionaries, both medical and evangelical, participated in the program. It is anticipated that the coming meeting will be even more marked than the first. Missionaries on furlough, and officers of missionary boards are cordially invited to be in attendance. Entertainment for one week at the sanitarium will be free to those who go for the purpose of attending the conference. Full information will be furnished by addressing The Medical Missionary, Battle Creek, Mich.

Louis S. Cupp has resigned his pastorate with the Hyde Park Church, Kansas City, Mo., to become chancellor of Christian University, Canton, Mo., and will close his work in Kansas City March 1. During the four years of Mr. Cupp's pastorate at Hyde Park the church has made remarkable numerical growth and now claims a membership of 2,500. The development of the Sunday-school has been one of the principal features of the work of the retiring pastor. The school employs a superintendent. Mr. Cupp is vitally interested in education and was influential in securing some large gifts for Christian University. Mr. Cupp received the degree of A. B. from this school in 1899, and has held pastorates at Huntsville and Platte City, Mo.

The following quotation from "Our Church Greeting," First Church, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, shows a man's way of closing a pastorate: "There remain but four more weeks of the present pastorate. Three things are now the burden of the pastor's heart's desire and prayer: First, that his successor may find a harmonious, spiritual church, eager to press on into every open door. This will be if we all heed the sanctions of the years and the call of the hour. Second, that his successor may be able to locate every resident member of the church at once. This we hope to accomplish through the new directory. Third, that he may find the church free from debt. This will be if each one will give attention to the payment of their pledges to date. The present small shortage will thus be easily made up. Will not each of you, for the sake of the church we all love, do your part toward this happy consummation? We know you will."

One of the most significant occasions in the history of the First Church, Lincoln, Neb., was the "at home" given by the Bible-school to the members of the church and their friends, Saturday afternoon and evening, January 1. From 3 to 5 o'clock p. m. was the children's hour ,including all children of the cradle roll, primary and junior departments, or all children under fourteen years of age. In the evening from 8 to 10 o'clock the intermediate, adult and home departments, with all members and friends of the church, were received. The entertainment included a short musical.

A. W. Conner, "The Boys' Friend," has in the interest of boys lectured 421 times to a total attendance of not less than 50,000 people. He has conducted campaigns for boys in three states and has reached and Knighted 926 boys. More than half of his lectures were to adults, the rest to boys and girls, and all of them on the boy problem. As a specialist with boys he is a prince. In experience, knowledge, methods and personality he is unsurpassed. He wins and blesses all boys everywhere. His work pleases, instructs, and rallies churches and Bible-schools.

The Student Volunteer Band of Hiram College, Hiram, Ohio, expects to send deputations of their number out to the churches within a radius of fifty miles of Hiram in the interest of the March Offering. Beginning with the first of the year they will send out at least four students every Sunday. No doubt other colleges will act upon this suggestion. For full information as to plans, etc., correspond with Wm. A. Young, Hiram, Ohio.

Marion Stevenson has just returned from a ten days' institute at Christian University, Canton, Mo. J. H. Bryan, State Superintendent of Bible Schools for Missouri, was with him and had charge of the first four days. Mr. Bryan succeeded in receiving pledges from the ministerial students which will result in the organization of 100 Adult Bible Classes in a very short while.

Special Information Regarding the Use of the Bethany Graded Lesson

Those ordering the new BETHANY GRADED SUNDAY-SCHOOL LESSONS should note one little point in which the Beginners' and Primary Courses differ from the Junior. The former are divided into quarters while the latter is divided into thirds of a year. The new term for the Junior lessons begins, therefore, in February. Unless otherwise instructed we will fill all orders for Junior supplies early in February.

Those schools which have especially ordered Part I of the Junior lessons to use until the new term begins will be interested in the suggestions of Miss Josephine L. Baldwin, the writer of the Junior course. Miss Baldwin selects seven lessons from the Junior Work Book and the Junior Teacher's Text Book which, she says, will make a more adequate use of the seven weeks than to begin at the beginning. Lesson 8, "The Call of Abraham," on January 2; "Lesson 9, "Giving Lot the First Choice," on January 9; Lesson 11, "Abraham Entertaining Angels," on January 16; Lesson 15, "Abraham Willing to Offer Isaac," on January 23; Lesson 16, "Rebekah at the Well," on January 30; Lesson 17, "How Esau Lost His Birthright," on February 6; Lesson 18, "Jacob's Vision of a Ladder to Heaven," on February 13. On February 20 the second book will be taken up and the regular course pursued to the end of June.

It is perfectly practicable to take up these graded lessons—Beginner's, Primary and Junior grades—at any time. But it is important to use the lesson on their appropriate dates. The International Committee has arranged the courses so that the holiday festivals receive due recognition. The graded lessons are seasonal in character, to use the words of Mrs. J. W. Barnes, a member of the Committee. To begin the October lessons in January would play topsy-turvy with the seasons, bringing Christmas lessons at Easter time, the Easter lessons in the winter and Thanksgiving lessons in February.

Besides, one of the great advantages in using the graded lessons provided by the International Committee, in preference to any independent course, is that all graded schools will be studying the same lessons at the same time. Thus within each grade there will be uniformity (the lauded virtue of the old system), making it possible for teachers of a particular grade in the same city to hold interdenominational teachers' meetings with much greater profit than on the basis of the old-time uniform lessons. This would not be practicable if your school disregarded the seasonal arrangement of the lessons.

Charles Darsie, pastor at Urichsville, Ohio, will hold a meeting with the church at Nelsonville, Ohio, beginning February 13.

A revival meeting is in progress at Hutchinson, Kans., Victor Dorris of California is doing the preaching. V. E. Ridenour leads the singing. Orville Lee Cook is the new pastor of this church.

The Sunday-school at Nelson, Ohio, averaged 504 for the year 1909. This is 150 better than last year. The Berean Men's Bible-class is largely responsible for the increase. That class averaged 304 men every Sunday in December.

A revival meeting will be begun by the church at Vincennes, Ind., January 16. H. E. Wilhite, Lawrence, Kans., is to be the evangelist. E. C. Tuckerman will have charge of the music. Mrs. Tuckerman will conduct Bible drill work.

At the request of Dean Haggard, of the Bible College of Drake University, W. J. Lhamon, formerly dean of the Bible College of Missouri, lectured recently before the Iowa ministerial students on 'Hinduism and Buddhism.'

Three of the aims of John Ray Ewers, in the East End Church of Pittsburg, are: 1. The advancement of the foreign missionary offering from a plain living link, to $1,000. 2. The addition of a hundred new members to the church. 3. The advancement of the Bible-school to three hundred.

G. D. Edwards writes: "Please say for me to the Brotherhood of Missouri that the terms of Brother Long's proposition to the Bible College of Missouri have been met. However, in meeting his terms a situation has developed, which will require me to stay in the field a few weeks longer. I have a further conditional proposition to meet.

The Hancock Street Church at Everett, Boston, Mass., has called W. A. Parker, of Emporia, Kans., to the pastorate, succeeding D. C. McCallum, who will enter the foreign field under the F. C. M. S., thus consummating a plan which for some years he has entertained, and for which he has been preparing himself. He is to remain in his present work till February 1.

H. G. Bond tendered his resignation at Girard, Kans., to take effect January 1. Another minister is therefore wanted and correspondents may address A. B. Wallace, the church clerk. The church building has recently been remodeled and made an up-to-date. Mr. Bond will go tto Iowa. Many of the Girard people were very emphatic against his leaving them.

S. B. Braden, of Butler, Ind., closed his work there at the end of the year. He is to enter upon the work at Eden, Ohio. Under his leadership the Butler Church has been enlarged and remodeled. There has been a substantial increase in the membership. Every department of the work was strengthened. The church needs a man of ability to take his place, and all letters should be addressed to D. A. Sraw.

The East End Church, Pittsburg, Pa., Rev. John Ray Ewers, minister, is planning to observe Passion week with a series of "decision" meetings, the pastor doing the preaching. Mr. Ewers has held this sort of a meeting with his churches for several years and finds them most helpful in building up the spiritual life of the church, and in bringing into the church many who respond to such special effort. Mr. Ewers has been elected secretary of the Christian Committee for Social Betterment in Pittsburg.

The Dean Ave. Church, Spokane, Wash., Bruce Brown, pastor, has purchased a new location, one mile from their old church. It is a most desirable and strategic center of the city. It is within ten blocks of the great North Central High School said to be the best public school building west of the Mississippi. It will be in the center of 50,000 people with seven car lines reaching it. The church raised the entire amount in cash at one time. The new building will be begun next summer.

As We Go to Press

Lawrence, Ill.—Greatest in attendance, interest and number of additions for first week of any meeting in history of church. Pastor H. C. Holmes is strong man. G. L. Gorden Leading music.—Allen Wilson, Evangelist.

Little Rock, Ark., Jan. 9.—Forty-five converts today; 521 in thirty-one days. More men than women. Lawyers, doctors and leading business men among converts. Brother Jessup's, pulpit has stood for eleven years solidly for civic righteousness and a gospel not filled with interogation points. Arthur K. Brooks stands four square for God and humanity. He is an evangelist too large to be narrow and too Christ-like to be jeolous. Brother Browning preaching at the little mission is seventy-four years old and his very presence is at once a clessing and a benediction to us all. Meeting continues.—Charles Reign Scoville.

Keokuk, Iowa, Jan. 9.—Thompson the Egyptian and workers started meetings with us today. This man goes everywhere no matter what size church or field if he can get men to Christ. The men's meeting was wonderful, it was the greatest address ever given to men. Our faith is lifted up with such a man to lead us on. Sunday night the people filled the church. It was a great sight and greater sermon. Owing to change of dates Thompson has February open. Write him here in my care any church large or small needing meeting will do well to get our brother.—N. C. Corey, Pastor.

Denver, Colorado, Notes

I am disappointed and sorrowful, H. O. Breeden cannot remain with the Central Church. The condition of Mrs. Breeden's health is such that she cannot live in Denver —one mile above sea level. I was filled with joy when brother Breeden was called to this great church. I was confident that he would accept the call and that his removal to Denver would be the beginning of a forward movement fraught with blessing not only to Denver but to the State of Colorado.

I am not, however, in despair. I am assured that G. B. Van Arsdall, of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, will come to the pastorate of "The Mother Church" the first of February. This is an encouraging fact. A cordial reception awaits brother Van Arsdall. He is coming to a great field.

William B. Clemmen of Nodi Island, Ill., will begin a series of evangelistic meetings with the Highland Church, J. E. Pichett, pastor, Lord's day, January 2d.

The South Broadway Church was organized twenty years ago in January. The anniversary will be appropriately observed Lord's day evening, January 23d. All of our churches and pastors, in Denver, will attend and participate in the joyous service. The history of the church will be read by the venerable and venerated A. E. Pierce, who has been with the congregation from the beginning. Some parts of this history are as thrilling as any romance.

The future is gloriously bright; the next year will be better than any preceding. A joyous, happy, new year to every member of the Christian Century Family.

December 30, 1909. B. B. Tyler.

To the Indiana Churches

Some months ago the State Board of Directors of the Missionary Society of this state called E. M. Barney to succeed J. O. Rose as corresponding secretary for this state. We are pleased to announce that Mr. Barney accepted this call to duty and entered upon his work January 1. We wish to thus introduce him to the churches of the state and invite their hearty coöperation with him and us in this important work to help push our state work to the front where it naturally, and logically belongs. He comes to us with the record of a clean character, sweet optimism, success in the past and a special ability for the work to which he is called. He will bring a healthful, and hopeful message to the churches of the state and we urge our strong churches to open their pulpits to his plea with the assurance that he will leave you the stronger and will thus secure your assistance in this important field of work.

In addition to the work of the corresponding secretary we are maintaining three evangelists in the field. Our need for funds to enter, and possess several strategic places in the state is pressing. We urge pastors, and churches to send in their offerings for state missions. To invite Brother Bearney to present the need of this great work to you personally and thus help us to do the work within our own borders that our strength and position would enable us to perform. Send all contributions for the state work, and address all communications to E. M. Barney, Majestic Building, Indianapolis, Ind.

L. E. Brown, President.

A WOMAN DOCTOR

Was Quick to See that Coffee was Doing the Mischief.

A lady tells of a bad case of coffee poisoning and tells it in a way so simple and straightforward that literary skill could not improve it.

"I had neuralgic headaches for 12 years," she says, "and suffered untold agony. When I first began to have them I weighed 140 pounds, but they brought me down to 110. I went to many doctors and they gave me only temporary relief. So I suffered on, till one day a woman doctor told me to use Postum. She said I looked like I was coffee poisoned.

"So I began to drink Postum and I gained 15 pounds in the first few weeks and continued to gain, but not so fast as at first. My headaches began to leave me after I had used Postum about two weeks—long enough to get the coffee poison out of my system.

"Since I began to use Postum I can gladly say that I never know what neuralgic headache is like any more, and it was nothing but Postum that made me well. Before I used Postum I never went out alone; I would get bewildered and would not know which way to turn. Now I go alone and my head is as clear as a bell. My brain and nerves are stronger than they have been for years."

Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

tesy, R. S. Doan. (2) The Official Duties of the Minister, J. Fred Jones. (3) Evangelism and Revivalism, C. C. Morrison. (4) Thirty Minutes With the Latest Books, Edgar De Witt Jones.

C. S. Medbury, of Des Moines, Iowa, will give two lectures; one Friday afternoon and the other on Friday night. In case Dr. Mathews can not give us the Thursday night lecture, owing to pressure of other duties, Brother Medbury has consented to place one of his lectures at that hour. Brother Medbury's themes will probably be, "Secular Tribute to the Divine," and "The Challenge of the Ministry."

The program addresses are, with few exceptions, brief enough to allow ten to fifteen minutes discussion in each half hour and we count upon the membership to be ready with brief, lucid, incisive discussion.

Bethany College

$158,000 for Bethany College.

Bethany, W. Va., January 1, 1910.—President Thomas B. Cramblet today announced the successful termination of a campaign for the additional endowment of Bethany College. Some months ago, Brother R. A. Long of Kansas City, Mo., offered to give the college $25,000 providing the friends of the institution should subscribe an additional $100,000 not later than January 1, 1910. The campaign to secure this $100,000 closed yesterday with a total of $103,150, more than three thousand dollars beyond the required $100,000 needed to secure Mr. Long's gift.

Since the successful completion of this campaign which has secured for the college $128.000 of additional endowment, Hon. Thomas W. Phillips of New Castle, Pa., a life long friend of the institution and one who has given in every hour of its need, until his past gifts, aggregating more than those of any other friend of the institution, the total amount including the New Year's contribution which is now announced, exceeding $75,000, has agreed to give $30,000 for the endowment of a Bible chair. Brother Phillips makes this new gift in the same way that he has given in the past, not conditioned in any way on the gifts of others. He is guided solely by the needs of the college and his abiding interest in the cause of Christian education and ministerial training in particular. This latter interest is evidenced by his establishing some years ago in Bethany and in five or six other colleges of the church, a loan fund to aid worthy young men to prepare for the gospel ministry. This fund helps more than 150 young men each year to prepare for their life's work.

Among those who have contributed toward the raising of this endowment fund during the last few weeks are, Senator George T. Oliver, Pittsburg, Pa.; Hon. M. M. Cochran, Uniontown, Pa.; E. W. Oglesbay, Cleveland, Ohio; Mrs. Mary Culver, St. Louis, Mo.; Jasper Kuhn and wife, Monongah, Pa.; U. S. Senator Nathan B. Scott, and U. S. Senator Stephen P. Elkins, W. Va.; Langston Bacon, Kansas City, Mo.; C. C. Chapman, Los Angeles, Cal.; Mary E. D. Giltner, Covington, Ky. J. D. Mercer, Rudolph, Ohio; Jeptha Garard, Cincinnati, Ohio; W. C. Pendleton, Warren, Ohio; Daniel Thomas, Kentucky; Mrs. Margaret Foley, Greensburg, Ind.; Christian Standard, Cincinnati, Ohio; J. L. D. Queen, Wheeling, W. Va.; Alex Adamson, Akron, Ohio; The Irvin family, Big Run, Pa.; Mrs. Emily A. Huffman, Jefferson, Pa.; W. K. Pendleton estate; Pres. B. C. Hagerman, Lexington, Ky.; Mrs. Sarah B. Cochran, Dawson, Pa.

In raising the $100,000 block, one donor gave $25,000; another $31,350; two gave $5,000 each; two gave $3,000 each; fifteen gave $1,000 each; eight gave $500 each; forty-one gave $100 each; fifty-two gave $50 each; 350 others made subscriptions in smaller amounts ranging from $1 to $40; 502 people made contributions during the campaign.

Passing of Mrs. Richardson

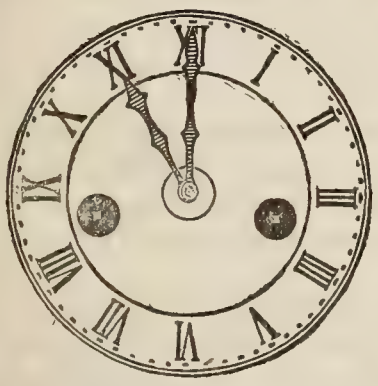
By George H. Combs.

Along with the many blessings, there has come to the Disciples of Kansas City, a great sorrow. For at the going out of the old year there was taken from us the beloved wife of our brother, W. F. Richardson.

Leora May was the daughter of Charles N. Emerson. She was born in Macon County, Illinois, April 11, 1857. Her father was an influential citizen of his state, being a Judge of the Circuit Court and member of the Constitutional Convention that prepared the new constitution for the state of Illinois. Both parents died when sister Richardson was only a child, yet she dearly cherished their memories and their names were ever green in her heart.

She received her primary education in Decatur, graduating from the high school of that city; completing her education at Eureka College, from which institution she was graduated in 1876.

She was married to W. F. Richardson in 1877. It is no violation of sacred privaces to say that a more harmonious and ideal union was seldom if ever made, and mutual tendernesses and honors enwrapped both husband and wife to the very last step of the journey.



Five children were born to this union; one dying in infancy; one, Clement, a gifted though frail boy, passing from us when a brilliant and honorable career seemed almost assured; three surviving—Olive and Bayard Richardson and Mrs. W. F. Gentry.

Wonderful Growth

We hardly realize how rapidly the work of our Foreign Society has grown. It is necessary to look back over a few years to get a correct measure of the advance being made. When we do this, our observation cheers our hearts and encourages us to press on. The following facts tell their own significant story and point a trenmendous lesson to all our people:

1. The churches, as churches, have increased their gifts $50,581 in five years or an average annual increase of $10,136. The increase in ten years has been $80,117, or an average annual increase of $8,011. The gain last year was $17,733, or over 14 per cent. We are expecting a larger gain this year.

THE TIME

OFFERING FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS
FIRST SUNDAY IN MARCH

2. The Sunday-schools have about doubled their gifts in ten years. This is a good prophecy of still better things in the future. The Sunday-schools can and will do much better. The schools gained in their gifts every year for sixteen years but one.

3. The gifts from the Endeavor Societies last year were $15,040, or about three times what they were eight years ago. They have gained in their gifts every year for eight years.

4. In 1904 the individual gifts were $16,154; last year $48,248, a gain of $32,094, or almost three-fold. There ought to be a much larger amount from personal friends. Will you not send a personal gift this year?

5. The Annuity Plan was not started until 1897. That year the gifts on this plan amounted to $6,800. The next year $32,590. Last year they were $34,789. The total in thirteen years is $326,689, or an annual average of $25,129. We hope to receive $50,000 to this Fund this year. Help us.

6. The total receipts in ten years leaped from $180,116 to $350,685, a gain of $170,669, or an annual average of $17,066. The increase in five years has been $94,763, or an annual average of $18,952.

7. There has been an increase in the amount given on the mission fields of $18,645 in five years. The total amount last year was $53,360. One of our Chinese brethren in China gave $1,100 last year; and another gave $1,600. Make China Christian and the world will be Christian.

8. The medical fees last year amounted to $12,175, or an increase in five year of $8,094.46. This is all put back into the work.

9. The school fees last year amounted to $8,472, an increase in five years of $6,054. This is certainly a very encouraging record.

10. The number enrolled in our Sunday-schools on the mission field is now 9,657, an increase of 3,315 in five years. This is glorious. This is a steady, permanent growth.

11. The church membership is now 11,053, an increase of 4,700 in five years. This compares well with our growth in America.

12. Last year 131,770 patients were treated, or an increase of 92,900 in five years, or an annual average increase of $18,587. This pleases the Great Healer of souls. This medical work alone will justify all we did for Foreign Missions last year.

13. The number of native evangelists and helpers now number 634, which is more than double the number five years ago, and the number is more than four times as many as ten years ago. This is one of the most significant features of all our work. The whole missionary force now numbers 804, an increase of 547, or more than trebled in ten years and about doubled in five years. The native workers is a strong arm of the service.

All the friends of the work should join hands to make another great gain this the first year of our Second Century, before the books close, September 30, 1910. We must begin at once. There is not a day to be lost.

God is calling to us in clear and distinct tones for even greater advances. Let us enter into the larger life which He has for those of faith and heroic daring.

For all March offering supplies and any helps for the annual offering, address,

F. M. RAINS, SECRETARY, CINNCINNATI, OHIO.

A simple service was held at the home where a large number of sympathizing friends bore witness by their presence and their tears to the esteem and love in which our sister was held. Brother Barclay Meader, for so long the associate pastor of the First Christian Church, read the Scripture lesson, a beautiful tribute from Dr. J. H. Garrison was read, and Mr. Geo. W. Muckley offered a tender and touching prayer, and after a few words from the minister Dr. Reynolds, of the Second Presbyterian Church, a close friend of Brother Richardson and a companion in sorrow, commended and committed us to the God who alone can cure the sorrow of the world.

In beautiful Forest Hill the tired body was laid to rest, Brother F. E. Bowen invoking upon all the blessings of Almighty God.

There sleeps the body but our beloved sister is with God. She will be widely and deeply missed. For two years we had recognized the inevitable and yet hoping against hope her death came both as shock and sorrow. More than brave she was. Though the death mark was on her brow, in her heart there was the hovering only of cheer and confidence. Sunnily optimistic always her optimism was grounded not in the outward promise of pleasant circumstances but in a moveless faith in God. During all her years of health and vigor and untiring activities, and during the long months of invalidism as well, in the sunshine and shadow alike, she retained the beautiful serenities of an untroubled trust.

All things come from the Father, and so, no ill.

So simple and elemental was this trust that she hardly knew that she trusted. To her, faith was as natural as life itself and she felt no need to affirm it. With the perfect confidence given only to faith she bade good bye to friends and loved ones, saying not "farewell," only "good night," knowing that she and all would wake from the dark of the sleep of death in the good, sweet place where God shall gather as we bid one another "good morning."

In that confidence which is also ours we wait, and while we wait in the quiet and the dark of the night, our hands go gropingly toward the hand that held hers last and through the touch of the hand we tell our Brother Richardson that which we cannot put into fit words—that we love him and that we care.

For we need not whisper the secret which he holds already in his heart that the Father cares and that he and we and all abide under the shadows of His wings.

News from the Foreign Society

Last week the Foreign Society received two additional gifts on the Annuity Plan, one of $500 from a friend in Kentucky, and one of $100 from a friend in Indiana.

Dr. Macklin is almost crushed with overwork. A recent visitor told him that he had work in hand for our physicians. His Chinese friend, Mr. King, is trying to buy 150 acres of land, the income from which is to support Dr. Macklin's charity work. It will be remembered that this good friend gave over $1,000 in gold last year for the work.

Dr. C. L. Pickett of the Philippine Islands, whose arm was broken some time ago, is about well again. He is getting control of it by degrees. He reports eight additions in the Laoag district and 358 patients treated.

C. P. Henges reports twenty-three baptisms at Bolenge, Africa, and twenty-six at Longa. There have been two-hundred and fifty additions during the past year.

Francis M. Biddle, a brother of the late Dr. Harry Biddle, who gave his life for Africa, and other relatives will fit up a hospital cabin on the new "S. S. Oregon" that is to do service on the Upper Congo. They will expend $200 on this cabin.

Dr. Royal J. Dye, writing from Bolenge, Africa, under date of November 4, 1909 says: "The work here is increasing with every day, and we should have more men at once. I have just returned from a two-hundred and fifty mile trip evangelizing, and must go on another one where I expect to baptize a score. We just send out forty-three evangelists paid by the church alone, and there are several supported by home friends. These are the best men in our work and do heroic service.

National Benevolent Association Notes

The general secretary of the National Benevolent Association made an extended trip through the south in the late fall, which resulted in a generous subscription to the support of the southeastern Christian Orphanage at Baldwin, Ga. Between $3,000 and $4,000 was subscribed. This amount will go a long way toward supporting the home for the year, thus saving the expense of sending a solicitor into the field.

The association has recently received two good annuities; one from a good man who was so modest that he requested that his name should not be used. In sending in his check he said that he and his wife wanted fellowship in the blessed ministry of the Gospel of the Helping Hand. As he draws near the home not made with hands he and his good wife feel disposed to make generous provision for some of our Lord's unfortunate little ones. The other annuitants are J. T. Killam and wife. These good people have been laying up treasures in heaven for years. They are laying it up now in larger contributions through their gift to the annuity fund of the Benevolent Association. With over $300,000 assets and only $25,000 liabilities the association's annuity bonds furnish gilt-edged investments, as well as an opportunity for advancing the kingdom of Christ in the most practical way.

The Benevolent Association has recently come into possession of a legacy from the estable of the late Anderson Martin, Pleasantville, Iowa. It amounted to $2,850. As Brother Martin set his house in order preparatory to his departure, he remembered to set aside a portion for the widow and the orphan in their affliction.

The new building for the Colorado Christion Home in Denver is nearing cocmpletion. It will cost between $12,000 and $15,000. It will accommodate fifty children, and will be ready for occupancy early in the spring. Four thousand dollars is needed to clear off the indebtedness.

The association is about ready to let the cocntract for the new building for the Home for the Aged, in Dallas. This building will cost about $25,000. Some $18,000 has been collected. It needs $7,000 more. A number of veterans of the cross are waiting for this dawn of a better day for them.

The National Benevolent Association and the Christian Woman's Board of Missions have each decided to go alone in the observance of Easter this year. Our brotherhood is large enough to generously support its orphanage work at home and abroad. The Benevolent Association is claiming the continued support of all its old friends and asking in the name of Christian charity and the suffering multitudes that the churches and Bible schools keep the anniversary of our Lord's triumph over death in the interest of the triumph of some of the poor over poverty.

The Bethany Graded Sunday-School Lessons

Will the new Graded lessons make their way into the Sunday-schools and become the standard lessons of the Sunday-schools of the world as the Uniform lessons have done? There are many signs indicating that this is precisely what will happen.

1. All the authorities in religious pedagogy have been a long time agreed that it is better to suit the lesson to the learner than to compel the learner to adapt himself to the lesson, regardless of his stage of mental development.

2. The International Committee which has for thirty-five years selected the Uniform lessons has now begun the issue of an additional series called the International Graded Course, consisting, not of one Scripture lesson for the entire school, but of a separate series of lessons for each year or grade, chosen with direct reference to the age and ability of the pupils.

3. These lessons are being adopted by the best schools of all denominations. The Presbyterians report that about two thousand of their schools adopted the International Graded courses for children under twelve years, last quarter. This is phenomenal. The Methodists and Congregationalists had to go to press the second and third time to supply the unexpected demand for the graded lessons.

The New Christian Century Co. is supplying these lessons to the Disciples' schools. There is no single achievement in which the publishers of this paper take greater satisfaction than in connecting our schools with this most significant Sunday-school advance of the last fifty years.

The editors of The Christian Century, Mr. Morrison and Professor Willett, both regard the Graded principle as essential to the highest efficiency in religious instruction, and both believe that the Bethany Series is the truest, simplest and most artistic set of supplies for the elementary grades that has ever been put out.

Our pleasure in offering the Bethany Graded Lessons to the brotherhood is enhanced by the fact that our orders for supplies for the winter quarter have been much beyond our expectations. Many other schools have assured us of their purpose to adopt The Bethany Lessons at once. This series may be begun at any time. See full description on another page.

A Plea for Immersion

Based Upon a Principle that Transcends the Dogmatic Deadlock

In response to the earnest and perplexed inquiries of many of our readers, we presented last week a general statement of our view of the only ground upon which the divided church can settle the baptismal controversy. It is our conviction that we are doomed to continue in sectarian division to an indefinite period if Christian union must wait until the churches now practicing sprinkling are converted to the immersionist dogma.

There is absolutely no sign that the immersionist dogma is making any such headway as to encourage its advocates to believe that it will finally triumph in Christendom.

Yet, on the other hand, there is no weakening of the immersionist conscience or practice. The clash of controversy is avoided among the more enlightened; a degree of comity and federation obtains between the two sections; but in the actual procedure of immersionist churches there is no sign of relaxing the traditional practice of immersion only.

Manifestly the controversy is in a deadlock.

How to break this deadlock is the big problem of any body of Christians that sets itself to the task of bringing Christ's scattered flock into one fold.

The position taken by The Christian Century last week may be recapitulated here for the sake of clearness. We contended,—

1. That to continue the argument is futile.
2. That to allow a mere form to stand in the way of Christian union is wicked.
3. That the form of baptism is a matter of intense conscience to the immersionist.
4. That the form of baptism is not a matter of conscience to the optionist.
5. That the evident Christian duty, therefore, of those to whom the form of baptism is a matter of indifference is earnestly to inquire whether it is possible, by their own initiative, on behalf of the unity of the church, to restrict the exercise of their liberty in the practice of alternative forms of baptism without surrendering any point vital to conscience or the kingdom of God.
6. That the optionist churches could, without sacrifice of conscience or effectiveness or any vital matter, cease the practice of sprinkling and pouring and retain only the practice of immersion as the initiatory rite into the church, thus transcending the controversy over dogma through the triumph of Christian love and reaching a level where unity would be inevitable.
7. That the business of the Disciples of Christ, a movement organized within the church catholic on behalf of Christian union, is not to argue the baptism question on the basis of Scripture dogma, but to plead for the solution of it through the impulsion of Christian love.

That our fathers should have displaced "our creed" with "our plea" lifts us far above the jangling of controversy over dogma. This idiom of ours is the badge of absolute uniqueness among religious bodies; we are not another sect insisting upon our particular understanding of the Bible.

We, the Disciples of Christ, are the company of those wherever found who believe in the duty of Christian union, and who believe that union can be effected among evangelical bodies without doing violence to the conscience of any individual Christian.

As individual Christians we, like all other Christians, have our peculiar understanding of the gospel. But as an organized Christian union movement our essential business is to proclaim that neither our own nor anybody else's peculiar understanding of the gospel presents an insurmountable obstacle in the way of the union of God's people.

We do not proclaim the impossible doctrine that union is to be effected by a series of compromises of conviction. That there should be an all-around give and take of the things of conscience is morally unthinkable, and a union built upon such an arrangement would be shattered even before it could establish itself.

What we, the Disciples of Christ are pleading for is the recognition, by all Christian people of at least the great evangelical denominations that there exists among us in our actual faith and concrete practice the basis of a union within which every Chirstian's conscience may be conserved inviolable.

We do not take our stand upon a dogma. We do not insist that Christian union must rest upon our understanding of what the Scriptures teach. That is the way every sect does. We are not a sect, and we must not let ourselves adopt the sectarian method.

The essence of sectarianism would be for us to claim that our understanding of what the Scriptures teach must be taken as the basis of union for all Christians.

There is not a sect in Christendom but has as its motto, "Where the Bible speaks, we speak"; not one but believes it takes the Bible as the only rule of faith and practice; not one but believes in the duty of restoring primitive Christianity; not a sect in Christendom but owns the supreme Lordship of Jesus Christ.

That a body of people proclaiming Christian union should present its understanding of what the Scripture teaches as the sole and only infallible basis of union among Christians is simply to repeat the stupid blunder all the sects have made for three hundred years.

And for such a body of people to invoke the peculiar authority and Lordship of Jesus Christ for its particular program of union is as arrogant as it is naive.

Such a sect's understanding of what the Scriptures teach may, as a matter of fact, be a practicable basis of union.

And again it may not be a practicable basis.

But whether it is or not, one thing is sure, viz., that the divided church will not give that sect a fair hearing.

To attempt to reconcile the dogmatic differences among Christian people by other dogmas of our own, or by taking one side or the other in the dogmatic controversies over which the church is divided, is to betray the essentially sectarian character of a body that poses as an umpire of the disputes that divide the church.

As individuals we, the Disciples of Christ, have our conscientious convictions on the baptism question. Most of us are committed to the immersionist position.

But it is not our mission as an organized movement working for Christian union to advocate the dogma that loyalty to the Scriptures and to Christ demands the practice of immersion only. As The Christian Century pointed out in a recent article, there were other bodies already advocating that dogma before ever the Disciples' movement was born.

To conceive our mission in such terms is to conceive ourselves a sect among the sects.

Our mission is not to argue the baptism question, but to make to the people who are arguing it this plea: that, having argued the dogma into a deadlock, they now waive the dogmatic issue, and for the sake of answering the Lord's prayer for unity among his followers, seek like Christian statesmen to find some practical basis upon which all can stand without doing violence to the conscience of any.

The problem of Christian union is not a question of interpreting the Scriptures. To each individual soul God gives the right to read the Scriptures for himself.

The problem of Christian union is a problem of statesmanship. Its solution waits on the arrival of some master spirit who can make the disputants see and feel the shame of division and who can point out how in the common faith already held and in the common customs already practiced there is a basis of unity upon which all consciences can be satisfied.

The controversy over baptism is to be settled if at all in just this way. The dispute may not be settled; it must be transcended.

And the essential mission of the Disciples of Christ is to point out how it may be transcended and to plead with the disputants to put an end to the controversy.

The Disciples are the statesmen of Christian union.

Through their hundred years' history there has run a silver strand of appeal of a wholly undogmatic nature, a strand which we must today seize and use as the clue to a true appreciation of their history and the solution of the biggest problem which the modern church is facing. This will be our theme at another time.

Editorial Survey

Is the Wage Earner Prosperous?

Bradstreet's have issues a bulletin on the increase in the cost of ninety-six of the most used commodities in our common life. It shows an increase in cost, on the average, of 11 per cent over last year. Its authoritativeness is not questioned by anyone, least of all by the man who has to reckon each week in order to be able to make ends meet and pay the life insurance. The cost of living is higher now than it has ever been in the history of the country with the exception of a certain period during the civil war, and a slight further advance will discount even that comparison. The President takes note of the fact in a message to congress, the Secretary of Agriculture has instituted a thoroughgoing investigation of the causes, the legislature of Ohio is demanding a like inquiry, and other states and departments of government will doubtless join in the search for the reason.

It is true that the cost of living has advanced all over the civilized world. The increased production of gold may account in part for this universal increase, but the fact that the advance in the United States is about three times that in the old world, calls for further explanation. Secretary Wilson concludes from a recent investigation of meat prices that there are too many retailers. He says the farmer is not getting the larger part of the increase, even though the price of farm products has greatly increased. There is no doubt about the part the trust plays in this general increase. The revision of the tariff has helped it; it went upward on many articles of common commodity. The fact of tariff will come under close scrutiny in the investigation. The question must be answered as to whether a tariff increases the cost of living more than it increases the rate of wages. This answer will not come from legislative investigations for they will be biased either for or against, but it will come from the more accurately reasoned conclusions of economists after the legislative committees have brought in the evidence.

The momentous question is that which confronts the wage earner and the man with a small salary. It raises the question, also, about the sufficiency of the old rule that plenty of money and good prices makes everybody prosperous. Wages were never so high, but is the wage earner so well off? The real problem with the wage earner is not how much he gets, but what will his wage buy. We have ever been concerned with the questions of production. We legislate for the producer side of our economies and industries. The morrow will see us asking the consumer's question of how much is the cost? We will legislate from the consumption side of living. When we do that there will be less "local question" in tariff making and more equalization of rates for the benefit of those who buy as well as those who sell.

The cost of living has increased by one-half in the past half generation. The rate of wages has increased but one-half as fast as the cost of living. There is a general prosperity, but it is not an equalized prosperity. The man with $5,000 a year was never so numerous or prosperous, but the man with $500 a year was likewise never so disproportionate in numbers to the increase of his more fortunate brother and never so poor as he is with his increased income.

Safeguarding Life and Limb

The story of industrial casualties is being written. In our enthusiasm for the conservation of resources we are taking invoice of our human resources as well as those of timber and water. We are finding that there are occupations as deadly as war; that health is undermined, in a less spectacular but in as deadly a degree as in army camps in torrid climates. Poisonous gases, dust, lack of sanitation, long hours, monotonous toil in one position, and dangerous machinery furnish the toll. Illinois has been looked upon as one of the worst offenders in its lack of care for its workers, but it put into operation on January 1 a law that is among the best. Things often have to go to the worst before public opinion can be aroused to make them better, and then they go to the best. This law provides that:

All running machinery shall be reckoned dangerous and thus provided with safety devices.

All screws and projections shall be countersunk so as to catch no clothing or loose material in hands of workers.

Means shall be provided for quickly stopping any machine or belt or shaft and shall be within easy reach at any time.

Machines shall not be placed in such close proximity as to endanger life and limb.

All hatchways, elevator shafts, etc., shall be securely closed and safeguarded.

Sanitation shall be strict—no dust, gas, fumes or smells that can be avoided.

Women and girls shall be provided with seats.

Equal temperature shall be maintained in all rooms as far as possible.

No food must be taken where there is poisonous material.

Sufficient means of escape from fire and explosion, etc., shall be provided.

Employees shall be forbidden to tamper with machines not under their care.

Employers shall furnish state factory inspector with report of all accidents and injuries.

This last provision is one of the most needed. When it is universally done the state will be able to deal intelligently with the liability clause in industrial contracts and will have a knowledge of the whole question of casuality in factories that will help solve the problems of the part industry should bear in the cost of remunerating the loss of life and limb among the workers. The first of the above enumerated provisions strikes at the base of the injury problem when it defines all running machinery as dangerous, and thus fixes the probabilities of fault upon the industry instead of upon the worker.

Charity at Cherry

Serious criticism of the Red Cross methods of relief at Cherry have been made through a sensation-loving press, and especially by a couple of Chicago Aldermen. One of these aldermen is the able chief defender of saloon interests in the state legislature, Mr. Cermak, and the other is the notorious Alderman Scully, one of the grey-wolf kind of aldermen that Chicago has not yet rid itself of. Men of this kind win their seats in the council by the wholesale dispensing of charity and being all-round good fellows as well as through saloon power. There have been others, honest folk, who have criticised, also, and there may have been minor faults, as there is almost bound to be, in so large and difficult a task, but the chief criticism of this kind has come from warm hearts who have not been willing to see cool heads administer the relief which sympathy would pour out all too often without question or econmoy.

The reports of men like Prof. Graham Taylor, member of the State Commission for investigating mines and mining, and upon whose shoulders the burden of going to the bottom of the disaster and recommending laws to prevent further occurences of such kind, after personal investigation, report that the relief has been ample and well done, and that the Red Cross has once and again proven its right to the utmost confidence for efficiency and mercifulness. The report of Mr. Bicknell of the Red Cross and Mr. McDonald of the Illinois Mine Workers union show that the families of the bereaved have actually received more than the wages of their fathers and husbands would have been if the accident had not happened. The wages would have amounted to $80,000, and the amount received in their stead amounts to $111,800, or more than $30,000 over and above the usual income. Of this amount the United Mine Workers paid $26,300 in death benefits and $20,00 was wages paid by the company immediately following the disaster, most of which was due. The company has contributed but $4,000 to the relief fund. Nearly $40,000 has come from the generous contributions of the people over the state. Altogether, the Red Cross has collected $85,000, and the miners' union has voted $50,000. It is estimated that various city committees have $30,000 on hand, and it is expected that the state legis'ature will vote at least $100,000 for the permanent relief fund. The Red Cross will perhaps buy annuities for the most needy and thus insure them against want for a time long enough to cover all possible danger of suffering. It is hoped that the state funds will be voted to the care of the Red Cross, also, that it may be invested in like sensible and economical manner. If this is done, it will induce many of the city committees that are in doubt about how to best dispose of their funds to do likewise and thus give the one great organization, that is above reproach, the work of seeing aid dispensed until time shall allow a complete readjustment of the affairs of the sufferers.

Each of the 310 families can sue the company for $10,000. But it will probably be useless to do so. The mine is owned by the C., M. & S. P. R. R., but is a separate company in which the majority of the stock is held simply in the name of the president of the railroad company. This makes them liable only to the extent of the value of the mine property. The mine is today a smoking hole in the ground of little value to anyone and of no value under a court judgment.

Who Is Responsible for the Disaster?

Of course everyone flew to the conclusion that the company was responsible for the Cherry disaster. There are at least two reasons for this. One is that corporations are notoriously liable to install only such safety devices as the law demands and immediate economies require, and the other is that it is the fashion nowadays to fling criticism at corporations and the rich without discrimination. On the other hand there were those who were convinced without waiting for any evidence that it was simply culpable neglect on the part of employes. Those who had been studying the problem passed over both of these indictments and laid the chief blame at the door of those who are responsible for providing legal means of safeguarding life in mines and factories and all other places where law alone can insure all the right of being protected from the natural dangers of work.

In the first place, it was the fault of certain employes. The fire came from hay that was ignited by open torches and great care would not have permitted that. Again, the foremen could have gotten all the men out if they had been alert to do so and not overconfident of their ability to put out the fire. In the second place, the company was at fault in not providing stables where fire could not ignite the mine, and in not having installed those safety devices that would quickly extinguish fire wherever it might break out. But most of all is the legislature of the state blameworthy in not passing the bill that was before them last winter, designed to prevent all such disasters by compelling mines to install safety devices. That would have prevented this very appalling disaster. There are automatic sprinklers that loose floods of water when a certain heat is reached. Concrete construction where all inflammable materials are stored would prevent an outbreak of a conflagration. Extra shafts would give exit in case of any danger, and a more complete signaling system in the shape of simple telephones would make rescue work easy and accidents remote. Air pipes along working tracks would lower probabilities of danger from damps. To compel every man handling explosives to qualify as an expert and to train every miner in rescue methods would increase ability to prevent accidents and deal with those that happen. Fire-proof chambers at stated places, supplied with food and water and with an open hole drilled from the top of the ground into them would save most of the lives in the extremities. Rescue stations in every mining field, equipped with oxygen apparatus and other devices would greatly expedite rescue, and closer inspection would prevent accidents. Now that the legislature is meeting with 300 lying dead in the sealed shaft and public opinion surcharged, there will doubtless be a law passed that will be as competent as the one elsewhere noted in regard to factory safety.

The Terrible Toll of the Mines

No industry demands a greater toll in life and health than that of coal mining. In the anthracite mines of Pennsylvania alone two miners are killed and five injured every day in the year, and they have taken a toll of 12,000 lives and 28,000 have suffered accident. Every year at least three out of every 1,000 miners will suffer either death or maiming in the mines, and the number that suffer ill and broken health through mine damps and gases, lung disease through coal dust and bad air, rheumatism through damp and cramp, broken limbs through falling walls and roofs in the chambers, and many other evils that are not told in figures and not thought of by us when we sit by our cosy fires and watch the curling smoke and glowing embers and are warmed to dreams or to fraternal concourse and made content with our lot.

Not only could the appalling catastrophes be largely avoided by precaution, but this insidious dealing of death and disease could be greatly curtailed if we would pay the cost of making the timbering safe, the air pure, the miners intelligent on their tasks, and the work of rescue as efficient as is the life-saving service on the sea and lake shores.

The miners make no protest until some dreadful accident like that at Cherry comes. The operators deal more with the competition and the markets and the most economical methods of mining, than with the human problem. That problem, in its finality, comes to the public and it is responsible in the last resort. Pennsylvania passed laws only after the Avondale disaster took 109 lives in 1869. Illinois will now pass an adequate law and other states will be warned also. Humanitarians are told to mind their own business and the name "reformer" is made odious, but to those who will bear the scorn and devote their lives to the all too thankless task of seeking means to benefit their fellows by agitating for their good as Florence Kelly agitated for factory legislation and Jacob Riis agitated for tenement reform and Wm. U'Ren agitated for the referendum in Oregon, will find a great host to call them blessed in after days.

Temperance Notes

The French Minister of Justice says that out of every 100 convicted for murder under his administration, 53 were confirmed drunkards, for arson, 57; for vagabond, 70; for assault, 90; for all offenses, 65 were drunkards.

At the end of the first month of prohibition in Birmingham, the arrests had decreased one-third and those for drunkenness alone had decreased 80 per cent. In Atlanta the corresponding figures were one-half and 90 per cent.

In a British regiment in India observations were made among its drinking and total-abstaining members and it was found that sickness among the former was five times as great as among the latter.

Observations made of a group of 20,000 babies disclosed the fact that where their parents drank heavily, 32 per cent died inside of eight months, while where their parents were total abstainers but 13 per cent died. Where they were moderate drinkers, the figures were 23 per cent.

Does prohibition prohibit? If it is made to prohibit, it does. The Law Enforcement Department of the Illinois Anti-Saloon League secured 479 convictions last year, or 90 per cent of all its cases. The fines aggregated $100,000 and the sentences 7,792 days. There are now pending 250 cases.

Governor Stubbs of Kansas was honored by being excluded from a dinner given by the Topeka Club because he prosecuted its locker system of handling liquid refreshment. He has asked the governors of other prohibition states to join him in seeking some means of preventing the interstate shipment of liquors into their states and the issuance of federal revenue licenses within their borders.

Sixty-three banks in forty "dry" Ohio counties show something of the effects of local-option at the end of the first year after its enactment. Forty-seven show an increase in deposits, five show the same amounts as last year, while but ten show any decrease. The average of increase was $40,000.

The West has had an unenviable black color on the "wet" and "dry" maps until the past year. In Oregon today twenty-one of the thirty-three counties are "dry" and there are 100 precincts in other counties in the column. In Idaho fifteen of the twenty-three counties have abolished the grog shop in five months and but two have voted to keep it. In Utah more than one-half the state has been made "dry" since last August.

West Virginia had its local-option bill smothered in the senate last session just as the session closed. But without it the state is largely "dry." Every city that has a charter allowing it, is "dry." Where there is no other recourse, they elect county judges that will refuse to grant licenses.

In Nebraska any official who refuses to enforce the law finds quo warranto proceedings instituted by the Attorney General of the state and himself removed from office. What would happen to the mayor of Chicago if Illinois had such a law?

War on the Saloon in Chicago

The Anti-Saloon campaign for the extermination of the liquor traffic in the city of Chicago is going forward with enthusiasm and the promise of admirable results. In order that the question may be submitted to popular vote at the spring election, petitions must be signed by one-fourth of the registered voters of the city. It is this campaign for the securing of signatures which is now going forward with vigor, and promises to realize the hopes of the united temperance forces. Even if the effort should fail to close the saloons, a task that looks overwhelmingly impossible to one acquainted with the strength of the traffic in this city, there will at least be great educational value in the campaign, and there is strong probability that the showing made by the temperance forces will compel the saloons to moderate their arrogance, especially in the disregard of the closing ordinances relating to Sunday and the night hours. Moreover, the campaign in Chicago will compel the saloon to keep in this city the army of floating voters which is usually distributed over the state to corrupt elections and override public opinion in communities which are deciding the saloon question.

Editorial Density

At the Quadrangle Club of the University of Chicago a holiday reception and dinner were given to the members of the faculties and their families, in connection with which some of the students presented an amusing playlet dealing with the question of woman's education, in which the reluctance of certain bachelor professors to the admission of women in their classes was amusingly hit off. The revival of interest in the old "morality plays" of the Middle Ages, which were given in the churches of Europe, suggested by contrast the sub-title of "an immorality play" for the funny little sketch that was given. One of our antiquated religious exchanges points out the horror of this episode. It solemnly informs its readers that a play so immoral that students were strictly debarred from witnessing it was enacted by members of the faculty on this awful occasion. The possession of a sense of humor would save some editors from such diverting exhibitions of density.

Unity Between Disciples and Presbyterians

We are very glad to give prominence to a letter just received from Professor Ernest P. Wiles of Muncie, Indiana, regarding a most interesting example of unity between the Disciples and Presbyterians of that city. It was only a single event, to be sure, but it registers a very important step in the progress toward the union of the people of God. When two congregations so radically different in belief and practice as the Disciples and Presbyterians can unite in this beautiful manner for a communion service, it means that in the spirit of love and common service they are able at least for a time to forget all the things that have divided them and to give to the world an explicit example of the unity for which Jesus prayed.

"Tell it out among the brethren through the Christian Century that a century of teaching and preaching of the principle promulgated by Thomas Campbell has not been in vain—not in Indiana, at least.

"Yesterday afternoon at 4:45 the Jackson Street Christian Church sat with the members of the First Presbyterian Church (in their building and upon their invitation) in a union communion service. Such an event was never known to have happened before in this community. The First Presbyterian Church is our wealthiest, and perhaps most influential in the commercial circles of our city.

"It was a beautiful service of just one hour. No address or sermon. Just spiritual hymns, a solo, and a chorus; some passages of Scripture so familiar to Disciple ears; a prayer or two; a free-will offering; and the partaking of the emblems. The whole a thing of beauty, an event long to be remembered, a foretoken of heaven.

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow."

This is an example of what might be done by the Disciples in almost any community if they set themselves to the work of actually emphasizing practicable means of fellowship with their religious neighbors. Nothing would prove to the Christian world more quickly that our people are really serious in their efforts to promote union than such instances of fellowship. It is our duty to secure such opportunities for the practice of the principle we have long preached. The Disciples must, of course, take the initiative. It is their specialty. For this very cause have they come into the world. We shall be more than glad to publish other news of such character.

The Year Book

The January issue of the American Home Missionary is the Annual Year Book of the Disciples. It contains the general statements of the missionary and philanthropic organizations of the brotherhood, the list of missionaries, the contributions of the churches to the support of the Boards, the prayer-meeting topics for 1910, statements of the various schools and colleges of the Disciples, and the usual list of ministers in the different states. The table of statistics is an interesting study. It summarizes the strength of the Disciples as 11,614 churches, 9,207 Sunday-schools, 6,861 ministers, 1,329,559 members, 984,874 Bible school scholars, value of property $29,752,244. Secretary Warren comments on the disappointing character of these statistics as compared with the claims the Disciples are accustomed to make, but points out that the defection of the anti-society brethren in the South, the loss of many of our country churches through lack of ministerial oversight, the dropping of large numbers of names from church rolls in the interest of a healthier and more vital membership list, and the inaccurate and inadequate methods employed in gathering our statistics are all responsible for the results. He wisely notes the fact that the most significant lesson of our statistics is the imperative need of a larger number of young men to devote themselves to the ministry. The volume contains the portraits of the new secretaries, I. N. McCash and Grant K. Lewis, and a statement in reference to the new brotherhood publishing house, which has recently taken over the property of the Christian Publishing Company of St. Louis. Copies of this Year-Book may be secured from the American Christian Missionary Society, Cincinnati.

The Minister and the Library

In these days of multiplied libraries, provided by local pride or by the benefaction of some great philanthropist, there is opened to the alert and watchful minister a rare opportunity to shape in no small degree the reading habits of an entire community.

The work of the librarian is being gradually dignified to a place of importance, but it is usually limited largely to the care and arrangement of the books which the purchasing committee of the library may select. In the last issue it is the judgment of this committee which must be trusted to provide the reading material for the interested public.

It is a notorious fact that when this work is not done with something like adequate regard for its importance, the purchasing lists run largely to current novels, and thus there is grave danger that the public library will become a mere provider of the least valuable of reading, rather than a former of the tastes and character of the community. It is not too much to say that it would be far better for a town to have no institution of this sort than merely one which gratified the unformed or vitiated taste for indiscriminate novel-reading.

In this emergency it is not only the privilege but the obligation of the minister to make himself useful to the people of the entire region by assisting in the selection of the books that shall be purchased and read. In nearly every instance a minister who manifests some reasonable interest in the public library can soon secure a place upon the purchasing committee. Once there, it is an easy matter to bring about the proper use of available funds in the purchase of a higher grade of books than many of our libraries possess at present.

By this it is not meant that the special theological tastes of the minister are to be gratified at the public expense, although there are certain great religious books without which no collection is adequate, no matter how limited its resources. But we are thinking rather of the really valuable books of biography, travel, scientific interest, Bible study and general literature to which such significant and valuable additions are being made continually.

But beyond the purchase of books a preacher may render invaluable service to his community by the frequent reference to the library and its new volumes in his public discourses, his private conversation, and even in occasional articles in the local press. Every minister who lives up to his privileges as a reader will make considerable use of the library, and especially if he has helped to shape its policy and select its materials. It is impossible that this personal interest shall fail to reveal itself in such mention of the best books as would help to form the taste of his own people and of the entire town.

A minister can in these ways render a most valuable service to the library itself and to its head. Most librarians are very appreciative of such efforts as a minister can easily put forth to make their work better known and more valuable to the public. They are often very sensitive to the criticism that their readers largely belong to the novel-loving kind. They would like to remedy this condition as far as possible, for they know it furnishes ammunition to those who think the public library a superfluity, a nuisance or even a public menace.

Let the minister counsel with the librarian and with other interested people regarding the best means of making the better materials of the library known to the community. There are many ways in which the really valuable books can be secured and then featured, so that their value becomes known. In the rare event that the librarian is either incompetent, indifferent or too stupid to realize the significance of the position, steps ought to be taken at once to fill the place more suitably. There can be no reason for maintaining an untrained and inefficient person in so responsible place.

Here is a field in which the minister can be of immense service not only to his own church but to all the people. And no efforts of his will be more quickly understood and appreciated than just these we have attempted to suggest.

The Test of Discipleship

This week's topic invites us to judge ourselves. If I am a Christian it is because I know what a Christian ought to be. My neighbor's opinion of me is as nothing compared with my opinion of myself. I have to give an account of myself to God. I cannot turn my thinking over to another. But in order to know myself I must know how my conduct affects others. For this purpose it becomes necessary for me to take account of the opinions which others hold. The problem for every one is to live in the society of his fellows, be responsive to all the awakening influences that surround him, respect the convictions of all honest men, and at the same time maintain his own individuality. It is easy to follow the mood of the multitude or to set up a private standard of conduct and act without regard to the feelings and rights of other, but to have genuine sympathy for all sorts and conditions of men and to keep one's own soul free is not easy. A man can meet the test successfully; a weakling will fail.

"Not on the vulgar mass
Called 'work' must sentence pass,
Things done, that took the eye and had the price."

Doubtless Browning is right in insisting that work does not fully reveal the man. No painter ever painted his best picture and no poet ever sang his sweetest song. The limitations of expression are felt by the greatest artists. The good man blunders and fails to show his real purpose at times. He must be sure of himself if he is not to grow discouraged. He cannot depend upon the world's understanding of his acts to give him strength.

"But all, the world's coarse thumb
And finger failed to plumb,
So passed in making up the main account;
All instincts immature,
All purposes unsure,
That weighed not as his work, yet swelled the man's account."

The spiritual is the reasonable. The assurance of the Christian is based on knowledge. He can give a reason for the faith that is in him. He can state the grounds of his conduct so that honest men will be compelled to respect his motives. He tests his feeling by its social effect. His impulses are so guided by intelligence that they go forth in acts beneficial to the persons with whom he lives. The average disciple may not attempt to explain conscience, but he knows that a good conscience is never found apart from intelligence. A conscience that puts a man in the way of others, to hinder their usefulness cannot be called good. A man has to do a good deal of thinking before his judgments about right and wrong have any value. The follies that have been committed in the name of Christ warns us that a fool cannot be a Christian. Simple as the teaching of Christ seems, a man needs an abundance of sense when he undertakes to live as Christ would have him.

The kind of life the Christian lives is worthily described by Dr. Edward Everett Hale in an account of the "Lend-a-Hand" clubs. "Saint Paul put the rule for the life of an immortal being when he said that there were three eternal realities. He called on faith, by which he means intimacy with God; he called one hope, by which he meant living in the future, overstepping the rather petty necessities or experiences of today; and third, and greatest of all, according to him, he placed love, by which he meant that a man should live outside himself, for and with everybody else who comes in his way. Love is the greatest of the three eternities. In the Lend-a-Hand clubs we try to express Paul's direction in the language of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries by saying, "Look up and not down," this means faith; "Look forward and not back," this means hope; "Look out and not in," this means love, and because love is the greatest of the three and because one wants to avoid "talky-talky" life and to advance into genuine life, love has two mottoes, of which the second is, "Lend a hand."

Biblical Problems

By Prof. Herbert L. Willett.

One of my correspondents writes in reference to the exposition of the Sunday-school lesson, in one of the issues of the last quarter, that he objects to the habit of raising questions regarding matters of biblical teaching which have been supposed to be settled, such as the final period of Paul's life. My statement was that one could not speak with assurance either regarding the events of Paul's last days nor the unity and authenticity of the pastoral epistles. My friend thinks this is a dangerous thing to say in the presence of our Bible-school people, and he prefers that all questions of that sort be left out.

There are two ways of teaching biblical history and literature. One is to assume that all the facts are settled and to state one's opinions dogmatically as if they were the final truth. This is probably more satisfactory both to the teacher and to the pupil than to leave anything in doubt, and it is still followed in some institutions. The other method recognizes that the things on which we can be positive and dogmatic are placed side by side in holy Scripture with many of another sort, where one must either consent to be guided by probabilities or forego any attempt to deal with the matter at all. Every modern teacher knows that both duty to himself and his classes and a proper regard for pedagogical method unite to demand of him the attitude of an inquirer rather than a dogmatist. Upon things which we know beyond question we have a right to insist, and happily there are enough such facts in Scripture to give a solid basis for our Christian faith. But there are many other things concerning which we can be positive only when we have ceased to study; for the facts are not sufficient to warrant fixed conclusions. More than this, every teacher knows the value of the interrogation point to arouse the attention of students and compel them to think the questions through for themselves. The greatest teachers of our generation have been the men who most freely used the method of inquiry in the classroom. The greatest stimulus to study is an interrogation point. There is no wiser principle than to learn the art of positiveness when one is certain, and at the same time to maintain an open mind upon questions where there may be doubt.

> Where does the soul or spirit go at death? If not to God to be judged, than where? And when will the judgment be? What is meant by the resurrection? If the body returns to dust as we are told it does, and the soul or spirit goes to God at death to be judged, what is there in the old body to be judged in what is called the judgment or resurrection day? Reader.

It is the character of the New Testament writing to set forth the positive beliefs of Jesus and his companions, and to describe secondary and less important matters in terms that seemed on the whole to be most helpful to those to whom the documents were addressed. Neither the Old nor the New Testament has any definite program of future existence. The Old Testament until its very latest words was silent on the theme of the future life. And even then it had no assured basis for expectation of a life hereafter. The New Testament accepted the current beliefs in the resurrection taught by the Pharisees, but lifted them to a supreme and authoritative place in virtue of the teachings of Jesus and the assurance of the early disciples that he rose from the dead. But there was no definite and organized instruction regarding the character of the life to be. It was impossible that there should be. There is no speech or language in which information regarding the future can be conveyed to people with the limitations under which we work. As well might one expect to inform an unborn child of the experiences into which he would enter in the life to which birth ushers him. It is so of the New Testament ideas regarding the future. The fact of that life, of which the present is already the beginning and which goes on with increasing freedom and achievement in the experience of the growing soul, is made very clear throughout the teachings of Jesus and the apostles. But the program of that life is nowhere given. And for the most part the references to it are in terms which were suggested by current Jewish apocalyptic hopes. Conflicting theories have been advanced regarding the condition of the soul after death. Most of them have been based upon the Old Testament view of death as a sleep, from which there might or might not be an awakening, according to the stage in the development of the doctrine of resurrection in which the writer was living. Many such expressions regarding the dead are used in the New Testament, but they have only the value of current Jewish forms of speech. Perhaps on the whole the most satisfactory New Testament utterance is that of Paul in his letter to the disciples at Philippi, where he speaks of death as departure to be with Christ. The Jews believed in a coming day of judgment, and this also was emphasized by Jesus and the apostles. But it must be distinctly remembered that Jesus never postponed the condemnation of sin to some final assize at the end of the world. Whatever may be true regarding that day of judgment, certainly the eternal assessment of values goes on daily. Every day is in a true sense a day of judgment.

The Church Facing the Twentieth Century

Synopsis of a Sermon Preached in West Jefferson St. Church, Fort Wayne, Ind.

By Rev. Earle Marion Todd

Texts—"And (Jesus) opened the book and found the place where it was written, 'The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the year of Jehovah's delight.' And he said unto them, 'This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears'"—Luke 4:17-19, 21.

There are just three things that I hope to accomplish by speaking to you on this theme this morning:

First, I want to help you to see that the church as she faces the new century is face to face with a new world, and that her entrance into that new world marks the third great crisis in her history, and that the future for good or evil depends upon the courage, the loyalty, the self-sacrifice, the farsightedness of her members. Then I want to help you to see that sympathy, Christian sympathy, such sympathy with men as we see in Jesus, is the only solvent for the problems of this new age. Then finally, I want us to get a vision of the great opportunity that lies before the church if she will but set herself in the spirit of Christ to the tasks of this new age. I shall fail of my purpose utterly if I fail to quicken into a flame your love for the church, so that at the conclusion of the service we may sing with a new depth of meaning, a new firmness of purpose, and new solemnity:

"I love thy Church, O God!"

In one of the noblest passages in the "Idyls of the King," Tennyson tells us that

"The old order changeth, yielding place to new,
And God fulfills Himself in many ways,
Lest one good custom should corrupt the world."

There are to-day two conceptions of the world—the static and the dynamic, and most of our minor, superficial differences are traceable back to this fundamental difference. According to the one view, the world is fixed, static. Progress is mere rotation, succession—like the running of a clock. What has been will be again, and what will be has been before. What is truth for one generation is truth for all generations; there is no such thing as "new truth."

A Becoming World.

According to the other view, the world is a becoming world. Progress is growth, development. What has been can never be again, and what is to be, while it grows out of what has been, is new—something that has never been before. Change, unceasing change, is the eternal law. The world is changing, continents are changing, mountains are changing, rivers are changing, oceans are changing, climates are changing, suns are changing, the stars are changing, man is changing, society is changing, institutions are changing, governments are changing.

Not only are things changing; they are growing. The world, the universe, is becoming more beautiful, more wonderful, more complex. Man is becoming greater, he is growing taller, his culture is deepening and widening; his mastery of world forces is extending and tends toward such a control of the world as almost staggers the imagination. Society is becoming more complex; new races are entering the arena; new classifications and groupings are being formed; the electric telegraph, the printing press, the steam engine, and popular education are changing the whole aspect of society with a rapidity that makes it impossible to keep pace therewith. The truth that science teaches us is, as Sir Oliver Lodge reminds us, that everything is a perpetual flux, that nothing is permanent and fixed and unchangeable;

"The hills are shadows and they flow
From form to form, and nothing stands;
They melt like mists, the solid lands,
Like clouds they shape themselves and go."

Rev. Earle Marion Todd.

Now, the new century into which we have entered is a new world, and the church, like every other institution that is to continue to live and discharge a vital function, must adapt herself to the changed conditions. If she does not do this like all other institutions that similarly fail, she will perish. Now, the church has succeeded in adapting herself to changing conditions in the past centuries, and has so passed through two great crises. The first was her emergence from the narrow limitations of Judaism and the Law into the broader universalism of a world-wide gospel. Through this crisis she was led on by the masterful genius of Paul. The second was the Reformation, when she broke away from external authority and proclaimed the supremacy of the human spirit as the interpreter of the will of God. Through this crisis she was led by those men of blood and fire, Martin Luther, John Calvin, and John Knox.

The Third Crisis.

To-day she faces the third great crisis in her history—how will she meet it? Other institutions—social, educational, commercial, industrial, political—are adapting themselves to the new conditions—will the church do likewise? Sabatier tells us that to-day the church "remains motionless in the midst of universal mobility."

May I, brethern, speak to you quite frankly about the position of the church to-day? You know what her enemies are crying about her—that her day is past, that she meets no real need to-day, that she is rather a hindrance to progress, and that she must perish, and the sooner the better. But what are her friends saying—not her blind irresponsible admirers, whose fatuous devotion is perhaps the church's most serious handicap, but her real friends, who see things as they are, and who are great enough to acknowledge defeat when they are beaten—what are these saying? They, too, are saying that the church to-day has failed. They are saying it with bowed heads and a great pain in their hearts, but also with a great faith that we shall yet wrest victory from defeat, and put the church again at the head of the forces that make for human betterment. But at present they are compelled to confess that, as a church, she has little or no part in the great moral movements of the day, and that she has succeeded in alienating most of those from whose support she should derive her strength, humanly speaking, or to whom she should minister in deeds of self-sacrificing love. Bruce and many others tell us how she has alienated the poor and the wage-earning classes; Canon Hensley Henson tells us how she is alienating the intellectual classes; R. T. Ely tells us how she has lost the leadership in social science, and the last Bampton lecturer (Peile) tells us that she fails to mould public opinion in politics, and Newman Smyth tells us that she is actually losing the leadership in religion. One of the most authoritative voices in this country, speaking of the great moral revival that is sweeping over the country at the present time and cleansing our commercial and political life, himself as ardent a churchman as may be found, uses this language:

In Moral Reform.

"The churches have had much to do with this movement, but not nearly as much as they ought to have had. They have not led it. At first glance it appears to have grown up largely outside their walls. Many of its most ardent leaders, who are filled with ethical enthusiasm, are, if not unfriendly, at least indifferent to organized religion. The churches are now in a position of seeing a great moral tide rising around them which they cannot claim to have set in motion, and of which they have not the definite leadership. Much of this impulse un-questionably comes out of the church. Too little of it can be definitely traced to the church, and the church, as a whole, stands too definitely detached from it. It is high time that those who believe in the teachings of Christ should put the church in the foreground of this moral revival."

The case in brief is simply this: that the church is paralyzed as she faces the tasks of the new century; that she is not touching the problem of city evangelization, and especially the problem of our great foreign populations; that she is doing next to nothing for religious and moral education; that the poor and the wage-earning classes are not so much hostile to her, as indifferent—she is a society of no consequence to them. severance from which entails no loss, connection with which confers no blessedness; she does not inspire wrong-doers with terror; she does not even maintain her own life." "It is open to doubt," says Dr. Alexander McLaren, "whether the abundant works of the churches at the present are the outcome of life, or whether they ar not, in some cases, galvanic movements, that simulate vitality and mask death." Dr. G. Campbell-Morgan, after a preaching tour in this country two years ago, returned to England and told the people there that the American church was "destitute of emotion, enthusiasm, joy or tears." "Passionless," was the word which Dr. Campbell-Morgan used to describe the church to-day is following at the tail of the car of Progress, and not leading the procession!

Now, what must the church do as she faces the future, to retrieve her loss and set herself again at the head of the forces that make for human betterment? I answer, she must make herself socially efficient. Social efficiency is the crucial test by which she stands or falls. Yes, she must preach the love of God, and whatever else she does or leaves undone, she must help men to love God. But, as Dr. Henderson tells us in his last book on "Social Duties," preaching is not the only way to persuade men to love God. How, he asks, do we teach our children to love us? By catechisms on filial duties? Chiefly, rather, by caresses, by food, by comfort, by all sorts of deeds and sacrifices through the years. The church must learn the divine way to men's hearts.

Need of Sympathy.

She must seek to understand men, and this brings us to the thought of sympathy, for there is no understanding without sympathy. The church must solve this great problem of the evangelization of the masses, in the same way that Pestallozzi solved the problem of education—by becoming a child, playing with them, sharing their joys and sorrows, and so learning to look at the world from their point of view. In the same way Alfred the Good of England, and Peter the Great of Russia, solved the problem of good government. So John Howard solved the problem of prison reform, and John Dunn the problem of the salvation of released prisoners, and John B. Gough and John G. Woolley the problem of the reclamation of the drunkard. She must learn to look at life and its problems, not from an ideal point of view, but from the point of view of the poor and the outcast and the stranger whom she would win. We are not all alike, we have different natures; we live in different worlds and in the midst of different environments. It is hard for us to imagine how others look on life. What havoc we have caused by our painful lack of imagination! —not because we have not been kind but because we have not understood. I passed by a hospital in Chicago the other day, and over the door I saw carved in large letters in the imperishable stone, "Home for Incurables!" The church of England until recently called its charity schools in the poorest parts of the great cities "Ragged Schools," and so made all their efforts to inspire those children with self-respect a futile procedure! And I remember that Dickens in one of his books speaks of the way in which we have "transformed the Good Samaritan into a pursuing fury." I spoke to you last Sunday night about the authority of Christ, and told you it was like the authority of the sun over the earth, calling forth its own latent potencies, and compelling it to clothe itself in its most beautiful attire. So Christ calls forth the best that is in men, and transforms great sinners into great saints. How does He do this? By His sympathy for men. Sympathy is authority. No one can resist sympathy,if it be tactful. So the church must regain her lost authority. When I awoke yesterday morning the sun was shining through my east window and falling full on my face, and as I shaded my eyes and looked out through the window, I noticed that the leaves of the Virginia creeper which covers the front of the building had come out all round the top of my window as large as my hand, and I wondered if it had burst into full foliage in a single night, for I had seen no leaves on the vine the day before. When I went out later, I looked, and there were still no leaves to be seen, but around the top of my one window on the inside of the stonework, they had come out large and green. And then I considered that the other windows were always closed while mine was always open at the top, and that the warm air constantly passing out had quickened the life in these buds and caused this early effloresence. And so they had come out to smile at me through the window in the glow of the morning sun. So those churches whose windows are open towards the people are the first ones to receive tokens that the long winter of popular indifference to religion and to Christ is passing and that the summer is at hand.

Must Study City.

The church must study the city and its problems, for the task of the church is, as has been well said, the sanctification of its streets, alleys, shops, parks, recreations, government, business.

Then, again, if the church is to play any other part than that of a reactionary in the history of this new age, she must cast away utterly her fear of scholarship. Our fathers trusted scholarship and appealed to it, and in their loyalty won all their victories. Scholarship is to betrusted. All the wealth of our modern life, intellectual and religious, we owe to scholarship, and all our hope for progress in the future is centered in scholarship.

Educational Standard.

She must set herself in great seriousness to the task of the moral and religious training of the young.

She must demand an educated ministry; she must encourage impartial investigation, and demand that her scholars speak out the whole truth as God gives them to see it; she must not be too ready to condemn those that break with the past, but must trust to time and fraternal discussion to correct the indiscretions of a too hasty radicalism.

And finally she must encourage lay-leadership. This is the secret of the success of the Y. M. C. A., and the absence of it is the secret of the failure of the church.

O for a vision of the future, when the church shall give herself to this task! Her day is not past, it is only just dawning. The world can never do without the church. As Dr. McGiffert says in a recent Hibbert Journal, "Christian Church there must be if the cause of sympathy and service is to prevail among men." Where are the sons of the church who will today put her again in the van of the world's forces that make for righteousness and justice? Are they here this morning? Will you do it, my brethren? Will you here in Fort Wayne set your church in the fore-front of the forces that are seeking to cleanse the social, political, commercial, and industrial life of your city, and transform it into the city beautiful, the city of brotherhood, the city of God? It is no easy thing I ask of you;—it is the call of the Cross! Garibaldi thrilled the young men of Italy by his famous proclamation, "In return for the love you may bear your country, I offer you hunger and thirst, cold and war and death. Whoever accepts the terms let him follow me!" And Jesus said, "If any man would come after me let him renounce self and take up his cross and follow me!"

He has sounded forth the trumpet that shall never call retreat,
He is sifting out the souls of men before His judgment seat,
O, be quick, my soul, to answer Him! be jubilant my feet!
Our God is marching on.

Some Things to Be Done

President American Christian Missionary Society Outlines Work

By Peter Ainslie

Our national conventions will meet in Topeka October 11-18, and there are some things that need to be considered in these early days preparatory to our gathering. The prospective Board of Publication is taking definite shape and those who favor the move and those who oppose it are witnesses to the magnanimous contribution of Brother R. A. Long to the end sought by the committee; also a committee on coördination and unification of our missionary interests has been appointed and will report at the coming conventions. Inasmuch as these important moves are being carefully considered by committees amply able to bring the ripest conclusions to the conventions, this article has reference to neither of these subjects, but other important matters are pressing for consideration, and to that end this article is an invitation to as free a discussion as our papers may allow of the following seven subjects, which are briefly presented: (1) The most important move at the opening of this second century of the Disciples of Christ is a definite step towards making the Disciples' proposition of union known to the whole Christian world. It has equal importance with home and foreign missions, for it is intrinsically missionary. This is no criticism of the past. It has gone; but, if the union of Christendom is not the first purpose of our existence as a distinct people, it is a question whether we have the moral right of existence. Our message primarily is to the Christian world and yet even the American Christian world knows comparatively little of our message. They are rapidly getting to know us as a denomination among denominations, and only here and there are we known as a people whose origin was a clear call for a vital brotherhood of all believers.

At no period in the last century have conditions been so ripe for pressing the necessity of the union of Christians as now. The call is coming from heathen lands, both from missionaries and heathen converts: leading Christians of all communions are seeing both the folly of division and the necessity of union. As to what part the Disciples have had in this ripening is not in the pale of this discussion, but this call has to do with our present duty in pressing the message upon the hearts and consciences of all Christians. So vital is this, that it appears that a board or society is necessary to push it, as the necessity was seen in the last century for the organization of societies for home and foreign missions. It should call for as liberal support as any of our missionary work and not only such books and tracts to be sent out free, but a regular magazine, handsomely published, dealing solely with all phases of the union of Christians on a broad catholic basis and to be unwilling to be any other than the best authority in the world on the greatest question that concerns the church today. There is a place for such a publication and this is the time for such a message, else the Father, who has dealt so graciously with us in the past may give our commission to another, and we will be left an uncommissioned people with a crystallized message.

(2) We have three conventions at our national gathering and the machinery is getting clumsy. In the early formation of our missionary work it was possibly the best thing to do, but is it not now better to have a regularly organized and delegated convention, disassociated from any of the board an to which all the boards would make their reports? Let the various boards be as the board of directors in a corporation and the convention be a meeting of stockholders, who would be the delegates, regularly elected from the churches, and the entire affairs of the convention to be in the hands of the delegates, the corresponding sercetaries, however, not being elected by the convention, but by the board to whom they are responsible.

(3) It is always delightful to listen to well prepared addresses and we have a wealth of able men and women, who have enriched our conventions with their thought, but would it not be more practical to have fewer speeches and more business? It would give more dignity and force to our conventions and we would at the same time have the richest thought from our strongest men and women.

(4) It is usually a delightful trip in the month of October to our conventions, but is not the time inappropriate? It means several weeks out of in many respects the best month in the year for church work. Other religious societies saw this and long ago they put their annual gatherings in the spring, when the church does not suffer at all by the absence of its chief workers and when a little trip is a real recreation. Even the summer would be better than October.

(5) We stand for the union of Christians and recognize all believers as Christians. It belongs to us above other people to associate most freely with all Christians. We should seek coöperation and to raise the question, "Shall we coöperate with other Christians?" is a heresy which will destroy every vestige of our rightful position. Christianity can only be carried by personal contact. If the Disciples' position for union is of Christ, and we know that it is, then it behooves us to show to our divided Christendom, by personal association, the beauty and simplicity of New Testament unity. If we send out our literature to other Christians and do not go ourselves in the spirit of Christ, the work is not done.

(6) We are a Bible people and have been from our earliest origin. The first time the Bible was ever put in a college curriculum was more than fifty years ago by one who called himself a Christian only. The Bible is taught more fully in some of our colleges than perhaps among any other people in the world. Most of our ministers are preachers of the Word distinctively. This is all to our advantage, but we must be a devotional people, distinctively devotional. The indications are that our trend is in that direction. It needs to show itself in our public worship. A disorderly service is as injurious to real worship as extreme ritualism. It needs to show itself in our reading. Devotional literature has not a hold on us as it has on many in other religious societies. Personal holiness is the only thing that will combat and drive out encroaching worldliness. All the meaning of discipleship must come into our vision, os that all seeming divisions among us may be healed.

(7) At the Topeka conventions, I shall ask for a day's conference on these subjects, with forty or fifty of our brethren representing every shade of theology among us.

The Religious Outlook

By Dr. Errett Gates

Spence on "Christian Union"

Here is another book on Christian union. The subject seems to be in the air. This time the book comes from England. The author has made a discovery. He has found that there is but one way to Christian union and that is by the "Restoration of the Ecclesia of God." He just missed the use of a phrase very familiar to the ears of Disciples —"the Restoration of Primitive Christianity." He has the idea, and almost the very words of the famous phrase used by Alexander Campbell as the title of a series of essays in the "Christian Baptist," in 1824.

The author shows no acquaintance with his American forerunner, and resembles him only in the language and idea of his principle. His interpretation of the primitive Ecclesia of God is his own, and is unlike anything dreamed of by Alexander Campbell. Strange that men should come to such different conclusions from such similar principles.

A New Restoration.

This new book which proposes the reunion of Christians by the restoration of primitive Christianity (the Ecclesia of God) might be taken as an undesigned contribution to the centennial of the Disciples if it were not so interesting a challenge to their reflection. Here is also a devout effort to identify the primitive church and restore it as it was in apostolic times; and yet not a feature of it resembles the restored church of the Disciples. And all this is for the sake of Christian union.

Had the author of this book never heard of that previous attempt, a century old, to unite Christendom by the restoration of primitive Christianity? And yet it had been proclaimed in pulpit, newspaper and book, in both Europe and America, for fully three generations? Had he never read the Christian Baptist, or the Millennial Harbinger, or any of the numerous books of the Disciples? If he had read them and knew of the "Restoration Movement," originating in Western Pennsylvania in 1809, did it make so little impression upon him that he thought it unworthy of his acknowledgment in making a proposal so strikingly similar in principle, just one hundred years after?

The Plan.

What, then, does this new attempt to restore primitive Christianity come to? The author takes his stand upon an infallible Book, as did the Campbells, and believes like them that he has discovered the divine remedy for the evil of sectarianism. The author says: "The following pages will be devoted to a brief, and necessarily inadequate study of the great administrative principles of the New Testament Ecclesia, an endeavor being made to show that these constitute a contribution of immeasurable value to governmental science, and that if they are only reverently and intelligently investigated by Christians in our own day, they will, without touching a slate on a denominational roof, directly secure that union of his followers for which Christ so fervently prayed."

Here is proposed a scheme, derived from the New Testament, for bringing about union without molesting any existing denomination in any element of its faith or practice. Of course it does not look possible, but let us hear what the author has to propose. He believes that "it was to be expected that the Leader and Commander of the world's greatest and most glorious movement should guide his apostles to plan the government of his community on the very wisest and strongest lines," "and give his blood-bought bride the best constitution that divine laws and principles could produce or the ultimate science of government could devise."

Bad Logic.

The author determines (a priori) what ought to be, and then goes on to discover that it is so. We have met that kind of logic before. The defenders of the faith and the apologists for the Almighty have always used it. It is called the deductive, a priori method of reasoning. One would suppose that it would be out of fashion since Bacon and the beginnings of modern science. But it is still in use in spite of the fact that it has been made to support everything from the divine extermination of the Canaanites to the Catholic and Protestant extermination of heretics. All one has to do is to determine what God would do or ought to do, and then show that he has done that very thing. So our author finds what was actually done in apostolic times by determining, according to the highest wisdom, what ought to have been done.

Unity by Government.

The author believes that the form of the church's government will solve the problem of its unity; and all this was provided for by Christ in express directions to the apostles and carried out by them in their missionary labors. Restore the primitive organization and government and the primitive unity will follow. His first great discovery is that "the city is the unit and area of organization of the apostolic community." He holds that "every Ecclesia or community of believers organized by the apostles was designed by them to include all the Christians resident in the city or island of population in which it was placed." The great sin of sectarianism is, therefore, an organization covering a wider area than the city.

This idea is reiterated endlessly in the pages of the book, and the most dexterous twisting and torturing of New and Old Testament is indulged in to make it appear the "salient idea of the New Testament." There is scarcely anything that he does not claim for his point. He says: "had the Apostolic Ecclesia in each generation firmly maintained their original city-province and their spiritual non-Erastian character, they might not only have lived and flourished but have saved the lives of their cities."

*Christian Reunion, A plea for the Restoration of the "Ecclesia of God," by Frank Spence. Hodder & Stoughton, London, pp. 326.

He makes the astonishing comment in a footnote: It is noteworthy that the only Ecclesia which Christ unqualifiedly commended in his seven messages, that of Smyrna, is the only one whose city has remained to our day.

A Wonderful Providence.

In other words the city of Smyrna was saved from the desolating ravages of war, pestilence and earthquake, because her original church was a city-community. Such was the marvellous intimation of providence and the seal of God upon the plan of the "city-church"! One wonders why the city of Smyrna was spared and the church, for whose sake it was preserved, was blotted out in the Turkish invasion. But neither church nor city was actually spared when the city was destroyed by the Mongols in 1402. But that seems to make no difference with the argument since the city is now in existence, while the rest of the seven cities have been lost to view. The author further says: "Christ himself in his seven messages to the seven Ecclesias expressly recognized and thus gives divine sanction to the city-community principle planned by his agents."

Simply Federation.

But what is to be done at the present day with the various denominational churches that fill such a city as Chicago? They are to be federated under a plan of organization which will give each church a proportional vote in all matters pertaining to the interests and actions of all. The plan differs very little from the ordinary scheme of church federation. The original feature of it is (and this is what seems to justify a book of 326 pages in setting it forth), that the entire plan is found in the New Testament with anticipations of it in the Old Testament!

In the more detailed organization of the denominational churches of a city into a primitive Ecclesia, the author elaborates a scheme of committees, each one of which is authorized by some New Testament precept or precedent. An "Arbitration Committee" is indicated in the passage: "Blessed are the peacemakers." A "Physical Well-being and Recreation Committee" is authorized by the saying: "Come ye yourselves apart into a solitary place and rest awhile."

A "Journal and Publication Committee" (let the editors take notice) is discovered in the passages: "Go to thy house unto thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee;" "Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world."

A New Discovery.

Such a discovery as this, that a newspaper editor was in the divine plan from the beginning, and that his work was made the theme of the Psalmist, is worth the price of the book. This ought to give us more respect for editors and their zeal for the circulation of their papers. It must be the Lord's will that there should be "a newspaper in every home," for the Psalmist declares that "their line is gone out through all the earth."

It is needless to illustrate the reasoning and exegetical methods of the book any further. So much space has been given to it, not because of any value in its plan of Christian union, but because it illustrates a vicious method of biblical interpretation. Its chief value is its warning. It is utterly uncritical and unhistorical. While the author says nothing against the modern method of biblical study and exegesis, that passes under the name of Higher Criticism, he violates every principle of the modern method in every chapter of his book. One could easily imagine him a star-performer in the dwindling band of anti-higher critics.

The Basis of Christian Unity

An Extract from the Centennial Sermon in Pittsburg

By James M. Philputt

In seeking to promote Christian Unity it is important that we should be clear as to the ground on which it rests. If we get off the track here we shall retard the cause instead of advancing it. The basis for unity is not creeds, not the compromises of church councils, not even the Bible itself; the basis is Jesus Christ. "Other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ." "Ye are complete in him." Clear thinking at this point is of fundamental importance.

"Where Scriptures Speak."

The statement of Thomas Campbell,—"Where the scriptures speak we speak," meant one thing in his day, but it means something very different to the thought of our time. Mr. Campbell put the scriptures as a sufficient guide in matters of faith and practice over against the creeds and confessions of men. Interpreted in that sense we can still stand by the statement. But with this for our shibboleth today we should be understood as contending for a common understanding of the scriptures as the basis for unity. Unity on such a basis would be a hopeless dream. Differences of interpretation we shall have to the end of time.

Besides there is danger that the Bible shall become a kind of fetish, that we shall worship the Book instead of the Christ of the Book. "The letter killeth, but the Spirit maketh alive." The true basis for unity must be a personal faith in Christ as the Son of God; the faith which brings him into the heart as Saviour and Lord. This does not mean that all are to have the same conception of the Christ; that is not necessary, it is not even desirable. Paul had a different conception from John, and John from Peter; yet all had the same Christ. The sun paints one flower gold, another red, another blue. Each life must interpret the Christ according to its own needs. But all who live in him are already one; and this essential unity we must insist upon.

Paul's Recipe.

"Speaking the truth in love" is Paul's recipe for promoting this great cause. We are to "speak the truth." What do we mean by "the truth"? The old conception is that truth is a deposit handed down from the early ages, wrapt round and round in ecclesiastical cerements, and sealed by the councils of the church. This mumified thing called "The Truth" we must not examine into,— we must simply pass it down as an heirloom, unchanged and unchangeable to the generations that follow. Such a conception of truth has absolutely gone from the modern mind. It exists only in creeds, and in the brains of men who are living in the past. As long as men continue to think, an unchanging deposit of truth is impossible. Truth is a flowing stream, widening and deepening with the progress of the years. "There is more truth yet to break forth from God's word." "I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now; howbeit, when he, the Spirit of Truth is come, he will lead you into all truth." Out of the life and teachings of Jesus new truth is breaking every day, to meet the growing needs of the world. By "speaking the truth" we do not mean the utterance of some formula or set of statements; we mean that every man shall reflect the light that is in him, the light which he has received of God. Only as he is faithful to this can the kingdom of light be advanced.

The Truth in Love.

The manner in which this is done is also important: "Speaking the truth in love." If there's a man across the street preaching something you do not believe do not advertise his error by denouncing it from your pulpit. The best way to preach down error is to preach up the truth. Put the emphasis on the big things about which there is agreement, and not on the little things about which there is difference. Use the telescope more and the microscope less. If I had the power this moment I would not close a single place where Christ is uplifted and souls are saved. From the Salvation Army barracks to the Cathedral cross the work of Christ is sacred. "He that is not against me is for me." If this means anything it means that every man who is doing good in the world is to be let alone. Christianity is never promoted by strife and hatred; it thrives only in the atmosphere of love. The gist of the whole matter is in these noble words from Ruskin's "Sesame and Lilies"—

"Whenever in any religious faith, dark or bright, we allow our minds to dwell upon the points in which we differ from other people, we are wrong and in the devil's power. That is the essence of the Pharisee's thanksgiving, "Lord, I thank thee that I am not as other men are." At every moment of our lives we should be trying to find out not in what we differ with other people, but in what we agree with them. And the moment we find that we can agree as to anything that should be done, kind or good, then do it; push at it together. You can't quarrel in a side-by-side push. But the moment that even the best of men stop pushing and begin talking they mistake their pugnacity for piety, and it's all over."

I have said nothing about the adjustment of denominational differences; unity is not to come in that way. True, the line-up now is denominational, but it will be less and less so. The future line-up is going to be determined by things vastly greater than those which now divide the churches. The evangelization of the world; the function of the church; its relation to modern thought and modern methods; the supremacy of the Christ;—along these lines Christian people of all bodies are being merged into a new and larger unity. The situation is most hopeful. It presents a great opportunity for us as a people. But we must be clear on the basis of unity. And our terminology must correspond with this basis, or there is danger of our getting sidetracked from the main issue.

Opportunity

Foolish is he who says that at his door
I knock but once, a furtive moment stay,
Fearing lest he shall hear, then haste away,
Glad to escape him—to return no more.
Not so, I knock and wait, and o'er and o'er
Come back to summon him. Day after day
I come to call the idler from his play,
Or wake the dreamer with my vain uproar.
Out of a thousand, haply, now and then,
One, if he hear again and yet again,
Will tardy rise and open languidly.
The rest, half puzzled, half annoyed, return
To play or sleep, nor seek nor wish to learn
Who the untimely, clownish guest may be.

Our Readers' Opinions

Inspiring

Editors Christian Century: I look for the weekly visit of the Century as I look forward to the visit of a very dear friend, eagerly expectantly. When it comes, I hasten to my study, close the door, and stay there until I have read it through. It comes full of good things, from the first page to the last, all served in the best possible manner. The very looks of the paper makes you hungry. It has news in abundance. The contributions are timely, sane, practical, Christian. I find in them food for thought and inspiration for service. You steer clear of dead issues and give the "common things" a new meaning. You not only tell us what Christianity is, but what it should cause one to be and to do. As I read my blood runs faster, my eyes and ears open wider, my hands and feet commence to move, I become uneasy all over; I want to do something for my God and my fellow man, and I am not satisfied until I do it. Your paper was responsible for the first "giving Christmas" ever observed by this congregation, and numerous other things very Christian in their character. In fine the Christian Century is our only paper that is what it aims to be, a religious (Christian) paper. I wish you abundance of success in your work. Your brother in Christ,

Why They Laughed

"This indulgent laughing over the idiosyncracies of evangelists, and their flagrantly dishonest methods to secure immediate results is one of the puzzles of the day."

From an address on "Our Modern Evangelism," by Herbert Yeuell in The Christian Century, January 6, 1910.

In that laugh is our hope. Under such circumstances men, ordinarily, should weep; but we have wept so long over the follies of evangelists, that the fountain of our tears is dry. We have prayed that they might be saved from the error of their ways, but the heavens above our heads have been brass. We have reasoned with evangelists to change their speech or their methods, but to argue with them is like giving medicine to the dead. Success, in their judgment atoned for all manner of sacrilege. The laugh is the most hopeful sign in the evangelistic world today. It will succeed where prayer has failed. It represents the progress of a quarter of a century toward a better evangelism. When one of our best men, in an address packed full of common-place facts on the follies and foibles of our evangelism—as familiar as the alphabet to those who know anything of the extremes of our methods—attempted to cure our ills by an appeal to reason, we ransacked the vocabulary of scorn to find stinging words with which to harpoon him. We would have remanded him to obscurity if we could. His facts were unchallenged; but his method was at fault. He should have laughed where he lamented, and ridiculed where he reasoned. As it was he wounded our pride, and all the guilty as well as the scribes sought how they might entangle him in his talk. The story is too well known to need more than this illusion.

No, Brother Yeuell, that laugh to me is not a puzzle, but a panacea. It shows that the end of the evil is in sight. We have had a long night of weeping, and pleading, but we rejoice with the joy that cometh in the morning. I deplore the methods which ought to drive us to our knees; but all else failing, let us be thankful that the common sense of the preachers is registering their contempt of the evils in uproarious laughter. That laugh will do for our abuses what the famous shot did that was heard around the world.

"Born of Water"

"Except one be born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God."

It is practically the unanimous opinion of scholars that "born of water" refers to baptism. Since, however, "entering into the kingdom of God" is not the same as "going to heaven," we may dismiss at once all legalistic conceptions of baptism. To consider it as a sine qua non of getting somewhere, is to import something into it which robs it of its spiritual value. It is what baptism stands for that concerns us.

"Can you not stop over night with us on your way to A.? We have a spare bed and an extra plate." Now the man who receives such a friendly invitation as this will not be concerned with the literal meaning of the word "plate." He looks upon it as a convenient way of expressing in a single word, all that is associated with the plate in the hospitable invitation. Likewise the word "baptism" is a convenient symbol of all the spiritual realities associated with it. Baptism, in its formal aspects, is just as valuable and indispensable for the realization and expression of the spiritual facts for which it stands as the plate is for the meal; but I do not think that Jesus was thinking of the formal act, any more than one is thinking of a plate in the invitation. He was thinking of that for which baptism stood.

If we accept the opinion of some, that Jesus refers to John's baptism—which would not be unlikely under the circumstances—then we have the negative and positive aspects of the entrance upon the new life. John's baptism stood for confession and repentance. It was the formal and public avowal of one's forsaking of sin. Certainly there must be all this in any genuine conversion. But this is only negative. There must also be the positive reaching out toward the realization of the higher things of the Christian life. For this we need, and are promised, the Divine help. Thus we are "born of water and of the Spirit." Now it is this positive side of the entrance into the new life, which sometimes so completely swallows up the negative, for which Christian baptism stands.

If, therefore, we take the view that Jesus refers to Christian baptism—and this must be its meaning for us today—we have the common Jewish mode of expressing the same thing in two ways. To be "born of water," taking this expression as symbolic of the cluster of spiritual realities associated with the entrance upon the new life, is the same as to be born of the Spirit.

In any case, it is the spiritual passing from death unto life that is the important thing. It is both natural and right that we should give adequate expression in a formal way to the spiritual purpose, and the genuineness of the spiritual change may be questioned, if under normal circumstances, one refuses to do so; but baptism, as Aylsworth points out in his book on the "Moral and Spiritual Aspects of Baptism," is essentially a spiritual act. How beautiful, universal, and free from controversy is the passage in this view. He left no legislation concerning the outward act of baptism—either immersion, or sprinkling, or pouring. He left a command concerning that for which baptism stands—the dedication of the life to him. He gave his approval to the customary way of expressing such consecration to a new life, which was probably by immersion. Whether there is an implied approval of other ways of giving expression to the same thing, is another question. It should be considered with all charity and honesty.

The way of salvation ever is, "Come, follow me." "Repent, and be baptized (dedicate your lives to Christ) in the name of Jesus Christ." "Repent and turn." The word "baptism" as the symbolic term expressive of a spiritual act would relieve the Christian mind of a great deal of baneful legalism.

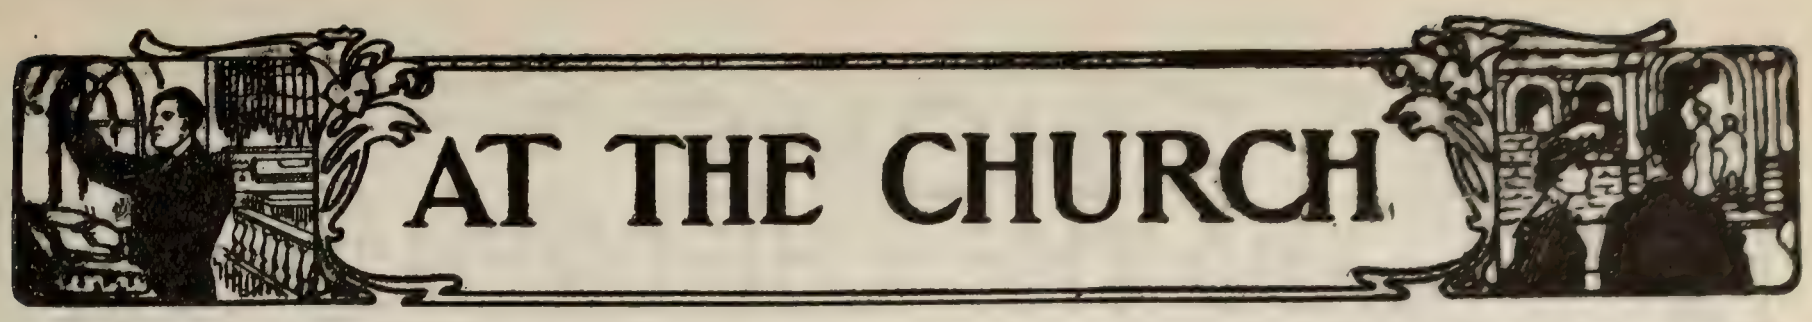
The Matter of Reporting

Dear Brethren: The Christian Century is filling a place in our church life that has been wanting for some time. We read it with much delight. Your book of reviews are wonderfully profitable. They are a little hard on my pocket book, but profitable to my Sunday audiences me thinks.

You speak about reporting to the papers the things that we are doing. I wonder if you know why we do not, many of us? It is something like this. In one of our papers the news has been pushed to an extreme. Many of the telegrams regarding Revival Meetings sound quite ridiculous. What difference to us is it that it rained every night for a week during Brother Blow Hards Meeting in Sin Town? Or what is it to us that Brother Eloquence preached the memorial sermon or spoke to the graduating class? We all do these things. Some of us feel that a preacher is not made big by having his name in the religious journal every other week. Being disgusted with so much "horn blowing" we have rather chosen to let many things pass that might prove interesting to your readers, and let the growing work where we are located, speak for itself.



Let me speak my mind about another thing—guess I am in a growling mood—I am wearied of seeing our evangelists and preachers reporting in a gloating manner that they have had additions from the Methodists or Presbyterians or Baptists. We recognize these people as Christians. There is not one of our preachers that would refuse them the emblems on the Lord's Day, but from their reports you would think they glorified more in having additions from these denominations, than from the world. I was much chagrined a few days since when talking with a man, not a Christian, about the catholic position of the Disciples, to have him say, "I was reading one of your religious papers last week and I noted that your evangelists boast about how many they have proselyted from the other churches." These things surely ought not to be among us.

I am delighted to see your discriminating effort in many of these matters. May our Christian courtesy be a growing factor.

I thank you if you have struggled through to the end of this complaint. I don't want anyone to think I have apostasized from the faith of the fathers. But I do want to be a humble, courteous servant of the King.

Sincerely yours,

Elyria, Ohio. JOHN P. SALA.

The Victory of the Second Mile*

One who reads over this great statement of Jesus regarding the principles of the kingdom of heaven need hardly be told that even if the discourse was spoken as a unity on some particular occasion of Jesus' life, it still lacks that coherence and orderly arrangement which a sermon is usually supposed to have. It was not the development of a theme by any logical processes of discussion. It was rather a series of impressive statements on different themes related to the higher life. It was the purpose of Jesus to convince his hearers that a different order of righteousness was needed from that which contisted in the observance of forms of service, hours of religious practice, and the ritual of worship. A man might have all these things included in his daily activities and yet in no wise be a member of the kingdom of heaven.

Principles, not Rules.

Jesus was not giving rules of conduct but principles of living. He cared nothing for external forms and considered them as valuable only when they were the expression of a right purpose. The Old Testament was a book of rules. Jesus came to supersede this with the dominating principles of love to God and love to men. He was himself the embodiment of these two great virtues. He called men, therefore, to the imitation of himself as the one who for the first time in the world's life had caught the vision of God's purpose for humanity and was consistently realizing it.

Degrees of Condemnation.

Often in his teaching Jesus made use of Jewish customs with which the people were familiar. This is made clear in the early portions of the present study. Jesus wanted to make it apparent to his listeners that an ungracious disposition, an irritable temper, a hateful and contemptuous attitude toward any one was a degradation and a sin. To make this emphatic he put it into the terms of Jewish judicial procedure. Some sins were rebuked by common judgment; others of more grevious nature were brought to examination by the Sanhedrin, the highest Jewish court, and were condemned; others still, were such as to bring the offender into the condition of universal reproach and avoidance, like the bodies of beasts that had died, or other offal that was thrown into the valley south of the city where fires continually burned to consume it.

Anger and Contempt.

So Jesus commented on the different grades of enmity and anger to which men permit themselves to descend. He said one who was angry with his fellowman ought to be condemned by public opinion, the judgment of right-thinking people. The man that added to anger words of abuse was still more guilty and unsocial, like the one who was denounced by the high court, while the man who added contempt to hatred fell into the deepest abyss of reproach, and was useful for nothing as long as he harbored such a pernicious feeling toward another. Such a man was like the carcasses thrown to the fires in the valley of Hinnom (Gehenna). Of course Jesus was not referring to formal legal procedure. He was only trying to illustrate the descending stages of anger and contempt by the ordinary customs of Jewish courts. In this manner he tried to teach men the "hate of hate, the scorn of scorn and the love of love," of which Tennyson sings.

Good Will.

Closely allied to this avoidance of anger and enmity was the cultivation of the positive virtues of good will and friendliness. It was useless to attend the worship of the sanctuary if one's nature was charged with ill-will and rancor. The only way to make a sacrifice, whether of flesh or of prayer, acceptable to God was first to get right with others. Sacrifice was far less important, said Jesus ,than a friendly attitude toward one's fellowmen. On the commonest level of prudence and sagacity it was better to live at peace with one's neighbors than at strife. All the misunderstandings which issue in the bitterness of legal prosecution lie along the pathway of hatred. Many a man has paid for a bad temper an hasty words by litigation that has cost him all his worldly goods. The pathway of peace and good will is the one that leads to material success as well as to personal happiness.

The Saviour's doctrines of self-renunciation and non-resistance is one that has caused endless discussion, because men have viewed his teachings from so many different angles. When he advised his disciples not to resist evil, did he mean the advice to be taken literally? Would he have his followers make no defence if they are attacked by brutal and vindictive men? Would he have them make no effort to save their possessions from robbers? Some interpreters have been willing to go this length, and of them none has pleaded his cause more eloquently and persuasively than Count Tolstoi, the Russian reformer.

Yet such an understanding of Jesus does violence to all his methods of teaching. It was his custom to speak in abrupt, startling, and often exaggerated speech. He always put his teachings into language that was stronger than the principles he wished to enforce, chiefly because he knew that the lethargic and passionless souls of men needed an overstimulus even to bring them up to the average of intelligent action. Artists understand the principle of heightened color. The painted picture is always stronger in its tone than the actual landscape, for the reason that the artist must bring his beholder up to reality by an overplus of color. So Jesus used expressions which he never intended to have analyzed and applied literally, but they accomplished the purpose of arousing public attention and creating interest.

The Higher Virtue.

The principle illustrated by this statement of non-resistance is that the follower of Jesus must always be ready to do more than any man has the right to ask of him. Thus alone can he actually reach the level of social efficiency and brotherly good will. Shakespeare has well insisted that if no man ever received more than his deserts none of us would escape stripes. Jesus wanted his friends to cease reckoning their duties toward their fellows in terms of compensation for what was received. Any man without a spark of good will could do as much as that. They were to put their conduct on a higher level and measure their efforts by a nobler standard.

Rather than be in any manner inclined to avarice and selfish hording of one's own, it would be better to be over-generous. One must be prepared to give more than is asked rather than less if he wishes to be Christlike. Favors are to be rendered not upon the principle of doing as little as possible, but with the desire to render the fullest service in one's power. If a man asks you to go with him as guide and helper for a mile, better go two than not to render him adequate assistance. It is this overplus of good will and aid that defines and characterizes the Christian life. The child of the Kingdom is one who is accustomed to do more than obligation demands. His is the conquest of himself in the interest of his friendship for God and man. It is the victory of the second mile.

The Land of Love.

Over against the old habit of jealosy, suspicion, hatred and revenge Jesus puts the new law of love and service. No one was ever really commended in the Old Testament legislation to hate his enemy, but he was left quite at liberty to do so, and that freedom hardened into a rule of conduct. With the followers and friends of Jesus such must never be the case. Theirs cannot be the attitude of hatred, but of love. It was "peace on earth and good will to men" that the angels proclaimed as the ruling motive in the anthem of the kingdom of heaven. Even enemies must be loved, because only by love can they be saved from that very enmity and ill-will which is marring their lives. One can be the child of God only by partaking of God's character, and this is essentially one of love and friendship. Any one could live on the low plain of rendering evil for evil and good for good. Only one who has the spirit of Jesus can bear witness to the higher principle of love for all, and this very attitude points the way to that perfection of character which is the goal set before all the sons of God. They are to be perfect even as their Father is perfect. And all eternity is given for the development of this virtue.

*International Sunday-school lesson for January 30. Some Laws of the Kingdom. Matthew 5:17-26, 38-40. Golden Text: "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect." Matthew 5:28. Memory verse, 44.

The Things That Count

Not what we have, but what we use;
Not what we see, but what we choose—
These are the things that mar or bless
The sum of human hapiness.
The things near by, not things afar;
Not what we seem, but what we are—
These are things that make our break,
That give the heart its joy or ache.
Not what seems fair, but what is true;
Not what we dream, but good we do—
These are the things that shine like gems,
Like stars, in Fortune's diadems.
Not as we take, but as we give;
Not as we pray, but as we live—
These are the things that make for peace,
Both now and after Time shall cease.

—Clarence Urmy.

"Grave These Lessons"

There are three lessons I would write—
  Three words, as with a burning pen,
In tracings of eternal light,
  Upon the hearts of men.

Have Hope! Though clouds environ round,
  And gladness hides her face in scorn,
Put thou the shadow from thy brow—
  No night but hath its morn.

Have Faith! Where'er thy barque is driven—
  The calm's disport, the tempest's mirth—
Know this: God rules the hosts of heaven,
  The inhabitants of earth.

Have Love! Not love alone for one;
  But man, as man, thy brothers call;
And scatter like the circling sun,
  Thy charities on all.

Thus 'grave these lessons on thy soul—
  Hope, Faith and Love—and thou shalt find
Strength when life's surges rudest roll,
  Light when thou else wert blind.

—Schiller.

A Make-Believe Bee

Lady Henry Somerset has told how her attention was first called to the work of relieving the sufferings of poor city children.

"It was this way," she said. "I was moved in that direction by the rare patience and imagination of one little boy. His example convinced me that patience was one of the qualities I needed most, and in seeking it I grew into that work. I was in a hospital on visiting day while the doctors were changing a plaster cast which held a crippled boy's limb. The operation was exceedingly painful, I was told, to my surprise the little sufferer neither stired or whinced, but made a curious buzzing sound with his mouth. After the doctors left I said to him:

"How could you possibly stand it?"

" 'That's nothin',' he answered; 'why, I just made believe that a bee was stingin' me. Bees dont' hurt very much, you know. And I kept buzzin' because I was afraid I'd forget about it's being a bee if I didn't.' "—Exchange.

Solomon's Adventure with the Redskins

BY FRED MYRON COLBY.

During the summer of 1791, the year of Colonel Harmer's famous expedition against the Indians of Ohio, a family named McCrary settled in the valley of the Scioto, not far from where Chillicothe now stands. The family consisted of the pioneer and his wife and their son Solomon, who was about fourteen years old at that time.

One morning Solomon McCrary took his firelock and went into the woods to hunt deer. A hundred years ago game was plentiful on the border, and every settler depended more or less upon obtaining a large share of his supply of food from this source.

The lad did not have to go far that morning before he caught sight of the branching horns of a buck. The animal was busily stripping a young birch, and was so intently engaged in this occupation that he did not notice the boy's approach until the latter was within seventy feet.

At that instant Solomon chanced to step upon a dry twig that snapped beneath his tread. The deer quickly raised its head and turned to listen for a repetition, then suddenly made a bound from the thicket. But he was not so quick as the hunter's weapon, whose report seemed to echo and re-echo in the forest.

Instantly the boy ran forward ready to dispatch his quarry with his knife, if need be, but he halted dumbfounded, as half a dozen savages, in war paint and feathers, plunged into the glen directly in front of him. There was no time to draw back or in any way elude the redskins, and in another moment Solomon found himself in the grasp of two brawny warriors. He expected to be immediately tomahawked, but strangely enough they offered no violence to their captive.

Meanwhile the other savages were busy cutting up the deer and stowing away the choicest portions in their pouches. They kept up a constant jabbering which was unintelligible to the boy, until one of them stepping before him and holding two bullets in his brown hand, ejaculated, "Ugh! white boy good shot; Injin good shot."

The two bullets had been found implanted in the heart of the buck which had fallen a victim to the marksmansmp of both red and white hunter.

The Indians then made their captive understand that he was to go with them, but they did not offer to bind him or take away his musket, which was a most singular thing for them to do. It was probably owing to their appreciation of his skill as a marksman, for several times through the day as they journeyed along they allowed him to pick off pigeons and rabbits and other game that crossed their path. His success elicited the admiration of the red men, who were unstinted in their praise of his skill.

They kept a sharp eye on him, however, and did not allow him any opportunity to escape.

At night his weapons were taken away from him and he was bound with stout deerskin thongs to two of the Indians. He was secured in such a way that it seemed impossible for him to get away without disturbing his captors. In fact, the first night no good opportunity was given him to put any plan into execution, but the second day he made up his mind that, whatever happened he would endeavor to get off that night.

When they camped he was as usual again tied between two warriors, who were soon as sound asleep as though in the security of their village. Not a sentinel was on guard. Evidently the savages had no fear of pursuit, and as little did they entertain any suspicions of the intention of their captive. But hopeless as it seemed, the boy was eager and alert to recover his liberty.

Raising his head to look about the quiet camp, Solomon caught the glitter of some bright object lying between him and the dying camp fire. His heart almost jumped into his mouth as he saw it was a knife, which must have been carelessly dropped by one of the Indians. It was too far away to be reached by his hands, even if they had been at liberty, but he determined to gain possession of it if possible.

Feeling sure that the savages were all sound asleep he stretched down cautiously and managed to get the knife between the toes of his shoes, but he dropped it several times before he succeeded in bringing it up to his breast, where he could grasp the handle in his hands.

With the greatest silence and stealth he managed after many vain attempts to cut his bonds with the keen-edged knife. It seemed hours to the boy before he was entirely free, but he had succeeded without disturbing a single Indian.

Rising upon his elbows he made a mental note of the position of the sleeping warriors and of their weapons. His thought was to secure the guns, leaving the savages defenseless, while he hastened with all speed through the wilderness for the nearest settlement.

Not an Indian moved as he slowly arose to his feet and cautiously stepped over their prostrate bodies to the spot where their muskets were stacked. Silently, cautiously, with the stealthy movements of a cat, he unlocked the Indians' guns, and, by twos and twos, carried them a short distance from the camp, depositing them in a secret place where they could not easily be found. He was returning for his last load when one of the savages stirred slightly, rubbed his eyes and finally sat up erect.

Crouching low in the darkness, the boy laid his hand upon his knife and waited. The Indian did not lie down, his quick eye noticed the absence of the captive and he sprang to his feet to utter the dreaded warwhoop. It never came. With the spring of a panther, Solomon was upon him, his hand gripped his throat and a stroke of the hunting knife was sufficient.

The camp was now astir; dark, sinewy figures rose on every side, and the boy's case seemed desperate. But he did not blanch the encounter. Springing hastily for the two remaining muskets, he grasped one, and with a hurried aim discharged it at the nearest savage, who fell backward. Clubbing the musket, he knocked another savage senseless. Then throwing the useless weapon aside, Solomon seized the other and dashed into the forest.

He knew that he would be followed, but he had a loaded musket and plenty of ammunition, and he calculated that the Indians would not go far before they returned to search for their missing weapons. After an hour's rapid running he halted to listen for sounds of his pursuers.

Hearing nothing he made a detour to the left, and pushed on in the direction of the settlements. A little after daybreak he paused for a moment to rest on the wooded banks of a large stream. Suddenly his keen ears detected the sound of a breaking twig; he turned just in time. The crack of a rifle resounded through the forest, and the bullet passed so near that he felt its air on his cheek.

Before he had time to seek a cover two Indians sprang out from the underbrush and rushed toward him. In a second he had the foremost covered, and as the smoke of the discharge cleared away it showed the remaining warrior coming forward with uplifted tomahawk.

Solomon met the savage's onslaught with the skill of a born Indian fighter. Ducking his head, he allowed the hatchet to pass harmlessly over him, the next instant he landed upon the Indian with the force of a catapult, knocking him prostrate.

He set forward into the wilderness again and succeeded in reaching the settlement without further molestation, much to the surprise and joy of his parents, who had supposed him dead.

Of the band of Indians who had captured him, he had killed five outright, and wounded another, and all without receiving the slightest scratch himself. The exploit was long regarded as one of the most extraordinary which marks the history of the frontier.

Theological Definitions

By B. F. Rice.

Faith.—Believing that God is still doing the things he did in early times when the church was but two years old.

Repentance.—That state of mind under which if the sin were to do over again we would not do it.

Baptism.—Something that made Paul insert the following parenthesis to keep people from supposing it was simply giving the candidate a bath—(not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God).

Conversion.—Something that the Apostle Peter didn't have up to the night of the mock trial of the Christ. Something that is yet to come to the majority of church members if they are to get into heaven.

Forgiveness.—Something we all petition God for but rarely ever get because we do not pass it along.

Prayer.—A few words that have never before been uttered by the petitioner to God. Vain repetitions are spurious.

Gospel.—The fact that Jesus was resurrected from the dead. All else in and concerning that truth has been written or spoken or thought out concerning the gospel.

Rest.—Keeping your mind off your thoughts.

In Season.—Remembering so you won't forget.

Fear.—Afraid that God is going to hurt you for unpardoned sins.

Heresy.—Not having sense enough to keep still about the unsound condition of the mind in the church.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and to Family Worship

SUNDAY, JANUARY 16.

Theme for the Day.

The Holy Spirit; Creator, Revealer, Comforter.

Scripture.

When he, the spirit of truth, is come, he shall guide you into all the truth.—John 16:13.

And hereby we know that he abideth in us, by the Spirit which he gave us.—I. John 3:24.

Lines.

Greater Spirit, by whose aid
The world's foundations first were laid,
Come, visit every pious mind;
Come, pour thy joys on humankind;
From sin and sorrow set us free,
And make thy temples worthy thee.
—John Dryden ("Veni Creator Spiritus.")

Prayer.

Our Heavenly Father, upon this day which Thou hast blessed, making it the most precious of the week, we draw near to Thee in worship. Thou nast spoken to us in nature in the Holy Word, with its record of the life of our Lord, and in the witness of Thy Holy Spirit with our spirits that we are Thy children. Assist us, we beseech Thee, so to learn the will of God that we may find the way of righteousness and peace, being led by the Spirit into all the truth. Amen.

MONDAY, JANUARY 17.

Theme for the Day.

Waiting for God.

Scripture.

Therefore will the Lord wait, that He may be gracious unto you . . . blessed are all they that wait for Him.—Isa. 30:18.

Lines.

Why should I try to hasten my Lord
With the voice of a clamorous prayer?
Do I not know Him, who long ago,
Took me into His care?
Love does not tarry a needless time,
And the hand of His power is swift,
Oh, lips be silent; oh, heart be strong,
Till He shall with strength uplift!
—Marianne Farringham ("A Song of Waiting.")

Prayer.

Our Father, teach us that patience that is willing to wait for Thy leading, when it seems to be Thy pleasure that we should only stand and wait. Help us to know that Thou art honored as much by our silence as by our speech, our repose as well as our activity, and always by our patient preparation more than by our haste to be in motion. But may all our day, whether active or at rest, be submitted to Thy holy will. Amen.

TUESDAY. JANUARY 18.

Theme for the Day.

The humility of Jesus.

Scripture.

I seek not my own glory.—John 8:50.

We must work the works of Him that sent me, while it is day.—John 9:4.

Lines.

Shall I seek glory, then, as vain men seek,
Oft not deserved? I seek not mine, but his
Who sent me; and therefore thereby witness whence I am.
—John Milton ("Paradise Regained" III.)

Prayer.

Holy Father, we are humbled and astonished by the meekness and gentleness of Christ. He took upon himself the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men. He found his joy in the will of God, and gloried in his lowly estate. May we so follow him that we shall seek not our own wills, but His who sent us into the world. Thus may we learn the joy and the success of the life that counts not self dear, but follows the Master. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 19.

Theme for the Day.

God's voice in the thunders of Sinai.

Scripture.

There were thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud upon the mount, and the voice of a trumpet exceeding loud; and all the people that were in the camp trembled.—Ex. 19:16.

Lines.

Witness the thunder that Mount Sinai heard,
When all the hill with fiery clouds did flame,
And wandering Israel, with the sight afear'd,
Blinded with terror, durst not touch the same.
—Giles Fletcher ("Christ's Victory in Heaven.")

Prayer.

Dear Father, Thou dost not speak to us in the thunders as at Sinai, but in the still, small voice of love. Once hast Thou revealed Thyself to us in Christ Jesus our Lord, and again Thou speakest in the secret place where we meet Thee in prayer. Inspire us with a sense of Thy presence and with the joy of Thy service. Make us sharers in Thy message to the world, and in the triumph of Thy truth. Amen.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 20.

Theme for the Day.

The possession of God.

Scripture.

Whom have I in heaven but thee, and there is none upon earth that I desire beside thee.—Psa. 73:25.

Lines.

As Thou art all, so be Thou all to me,
First, midst, and last, converted One and Three!
My Faith, my Hope, my Love; in this state,
My judge, my witness, and my advocate!
—Ben Johnson ("To Heaven.")

Prayer.

O God, Thou Friend of all who lift their hearts in prayer, we humbly beseech Thee to grant us the blessing of Thy presence, the favor of Thy good will. Without Thee we cannot live; without Thee we dare not die. Satisfy us early with Thy mercy, and give us the comfort of Thy gracious Spirit. Then shall we live all our days in hope, and enter at last into the joy of our Lord. Amen.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 21.

Theme for the Day.

The preciousness of youth.

Scripture.

Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth. While the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh where thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them.—Eccl. 12:1, 2.

Lines.

Before I taught my tongue to wound
My conscience with a sinful sound,
Or had the black art to dispense,
A several sin to every sense,
But felt through all this earthly dress
Bright shoots of everlastingness.
—Henry Vaughan ("The Retreat.")

Prayer.

Father of mercies, we would learn the secret of Thy power and mercy in our early years, in order that our later lives may be spent with Thee. And we would know the blessedness of leading all those of whom we have the oversight into such knowledge of Thyself that in youth they may commit their ways unto the Lord, and enter into the covenants of his grace. Amen.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 22.

Theme for the Day.

Knowledge through experience of the saving power of Christ.

Scripture.

(The man whom Jesus had healed) answered, Whether he be a sinner, I know not. One thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see.—John 9:25.

Lines.

If e'er, when faith had fall'n asleep,
I heard a voice, "Believe no more,"
And heard an ever-breaking shore
That tumbled in the godless deep;

A warmth within the breast would melt
The freezing reason's colder part,
And like a man in wrath the heart
Stood up and answer'd, "I have felt."
—Alfred Tennyson ("In Memoriam.")

Prayer.

Good Father, Thou hast in many ways confirmed our faith in Jesus; but in none more surely than through the witness of our own hearts and lives to his saving power. Beyond and above all the evidence of Thy Word is the testimony of Thy saving grace in our lives. We were blind, but now we see. We were lost, but Thou hast brought us home. And thus Thou hast manifested Thyself to us as wonderful past all our comprehension. Therefore we love Thee, and we would humbly serve Thee now and in a world without end. Amen.

A STORY OF THE TRUSTS

BY JANE RICHARDSON

CHAPTER X.

Mrs. Crofton Champions Bannister's Cause.

When Eleanor returned from her visit to Jessie Clark, whither she had gone on business pertaining to the Neighborly Club, Mrs. Crofton did not think it worth while to mention Bannister's momentous errand until after luncheon, and the intervening time was full of anxious uncertainty. The self-command she had shown in the interview with Bannister, would be severly tested in that impending with her daughter. She was really afraid of approaching Eleanor, for the old affair had long been a subject forbidden between them. There was no putting it off; the growing intimacy between her daughter and Brainard alarmed her, and she altogether disapproved it.

Toward evening, when the fire was mended and burned brightly, and Mrs. Crofton lay upon the sofa propped up with cushions sipping the tea Ann had just brought her, she mustered up courage to approach the dreaded subject of Bannister's visit. She was possessed of that strange fear which has overtaken the bravest and strongest in the presence of the fellow-being to whom he must unburden himself. But she feared failure more than all else.

At length she said abruptly: "Mr. Bannister was here this morning, Eleanor."

Her daughter had been telling her some story of the amusing prattle of the Clark children, and was laughing over it. Now her face hardened instantly, and she turned away.

"I am very glad I was not here," she said coldly.

It was discouraging, but having begun the assault, Mrs. Crofton would not retreat: "He came on very important business," she said, valiantly holding her ground.

"I do not wish to know anything about it."

"But it concerned you!"

"Nothing that Mr. Bannister might do or say, could possibly concern me in the slightest degree."

She was very quiet. It was the mood that Mrs. Crofton most dreaded, and that against which she was most powerless to contend. But her inherent stubborness was proof, at last, against any rebuff.

"He wants you to marry him!" she now said, as bluntly as the suitor himself had done.

"What!" and Eleanor wheeled around and faced her mother with blazing eyes.

Mrs. Crofton began to whimper. "I'm sure, Eleanor, it's cruel in you to rage at me in that way, as if I'd offered you some dreadful insult!"

"You have; it is an insult, from such a man after—after—all that. But I hoped never to speak of it! I consider his visits here last summer an unpardonable affront. He forced himself into this house under the pretext of seeing you."

"He loves you—he has never ceased to love you!"—Mrs. Crofton would not abandon her position.

"Loves me!" cried Eleanor in bitter anger. "He does not know the meaning of the word. Does he suppose that he can pick me up and throw me aside when the whim seizes him? That he can come back now—after all he has done—after all he has been!—"

"But he has sowed his wild oats!"

"'Sowed his wild oats'!—How I loathe the phrase!" cried Eleanor with passionate vehemence. "Suppose I had been sowing wild oats all these years? Do you think Horace Bannister would want me to be his wife? Had he committed every sin named in the decalogue, he would consider himself my superior! Well, then, I refuse the besmirched hand that he has the assurance to offer me. He has sowed his wild oats, as you say, and I decline any part in the harvest!"

"Eleanor, Eleanor, how violent and unwomanly you are!"

"Should I ever marry—and it is not probable—I shall demand of my husband just what the world gives him the right to demand of me; morals, intergrity, honor, equal, at least to my own. Mother, if you have held out to Mr. Bannister any idea that I may be won over—coaxed, cajoled, or forced to accept him upon any condition—disabuse his mind at once!"

"You are cruel to me. I gave him no hope whatever!" cried Mrs. Crofton wiping her eyes ostentatiously. "He deserves some consideration too, now that we are poor, he—"

"There is nothing," proceeded Eleanor sternly, "no loss of friends—no misfortune—loss of home, or even my good name, that I could not bear if called upon to do so, but this—this—I would die before I would accept anything from him! You may tell him all this if you, as I suspect, are to deliver my answer!" And Eleanor walked out of the room, pale, agitated, but cruelly humiliated in her anger.

Mrs. Crofton fell back on her sofa and wept, not so copiously, perhaps, as if her daughter had been present; but she did not despair. There were other tactics to be employed, plaintive nagging, speechless sulkiness, and she believed—not without strong grounds for her opinion—that in the misery she could ordain, Eleanor would yield. Bannister poor and defeated would have been denied but Bannister successful was another matter, and his worldly prospects and possessions were not to be wantonly disregarded.

CHAPTER XI.

The Street Fair.

For two years Carlinville had followed the example of the neighboring towns and held a street fair, an institution quite distinct from the "County fair" held annually in the beautiful well-wooded grounds of the Agricultural Association.

The Street fair, as it was originally planned, promised well and excursion trains from every direction poured their crowds into the town. Stalls were erected in the middle of the wide streets that radiated from the business center, and here were shown fine cattle and horses for which the county was famous. In the business district itself, the merchants erected booths along the curbstones and offered for sale there attractive samples of their wares. With these were countless "side-shows"—open air entertainments, paid for out of the funds raised among long-suffering citizens.

People of the better class regarded the street fair with marked disfavor, usually remaining within doors until it was over and the crowds had dispersed.

It happened that Miss Brainard was entertaining friends from Chicago, during the week of the event. Their visit would be brief and she had set her heart on giving a tea in their honor. The old Crofton mansion was so far from the scene of the tumult that only the faintest echo of the braying bands and the strident shouts of the showmen reached it. She argued that the guests could come by a round-about route and so avoid the disagreeable crowd.

Eleanor Crofton had never entered the house since the day she left it. She had been duly asked to the tea and there was no good reason for declining the invitation, many, on the contrary, why it should be accepted. Yet she shrank from the ordeal and delayed going as long as possible. She had no fear of encountering Brainard who at intervals between his official duties, was engaged in the political canvass; she saw the announcement in the Clarion that he had gone to Terre Haute that morning. Moreover, festivities of the tea-drinking variety were exclusively feminine, ruefully and jokingly avoided by the male members of the family who were expected to get their luncheon down town.

Eleanor set out realizing that she could not possibly avoid all the streets given over to the fair without going too far out of her way. She was already late, but the extravagance of a carriage was out of the question. As she hurried along the thronged side-walk she received in her face a shower of filthy "confetti," scraped from the ground and aimed by a rustic hoyden at her guffawing lover. She gave a low exclamation of annoyance, brushed aside the soiled paper, and walked on more rapidly than before. This incident had one salutary effect—it so vexed and startled her that she hurried to her destination and was received by Miss Abigail before she realized that the trial from which she had shrunk was over. Her hostess had seen her enter the gate and was waiting at the door to welcome her.

Miss Abigail led the way up stairs to Eleanor's old room, saying in her kind voice:

"Come in here, dear, and rest a moment before you go down stairs; you must be tired after your long walk."

Eleanor glanced about the room and her eyes filled with tears; her books, her pictures were just as she had left them—even her desk stood near the window, in its old place. She moved toward it and looked out upon the old familiar scene—the wide lawn, the great trees that rose above the depths of the ravine in which she could hear through the stillness of autumn afternoon the rustling of the leaves, the murmuring of the brook and the wild cry of the yellow winged flicker—the very voice of the forest itself.

"The others were not shown in here; this is kept sacred to you. Robert was pleased with the idea, and there were enough rooms without using this."

This unlooked for bit of sentimentality on the part of Brainard moved and disturbed her. She was a woman of more than ordinary discernment, but she had ignored as long as possible the nature of the regard he had for her. Of late, proof had been only too convincing, though most delicately and timidly advanced. She was conscious, too, of a gradual change of sentiment toward him, but her early experience made her wary of any exhibition of it, though after every interview with Brainard she could not but appreciate the wide difference between him and the man to whom she had given her first love. She had grown more and more reliant on Brainard's assistance, first about her own business affairs, then, about the affairs of the club and almost unconsciously her own inclination was turning in his favor.

"It was far more than I could expect of you, dear Miss Abigail,—far more than I deserve——" and her tears overflowed. She wiped them away and said:

"I'm not at all tired, but I was annoyed at the rudeness I encountered on the streets. I am quite over it now and would much prefer joining the others to keeping you away from your guests!"

The company was made up of old friends, except for the two strangers—charming women who had not come to Carlinville in the urban missionary spirit which seeks, in season and out of season, to enlighten the benighted rustics of the county town.

Almost at once they were ushered to the dining room where the old Crofton appointments were still in use—the tall, solemn moon-faced clock, the ancient serpentine-fronted side-board of bright mahonagy,—the great boast of the family that had been given to Eleanor's great-grandfather by one of the country's Presidents. Shining drop-leap side-tables kept these company, and the old room gave the impression of the earliest years of the nation's first century.

Miss Abigail always said:

"I've no patience with the new style of entertaining,—giving one's guests a thimbleful of weak tea and a sandwich like a scrap of paper." In conformity to this opinion, therefore, the table was spread to its full length, and those who had sat at her abundant board knew just what to expect; platters of tongue and ham sliced to almost transparent thinness, butter from her own dairy, rolls hot from the oven, ruby-colored currant jelly in squat old-fashioned cut-glass dishes; her historic coffee, with pound-cake, for which she was also famous, and little brown, crisp crullers sprinkled with powdered sugar. The ladies did justice to the feast and Miss Abigail beamed upon them from the head of the table.

The guests did not remain late and nine o'clock saw the last of them taking their departure. At a whispered aside from Miss Abigail, Eleanor remained till all were gone:

"I'm going to send you home in the carriage, dear!" she said.

"Indeed, you'll do nothing of the sort!" Eleanor replied emphatically. "I couldn't permit you to take such trouble. You know I'm fond of walking and I'm not in the least afraid."

"Yes; but tonight when the streets are full of drunken men, it will not be safe," urged Miss Abigail.

Eleanor recalled her misadventure of the afternoon with some misgiving, but still insisted that she was not afraid. In the midst of this friendly dispute the library door suddenly opened and Brainard stepped into the hall.

"Why, Robert," exclaimed Miss Abigail in surprise, "I thought you were in Terre Haute!"

"So I was, but I came back by the eight o'clock train. I was not invited to the tea," he said smilingly. He shook hands with Eleanor and when he saw that she was starting home, he asked:

"Why wasn't the carriage ordered?"

"She refused to let me send her home. She's a dear girl, but you know yourself, Robert, she is a little hard to manage!" explained Miss Abigail apologetically, while holding Eleanor's hand affectionately.

"On the contrary, I've never found her so!" Slight as the compliment was Eleanor could not help flushing. She said with a little laugh:

"Thank you! I feel almost as much gratified as if I had been assured that I am a good child."

"Be a good child, then, and do as we want you to do," said Miss Abigail.

"I prefer to walk——" she still insisted.

"Then I shall go with you!" said Brainard in a tone which admitted no denial.

Eleanor was deeply embarrassed, because she, herself, had made Robert's offer to escort her unavoidable. If he considered it a hardship he gave no sign, and as they walked away together down the drive in the moonlight, Miss Abigail looked after them wistfully. But her only remark was oracular in its indefiniteness—"I wonder—I wonder——"

When Brainard and Eleanor approached the streets in which the surging crowds had become noisier and more wildly excited; bands outvying each other, door-keepers of side-shows out-bawling each other, he halted a moment and gazed doubtfully upon the scene.

"Do you think you could venture to go into it a moment for a closer view?"

"Oh, no!" said Eleanor decidedly, but as she spoke she caught sight of Mary Benson. She was with Billy Mullens, and even at that distance Eleanor saw that he had been drinking. They were standing in front of a fortune-teller, a young, blonde Englishman who wore a sweeping robe of red cotton-flannel. He presided over a wooden figure, the head and trunk of an Indian, which rolled its eyes uncannily. From the breast of the Indian, when a coin had been first dropped into the slot, a slip of paper issued mysteriously upon which the "fortune" had been written.

Young Mullens was evidently persuading Mary to patronize the "seer" and she had refused. Eleanor saw the situation and said to Brainard:

"Upon second thought, I believe I will venture," without giving him a hint as to the reason for reconsidering her refusal. Mary had been most faithful in her attendance at the Neighborly Club, and had shown such genuine interest in it that Eleanor's influence over her had strengthened rapidly. She had hoped that her fancy for Billy was at an end. She had not given Eleanor her confidence on this subject although she had talked freely upon others almost as personal and Eleanor had far too much delicacy to force it from the girl. She hoped that she might speak of her own accord and she was determined, that if she ever did, to remonstrate kindly, but without reservation.

Eleanor had seen Teddy Wilkins at the Johnsons' once or twice, and had been favorably impressed with his manliness and good sense, and had almost adopted Susan's opinion, that "he was a big sight too good for Mary Benson, who looked down on him."

Brainard guided Eleanor gently through the rough crowd. When they approached the Indian, Mary had yielded to Mullens' persuasions and was just taking the slip of paper which the young Englishman handed her with a wink and a remark aside to Billy. Eleanor asked Brainard to stop a moment and they stepped back into the shelter of a door-way to await the outcome.

The Power of the Happy Heart

By Rev. R. P. Anderson

When edict of liberation came to the captive nation scattered over the sun-scorched plain of Babylon, the hearts of the people were filled with a great exultation. For half a century they had been crushed and ground to earth beneath a galling foreign yoke; and as the interminable years passed on in dark and melancholy procession, bringing no answer from the silent God to passion-laden prayers, their strength sank as hope merged into despair.

But now, liberty!

"They that wait upon the Lord," cried the prophet whose buoyant optimism the weary months of bitter toil had persistently denied, "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary; they shall walk and not faint."

This is the experience of the human heart.

First, an overpowering uplift like the potent stroke of eagle's wings, a joy that engulfs all sorrow and wipes out the very memory of decades of pain and futile longing and unrewarded effort; then hasty feet to perform the tasks that liberty brings with it, unwearied preparation for the journey home; and lastly, the walk across those arid plains beside the laden beasts, day in and day out. yet a way unfainting, because divinely sustained, a pilgrimage made happy with tender thoughts of home. The trees clapped their hands as the singing pilgrims passed; to their joy-lit eyes the thistles bloomed like roses and the thorns like the fragrant cassia. For happy hearts work miracles!

As the knowledge of liberty breaks upon the heart and the soul enters into freedom from bondage to sin this sense of uplift and new strength is very real. We run to our new tasks impelled by glowing enthusiasm, and are not weary in their accomplishment. We have herculean strength and courage because we have a resurrected hope.

And it is well. The impetus of this virgin enthusiasm should carry us far. Alas, it often weakens and dies. The eager feet grow leaden, the triumphant exultation fades away, and the gray clouds sink lower and lower above us until the thick mist of them chills the heart with the icy coldness of death.

For we are so ready to forget the source of our inspiration and our strength. We become absorbed in the problems of the moment and their adamantine resistance wears us out at last.

The only way to maintain the supreme joy of redemption, the warm glow of a great first love, is to wait upon the Lord, to fix the eye upon Him and not upon the obstacles which bar our way, and to attack the duty of the hour, trusting in His strength and wisdom and guidance.

Look forward! Away into the far distance the gray years stretch! some of them sorrow-laden, all of them filled with chafing toil.

How shall we face these years so that we shall not lose the sense of exultation? How shall we run so that we shall not be weary, or walk and not faint by the way?

Wait upon the Lord!

Gaze upon Him until the face shines with the vision of His glory. In the silent chamber of the mind, all the world shut out, talk to Him as to a Presence whose truest name is Love.

Wait up the Lord!

His presence with us—in our thought and mind—will change the whole aspect of our life. The years, with Him, are no longer gray, but golden; the desert is no longer an arid waste; it blossoms like a rose; the sands sing and the flowers make music and the trees cry out aloud when the heart within us sings.

Wait upon the Lord!

Our panoply is in our mind. Thoughts of God make us invincible. The sun cannot smite by day nor the moon by night, nor can danger dismay with sickening fear the heart that is full of God.

The springs of life are within us. The darkest and most sordid environment can be illumined and glorified if our heart be right. God in the heart is everlasting strength and peace.

We shall walk and not faint.

Church Life

If your church did not take the offering for education last Sunday, do not forget that this interest has the right of way during January.

The churches must look to the colleges for their ministers and informed laymen. Therefore the duty of the church to the college is based upon the principle of self-preservation, though not upon this alone.

Our readers' opinions are interesting reading these days. This is where the reader talks back to the editor.

Preparation for the March offering is already on in many of the churches. These are the churches where the offering will be somewhat commensurate with the strength of the church. The offering will not take itself.

The attention of our readers is called to the pages of book reviews which appear in the paper from time to time. These books are the latest and best publications, and each book review is by one who is a specialist in the subject with which the book deals.

Many of the best preachers are sending in at frequent intervals their church calendars or bulletins. These are of help in compiling our news pages, and the items when gleaned from these church papers and published furnish interesting reading for a very large per cent of the readers of The Christian Century.

The Carondelet Church, St. Louis, Mo., has entered its new building.

The Missouri Christian Message, for January contains the official list of the preachers of the state.

R. P. McPherson and Lowell McPherson are in a meeting with the church at Parsons, Kans., Large audiences have been in attendance.

The first day of the meeting at Flora, Ill., E. B. Redd, pastor, B. F. Hill and son, evangelists, brought eighteen accessions to the church.

T. M. Wiles has become pastor of the East Lynn Christian Church, Anderson, Ind., and began work with the congregation the first Sunday in the new year.

Dr. Errett Gates is conducting a course of study in the History of the Disciples during the present quarter for the students of the Disciples' Divinity House.

D. W. Moore, pastor of the church at Carthage, Mo., and H. M. Barnett, pastor at Webb City, exchanged pulpits the second sunday in January.

T. H. Capp, has resigned as pastor of the Woodson Chapel Christian Church, St. Joseph, Mo., and accepted a call to the King Hill Church the same city.

J. T. Shreve is to be co-laborer with M. M. Goode, in the work of the Wyatt Park Church, St. Joseph, Mo. Mr. Goode has been pastor of this church for twelve years.

The Carolina Evangel publishes in full the address "Thomas Campbell and the Principles He Promulgated," made by Prof. Herbert L. Willett at Pittsburg last October.

Rev. R. L. Beschers of Walnut, Ill., supplied the pulpit of the Central Christian Church, Rockford, Ill., Sunday morning and evening. No successor to W. D. Ward has yet been called.

The pulpit of the South Chicago church was supplied on Sunday, January 9, by E. A. Henry of the University. There was one confession of faith in the evening.

Joseph C. Todd, pastor of Kirkwood Avenue Christian Church at Bloomington, Ind., is with the church at Greencastle, Ind., in a series of meetings.

University Church, Champaign, Ill., will begin a revival meeting early in February, when they will be assisted by Evangelist Charles Bloom and Mrs. J. E. Powell.

I. Raymond Lines of Newman, Ill., has been called to the pastorate of the Monroe Street Church, Chicago. The definite time when he is to begin his work in the city has not been announced.

Claude E. Hill, pastor of the church at Valparaiso, Ind., is giving a series of weekly Bible lectures to the students of the Valparaiso University. The lectures are held in the college chapel.

J. M. Lowe is entertaining upon a meeting with the church in Topeka, Kans., David Lyon, minister. Mr. Lowe has the month of March unengaged. His address is University Place, Des Moines, Iowa.

The Union Avenue Church, St. Louis reports the best year in its history. It is universally regretted in St. Louis that this month marks the close of the ministry of J. M. Philputt with this great church.

I. J. Cahill, who has just closed his thirteen years' pastorate at Dayton, Ohio, was announced to preach for the First Church, Philadelphia, Pa., the first and second Sundays in January.

J. Frank Green of Marietta, Ohio, who is to become field secretary for the church in northern Michigan, will also have charge of the newly-dedicated church at Cadillac. Mr. Green will begin his work February 1.

W. T. Adams, evangelist, has just closed a successful meeting in Wallowa, Oregon. W. S. Crockett says the result of the meeting is substantial and will have a wholesome effect upon the church in the years to come.

The enrollment at Drake University for the first quarter of the year was well above thirteen hundred, the best record in the history of the school. A new gymnasium for the men has just been erected—the eleventh upon the campus.

Since J. F. Findley took charge of the church at Fort Collins, Colo., four years ago, there have been 514 received into the membership of the church. The church has raised for current expenses $9,050; for church debt, $1,332; for missions, $841.40.

Joseph Franklin, Anderson, Ind., has been called upon to pass through the shadow on account of the passing of his wife, early in January. Mr. Franklin leaves Anderson to make his home with a daughter at 3019 Walton street, Cleveland, Ohio.

W. F. Reynolds began work as pastor of the First Church, Plano, Texas, the first Sunday of the new year. This is one of the strong churches of the state, and the Christian Courier expresses pleasure that the church has induced Mr. Reynolds to take up the work with them.

Good audiences and increased attendance in the Sunday-school at the Howett Street Church, Peoria, encourage the heart of Pastor William Price. The Sunday-school now numbers nearly two hundred each Sunday. A building fund has been started, and the church faces the future hopefully.

On Sunday, January 16, the church at Bloomfield, Iowa, begins a series of meetings with I. F. Cahill of Dayton, Ohio, evangelist, and Professor Otto C. Petit of Mt. Sterling, Iowa, singer. F. D. Ferrall is beginning his fifth year as pastor of this church, with the love and confidence of a loyal membership.

Members of the First Christian Church at Evansville, Ind., are enjoying the musical perfections of the new pipe-organ which has just been placed in the church. Professor F. G. Hass gave a most delightful recital January 7, and the new organ proved highly satisfactory to the congregation. The dedicatory service will be held later.

On Friday evening, January 7, at the home of the bride, 6128 Champlain avenue, Chicago, Mr. Walter Williams and Miss Georgia Stephenson were united in marriage by Edward A. Henry. The happy couple were both members of the Fairview Christian Church, Millford, Ill., when Mr. Henry was pastor of that church.

The Broadway Church, Louisville, Ky., reopened January 2, after having spent $15,000 in improvements. W. J. Wright had charge of the dedicatory service, and asked for pledges to meet a balance of $5,000 in the building expense. He received $6,100. The following day Mr. Wright began a meeting with the church, the singing being led by H. S. Saxton.

Professor Matthews of the Divinity School of the University of Chicago, spoke at Memorial Church of Christ on Sunday evening, December 26, on the theme, 'Does the World Want the Gospel?" It was an address full of Christmas sentiment, but it faced the most important question of our present age—the attitude of the average man toward the program of Jesus.

The new North Park Christian Church, Indianapolis, Ind., was dedicated Sunday, January 16, 1910. F. M. Rains had charge. The new building is very complete and by far the best building for the purpose in the north part of the city. All seem to be in good heart and the outlook is bright. The pastor has been assisting Mr. Smith of the West Park Church for the past three weeks in a profitable meeting. There were some thirty-five additions. A tithers' league is one of the possibilities of the near future.

O. W. Lawrence and the Central Church, Decatur, Ill., have the assistance of C. M. Chilton, pastor—we had almost said of the churches of St. Joseph, Mo.—it is that for he has been there to see them all grow from infancy, and has had no little part in their growth—pastor of the First Church, St. Joseph, Mo., and Mrs. J. E. Powell as leader of song. No better combination could be found for a meeting. The results of the meeting may never find their way into the printed page, but every one who knows these workers is already assured of the success of the meeting.

The official board of the church at Beatrice, Neb., at the close of the fourth year of the pastorate of J. E. Davis, passed unanimously resolutions commending the work that Mr. Davis has done in leading to the construction of their new and beautiful house of worship, in his preaching, which makes strong appeal to men, in his ability to make close and strong personal friendships, and through them be a blessing to the church and to the community, in his fearless championship of every civic interest, and in the worth of his own manhood. The resolution further expresses the belief of the church in the advisability of the long pastorate and expresses the hope that Mr. Davis will remain as pastor of the church for many years to come.

The library of the Disciples' Divinity House contains perhaps the most complete collection of documents relative to the history of the Disciples of Christ in existence. A number of very valuable books have been given by Disciples in various places who realize that the literature pertaining to the early days is rapidly disappearing. Copies of any of our earlier publications or indeed of any work that relates to the lives and teaching of the fathers or the prominent successors in this reformation would be of great service if donated to the library of the Divinity House; also files of our religious papers. Several times of late students of our history have visited the University for the purpose of consulting the documents on hand, or have sent for particular volumes which they could not secure in any other way.

G. L. Lobdell, of Chico, Oregon, and J. J. Evans of Sacramento, Cal., are to exchange meetings in the spring.

The next annual convention of the churches in Iowa will be held in Boone the later part of June.

Fred A. Nicholls has become pastor of the church at Shelbyville, Ohio and starts out with encouraging prospects.

C. D. Hougham succeeds S. J. Epler in the pastorate of the church at Brooklyn, Iowa.

The church at Vacaville, Cal., has adopted the "merger service," beginning the new order of things January 1. F. E. Boren is pastor.

The Sunday-school of the First Christian Church at Massillon, Ohio, has begun one of its resolutions for the new year, that of grading the school.

Last Friday evening at the home of Mrs. O. F. Danis, Milwaukee, a reception by the members and friends of the church was held in honor of Pastor C. L. Waite's recent nuptials.

During November and December W. P. Bentley of Berkeley, Cal., delivered nine C. W. B. M. addresses, at Stockton, Fresno, Alameda, Red Bluff, Chico, Denair, Turlock, Clovis and Dinuba.

In a quiet way C. H. Winders is ever pressing forward his work as pastor. At the Downey Ave. Church, Indianapolis there have been sixty accessions to the church since September.

The new church at Austin, Ill., George A. Campbell, pastor, is to be dedicated January 30. This congregation has been worshipping with the Congregational church during the past year and one half.

R. P. Shepherd, at one time pastor at Berkeley, is acting secretary of Southern California, since the resignation of Grant K. Lewis. No one has as yet been secured to take up that great work permanently.

John A. Hutchings now of Canton, Mo., was ordained to the ministry January 2. He and Leslie Finnell now of Lexington, Ky., were sent from Jackson Avenue Church, Kansas City, Mo., the past year. Two excellent young men.

Richard Martin, the evangelist of the "Martin family," is leading in a fine meeting at Salisbury, Mo., with three adult additions the first night and large audiences in the newly dedicated $12,000 church. E. H. Bassett is the influential minister.

The net gain in the membership of the Central Church, Kansas City, Kans., during the past year was twenty-seven. The church is a living link in the work of city missions. W. S. Lowe is the pastor. A hopeful condition prevails throughout the church.

Oscar Sweeney, pastor of the church at Oceanside, California, writes regularly for a local paper under the heading "Progressive Oceanside."—notes and personals. Mr. Sweeney manifestly possesses originality in his writing and weaves the different items of news into a whole in such a way as to insure that every word will be read. Our preachers should make larger use of the daily press.

In an editorial the Celar Rapids Gazette says: The resignation of Rev. G. B. Van Arsdall, pastor of the Christian Church, comes as a surprise to practically the entire city. And it is not a welcome surprise, either. Dr. Van Arsdall has won, during his five years' residence here, the friendship and admiration of the people not alone of his own denomination, but of other denominations and of the people of no denomination. All these friends will regret very much to see Rev. Van Arsdall leave the city; but all will join with The Gazette in congratulating him upon the call to such a great church as the one at Denver."

GRADE YOUR SCHOOL

On the Installment Plan!

Every informed Sunday-school worker desires to have the graded system introduced into his school. But it seems like too big an undertaking to grade the school all at once. Hence nothing at all is done, and the school goes on in the same old absurd way of teaching the children the lessons provided for grown-up people.

The International S. S. Committee has made it possible to bring the graded system in, like the Kingdom of God comes, "without observation." You can have your school graded without any agony—almost without knowing it, except in its beneficent results. Begin at the bottom now—with the elementary grades, the pupils under twelve years old. Provide teachers and pupils with the Bethany Graded Lessons, based on the outlines already authorized by the International Committee. Later on—perhaps in nine months or a year from now—when the Committee authorizes an outline of lessons for the Intermediate grades you will be ready to adopt them and the Bethany Series will be ready with the helps for you. And so on, through the Senior and Advanced grades, follow the International Committee and as fast as they provide the lessons you will be ready to adopt them.

Our advice to all schools, then, is: FOLLOW THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE. No independent course yet devised is better than that provided by the International Committee, if indeed there is one so good in all respects. Besides, there is advantage in the whole Sunday-school world studying together when our leaders really lead—as the International Committee is now doing.

The Bethany Graded Lessons may be commenced at any time. Purchase the main bulk of your supplies wherever you wish, but let us furnish you these fascinating lessons for your pupils under twelve. THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO., 700 East Fortieth Street, Chicago.

The report of the Central Church, Indianapolis, Ind., for the year 1909 shows: Amount raised in all departments for all purposes, $14,000. Of this amount $5,000 went for missions, the Ladies' Missionary Society raising $3,225 of it. The Sunday-school raised $1200, of which $585 went to missions. The current expenses of the church were all paid and a small surplus left in the treasury. There were 145 additions to the church during the year, forty-five by confession and baptism. There was a loss by dismissal and death of sixty, leaving a net gain of eighty-five. The Sunday-school has an enrollment of about 1000, with an average attendance of 400. The church is thoroughly organized and active in every department. This is the best year in results of the present pastorate. Allen B. Philputt is pastor.

The reports at the annual meeting of the Central Church, Warren, Ohio, where J. E. Lynn, ministers shows a marked increase in financial receipts in a number of the departments of the church, notably in the Bible-school, C. W. B. M. and Missionary Circle. The amount given by the entire church and its societies for missions and education is about $300 larger than the record of any previous year in its history. The amount given to outside itnerests is nearly half that raised for local work. Total amount for missions and education, $2,534; total for local work, $,421.65; grand total for all purposes, $7,955.92. Number added to membership, 118. Present resident roll, 960. Mr. Lynn rounds out his sixth year at Warren soon.

Another fellowship meeting of all the Disciples of Christ in the city of Des Moines such as we held two years ago is being planned. This fellowship meeting will be held in the University Place Church in its large auditorium during the last days of Peter Ainslee's meeting at the Central Church. The churches will ask Mr. Ainslie to give the address following communion service. The date will be announced very shortly, but it will possibly be the last Sunday in March. It ought to be a meeting that will call together a great host who shall rejoice in a common faith and the common Savior.

As We Go to Press

Arkansas City, Kans., January 10.—Four additions yesterday.—Thomas H. Popplewell.

London, Ontario, January 10.—Three confessions here yesterday at our regular services.—B. H. Hayden.

Little Rock, Ark., Jan. 16: One hundred sixteen last week; sixty-two more today; 654 to date. Phenomenal awakening; the whole state is stirred. The South is tremendously interested. The meeting marks a record for the south. Meeting continues. Scoville and Company, irresistable.—J. N. Jessup.

Winchester. Ind., Jan. 16: Rufus A. Finnell, of Indianapolis, is with us in a great meeting. The gates of sin are stormed nightly by his wonderful sermons. He is found to be one of our strongest and wisest evangelists with a wealth of knowledge, and great faith. House entirely inadequate; largest theater filled today. Twenty-three added in six days, from fine families and nearly all adults.—J. A. Persinger, Minister.

Fairburg, Nebr., Jan. 10: Wonderful short meeting with Herbert Yeuell. One hundred and seven in fifteen days. Yeuell passionate and dramatic preacher. Has lectures of great Chautauqua interest and attracts large crowds. Buss and Sturgis splendid team of singers.—Thomas A. Maxwell.

Louisville, Ky., Jan. 10: Wright and Saxton at Broadway Church; enlarged building dedicated Jan. 2. Six thousand dollars raised completing fund; twenty-seven added yesterday; Sunday-school 476.—W. N. Briney.

Kansas City, Mo., Jan. 5: Our first day at Independence Boulevard Church: twenty confessions yesterday sermon by Mr. Taubman in Sunday-school; two by relation. Preaching during week of prayer by evangelist, Small. Geo. H. Combs, Minister, Geo. P. Taubman, Jas. Small, Associate Ministers.

J. H. McCartney has been called to take charge of the church at Bedford, Ohio. This is the third term of service of this pastor with this church.

J. M. Rudy, pastor of the church at Greencastle, Ind., held a meeting at Bluefield, W. Va., during the holidays, in which there were forty-nine accessions to the church. Dr. W. S. Bullard is the pastor at Bluefield and is doing excellent work.

The meetings at Flora, Ill., led by B. F. Hill and son are growing in interest. The audiences are so large that it is necessary for part of the people to stand. The evangelists go next to Lanark, Ill.

Owing to an epidemic in one place, and inability to adjust dates for another, William J. Wright is available for dedications and evangelistic work from the 23rd of January throughout February. He may be addressed at 2523 Moorman Ave., Cincinnati, Ohio.

Leonard V. Barbre, minister of the church at Carlisle, Ind., is making a practice of extending the invitation at the Sunday-school service each Sunday morning. There are frequent additions to the church through this means.

Marion Stevenson, National Sunday-school Superintendent, and Gary L. Cook, State Sunday-school Superintendent, are announced for an institute at Butler College, Indianapolis, January 24-30. The meetings are to be held at the Downey Avenue Christian Church.

The church at Troy, New York, Cecil J. Armstrong, pastor, has announced on a neatly printed folder the topics of the midweek prayer meetings for the months of January and February. They use the topics prepared by the international committee.

J. W. Marshall is leading the forces in a meeting at French Lick, Ind. There have been more than thirty-four additions to the church. A new house of worship is just being completed. Dedicatory services will be held in May.

Dr. George H. Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard, Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo., is giving a series of Sunday evening sermons to young men. His subject the first evening was: "Man's Rights." He took as his text, "for thou hast maintained my rights." The second sermon will me, "Woman's rights."

The following sermon topics constitute a series for the closing Sunday eveings of the pastorate of George B. VanArsdall, Cedar Rapids, Iowa: The general subject is "The Most Cogent Reasons For My Faith," which will be treated under the following phases: (1) "My Faith in God." (2) "My Faith in Christ." (3) "My Faith in the Bible." (4) "My Faith in Immortality." These sermons will discuss the foundations of the Christian Faith.

The meeting in progress at the First Church, Bloomington, Ill., is attracting much attention in the community. John E. Pounds is doing the preaching, and has the assistance of Miss Martha, his daughter, in the music. Miss Pounds has had the advantage of training in the best musical schools of America, and possesses a voice of rare clearness and beauty. She directs the chorus and sings solos at each service. Her work is most highly commended by the local press. The audiences in attendance upon these meetings have taxed the seating capacity of the church, which is one of the largest among the Disciples of Illinois. Edgar DeWitt Jones is the successful pastor of the church.

The meeting of the Central Kentucky Ministerial Association was held at the Broadway Church, Lexington, January 1. The themes for discussion were: "The Sunday-school Plans for 1910," by W. E. Ellis; "The Best Practical Evangelism," by Mark Collis; "How to Secure the Best Midweek Prayer-Meeting," by H. C. Garrison, while W. C. Morrow recommended a reading course for ministers for the year. We shall be glad to have more reports from these ministerial meetings; not so much merely in the enumeration of topics and speakers as in the practical suggestions and actual news that may be developed in these meetings. When you have something good in your own meeting let the brethren everywhere share it.

We are in receipt of an invitation to the Installation and Covenant service of the First Church, El Paso, Texas, held January 9. The practice of placing emphasis upon the advent of a pastor upon his ministry with church is becoming more and more common among the Disciples. The relationship is a serious one, and whatever tends to emphasis this feature of it must have a wholesome effect, and may help to answer the cry for longer pastorates. At any rate we are glad to announce that the First Church, ElPaso, has seen well to hold such a service for the new pastor, Perry J. Rice. The program they announce is an interesting one. The charge to the minister was delivered by Frederick F. Grim, Secretary of the New Mexico—West Texas Missionary Society, and the charge to the people by Dr. W. E. Garrison, President of New Mexico College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts. This was followed by a beautiful covenant service, printed in full, and constituting a pledge between the minister, the elders and deacons and the members of the church. A service such as this can but lend dignity to the coming of a new minister into the community, and impress upon the minister and people the responsibility which they assume as they enter this sacred relationship.

Dr. J. M. Philputt, in concluding his annual report to the Union Avenue Christian Church, of St. Louis, said, in speaking of the sacred relationship of pastor and people, "The true reward of a minister is the heart-to-heart fellowship with his people, whether in joy or sorrow. An interval of time or space can ever destroy the sweet friendships formed here, or dim the interest we shall ever, feel for you as individuals and as a church."

The men of the East Dallas Christian Church presented the pastor, Cephas Shelburne, with a handsome gold watch in a social meeting on New Year's night. Elder R. B. Hammond was their spokesman, stating that they took this means of expressing their appreciation of the pastor's Christian worth and work. Brother Shelburne reports six more additions.

Additional Reports

CENTRAL CHURCH, JACKSONVILLE, ILL.
Russell F. Thrapp, Pastor.

Over one thousand members contributed to current expenses and missions; 26,706 was the total attendance at the Bible-school, averaging 513 per Sunday. $680.89 was raised by the church for current expenses and missions. Herbert P. Shaw is the missionary of the church at Shanghai, China. Men's Bible-class averaged eighty-nine per Sunday in attendance.

CENTRAL CHURCH, WICHITA, KAN.
Walter Scott Priest, Pastor.

The new pastor of the church writes:

Since I came to be minister of the congregation the first of November, 1909, we have raised $350 for State missions, making us a Living Link in that important work (the church was already a Living Link in the Foreign Society) and, enough was raised to

The Bethany Graded Sunday-School Lessons

Will the new Graded lessons make their way into the Sunday-schools and become the standard lessons of the Sunday-schools of the world as the Uniform lessons have done? There are many signs indicating that this is precisely what will happen.

1. All the authorities in religious pedagogy have been a long time agreed that it is better to suit the lesson to the learner than to compel the learner to adapt himself to the lesson, regardless of his stage of mental development.

2. The International Committee which has for thirty-five years selected the Uniform lessons has now begun the issue of an additional series called the International Graded Course, consisting, not of one Scripture lesson for the entire school, but of a separate series of lessons for each year or grade, chosen with direct reference to the age and ability of the pupils.

3. These lessons are being adopted by the best schools of all denominations. The Presbyterians report that about two thousand of their schools adopted the International Graded courses for children under twelve years, last quarter. This is phenomenal. The Methodists and Congregationalists had to go to press the second and third time to supply the unexpected demand for the graded lessons.

The New Christian Century Co. is supplying these lessons to the Disciples' schools. There is no single achievement in which the publishers of this paper take greater satisfaction than in connecting our schools with this most significant Sunday-school advance of the last fifty years.

The editors of The Christian Century, Mr. Morrison and Professor Willett, both regard the Graded principle as essential to the highest efficiency in religious instruction, and both believe that the Bethany Series is the truest, simplest and most artistic set of supplies for the elementary grades that has ever been put out.

Our pleasure in offering the Bethany Graded Lessons to the brotherhood is enhanced by the fact that our orders for supplies for the winter quarter have been much beyond our expectations. Many other schools have assured us of their purpose to adopt The Bethany Lessons at once. This series may be begun at any time. See full description on another page.

continue Miss Ada Boyd as the Living Link of the C. W. B. M., at a cost of $600 per year. There have been forty-three additions in the two months and the tasks we have set before us for 1910 are the payment of the remaining debt on our church building, the locating of a minister with the North-end mission; the starting of a mission Bible-school on the West Side; becoming a Living Link in the A. C. M. S. next May and the addition of 200 members to our congregation. Here is enough work mapped out to keep us busy and in addition I most earnestly desire to place a religious paper in every home; increase the attendance at the Bible-school and prayer service and do all things else to make this great church yet greater in soul winning and in the reproduction in the daily life of the sweet spirit and holy character of the Lord Jesus.

Number additions to church, by baptism, 12; by renewal 4; by letter, 19; by statement, 7; total 42

The reports from the various departments of the church showed that during the past year the sum of $4,000 had been raised and expended for the work of the church. The Bible-school has enjoyed a net increase of 100 pupils and there are now enrolled 610 pupils.

The church membership shows an enrolmen of 595, which is an increase over a year ago. A new feature of the work for the coming year is the agreement that has been made by the church to maintain its own missionary in the foreign field.

Chicago

Efforts at Closer Co-operation in City Work

By O. F. Jordan

The official boards of the different churches of Chicago met in a restaurant one evening not long since to talk over some of the common problems of the churches. It was such a meeting as had often been talked of but not before realized. In our union gatherings it has always been difficult to get busy men who are the leading spirits in the local churches to come together in large numbers. The mere fact of having gotten these wise and capable lay leaders together was an omen of a better future.

The point of most acute interest was the matter of our church buildings. In no point are the Disciples behind their ecclesiastical neighbors in Chicago more than in the matter of fit places in which to worship God and to carry on the work of the Kingdom. We have a ministry that will average up with any and we have a progressive spirit that is not one whit behind the foremost. We are sadly lacking, however, in that kind of material equipment with which the church makes its impression upon the outside public.

The Church Extension Society has done much to help us in this regard in Chicago. The majority of the church debts here are carried by that excellent organization. Our churches are paying these loans back. Douglas Park has just returned half of their money. Sheffield Avenue has cut the original loan in two. At many other places in our city it has been demonstrated that the Church Extension Society has been an invaluable helper. There is every feeling in Chicago that we ought to contribute as much as possible to this excellent organization and to turn to it for help when we are building, as we have so often done.

The worthy secretary of the Church Extension Society, however, admits that situations do arise when church extension needs to be supplemented with other methods. The church building societies of some denominations give their money outright in many cases. The Disciples have demonstrated that the loan plan can be worked advantageously in most cases. In the city, however, we need another kind of help.

Our city congregations have no rich men in them as things go in Chicago. Many of our congregations have not a single man that can hand out large sums of money in a lump for a building as is done in other parts of the brotherhood. Our building funds are gathered painfully by the installment payments of the salaried class and the wage earners. They give more liberally for their means than any other class. The only way, however, to secure large results is to secure extended coöperation and to work at building funds year after year.

Words of Appreciation

AN EDUCATIONAL CAMPAIGN

I want to congratulate the Foreign Society on the magnificent showing it has made. There is today a great awakening on the subject of "world-wide evangelization" among all the churches. Not only has the Foreign Society succeeded in securing thousands of dollars and sent forth the most intellectual and most spiritual of our people to the foreign field, but it has been conducting a great educational campaign in all these years, which will be of untold value to the work in the coming days.—P. H. Welshimer, Canton, Ohio.

THE TIME

OFFERING FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS
FIRST SUNDAY IN MARCH

HIGH-WATER MARK

The aims and work of our pioneer leaders and their historical descendants for one hundred years found expression and reached a fitting climax in the great Pittsburg Convention.

And it must have been apparent to every thoughtful and discerning mind that the splendid showing made by the Foreign Christian Missionary Society in growth of receipts, enlargement of plans and equipment, inspiring reports from returned missionaries and those on the distant fields with a masterly grip of the whole situation, lifted this great Centennial gathering to the highest point we have ever touched in all our history.

It is certainly a time for devout thanksgiving.—C. J. Tannar, Detroit, Mich.

A WONDROUS CONTRIBUTION

While "Pittsburg 1909" stands for one hundred years of history, the Foreign Christian Missionary Society has been at its world task but one-third of that time. When this is remembered the results amaze one.

As great movements in world life are counted, 1875 is but yesterday. And yet, within the few years since that date, our Foreign Society has gathered for the cause of Christ in alien lands the vast sum of $3,699,342.

In 1875, as a people, we had no one speaking for us in other tongues the love of God for man. Now, India, Japan, China, the Philippine Islands, Cuba and Tibet have rolls of the redeemed where our heralds have gone and many European nations also are being taught the way of the Lord more perfectly.

In 1875 doctrines waited the confirmation of deeds. Now our hospitals, asylums, orphanages and schools tell of the actual authority of the Son of God over all we have and are, and great souls tirelessly preaching at cost of all the earth holds dear, are opening hearts to the prayer of Jesus, that His people may be one.

How rich we are today in the sacred names of our missionaries who live in ten thousand homes daily! How rich in vision—opening to thought, all lands! How rich in literature—giving acquaintance everywhere! How rich in knowledge of needs—giving heart to conversation and purpose to toil! How rich in love for those we do not know! How rich in privilege—speaking in tongues! How rich in graves, halting us in our selfishness! How rich in life's new meaning—the Christlike gift of self in service to mankind! Thank God for the years between 1875 and now! Thank God for the way the Foreign Christian Missionary Society has improved them! Thank God for the future's promise of even larger life!—Charles Medbury, University Place, Des Moines, Iowa.

churches for definite amounts. These pledges brought the membership of the Building Syndicate up to a hundred in a single night with every expectation that we shall be able to reach the two hundred mark soon.

The operation of the Building Syndicate will house every one of our missions in a few years. A thousand dollars added to what almost any mission can raise will buy a lot. The Church Extension when it has the funds can assist enough to finish up the task. Once in a house with a worthy equipment, the mission enters on a career of usefulness where it can repay its loan and can become one of the supporters of the united program in the city.

Already the building talk in the air around Chicago is most gratifying. Austin will dedicate their social center on January 24, and will use this building for church purposes for a time, after which they will build on their corner their house of worship proper. Evanston has gotten things shaped up to get started as soon as the weather permits on a building that will be used for social purposes and for the present for worship as well. Irving Park has no definite plans yet but is sufficiently alive to the need of a better building that they are undertaking to raise a thousand dollars this winter to put in the bank toward a building. The little group at Armitage avenue often talk of purchasing the Norwegian building which they now rent. These are but a few of the projects that are being talked around Chicago.

We have learned our expensive lesson here about buildings. Wild-cat finance lost us the most handsome building we ever erected in Chicago, the old Central Church. The North Side Church also ventured and lost all. We have churches in Chicago today so burdened with debt that their usefulness is largely curtailed. In the church building enterprises of the future three new notes will be sounded. First of all, we will insist upon conservative finance. We have learned that a big emotional shouting movement will not carry through a proposition that is not sound at heart. In the second place, we will erect a type of church building that is more adapted to the city life. We need big auditoriums less than we do effective Sunday-school equipment and room for social enterprises. Such buildings are actually cheaper to build and command more support outside the church. In the third place, we shall in the future have more of the union spirit that will make the success of each individual church the concern of all. Some of our enterprises in the past might have succeeded with a coöperating group of churches back of them. The new word we sound now continually is "Coöperation."

IN A SHADOW
Inveterate Tea Drinker Feared Paralysis.

Steady use of either tea or coffee often produces alarming symptoms as the poison (caffeine) contained in these beverages acts with more potency in some persons than in others.

"I was never a coffee drinker," writes an Ill. woman, "but a tea drinker. I was very nervous, had frequent spells of sick headache and heart trouble, and was subject at times to severe attacks of bilious colic.

"No end of sleepless nights—would have spells at night when my right side would get numb and tingle like a thousand needles were pricking my flesh. At times I could hardly put my tongue out of my mouth and my right eye and ear were affected.

"The doctors told me I was liable to become paralyzed at any time, so I was in constant dread. I took medicine of various doctors and no end of patent medicine—but all to no good.

"The doctors told me to quit using tea, but I thought I could not live without it—that it was my only stay, I had been a tea drinker for twenty-five years; was under the doctor's care for fifteen.

"About six months ago, I finally quit tea and commenced to drink Postum.

"I have never had one spell of sick-headache since and only one light attack of bilious colic. Have quit having those numb spells at night, sleep well and my heart is getting stronger all the time."

Russian Mission in New York City

By Joseph Keevil

For some time we have been acquainted with the fact that there was in New York City a small group of Russian Christians who accept the New Testament as their only rule of faith and practice. We have felt, a better understanding of the doctrinal position of each other, would result in a closer union and a more effective service for the Master among this rapidly growing people. This has been the task before us. Last winter the Disciples' Missionary Union began a successful work, teaching them, in night classes, the English language. This effort bore fruit in bringing us in closer touch with them, gaining their confidence and respect and enabling us to understand many of their problems. With the coming of this winter we felt jutsified in seeking suitable quarters in the heart of the Russian section of the city and prepared for a larger and better work. A splendid store building was secured at 341 East Fifth street. Evening classes, meeting Monday and Friday of each week, were organized under the efficient leadership of P. F. Jerome to teach them the English language. This work promises to be very successful, as its value is being recognized more and more by the Russians.

A Class of Russian Jews Studying the English Language.

December 26, 1909, and January 2, 1910, a conference was held with the Russian Christians considering in full their doctrinal position and giving to them a statement of the position of the Disciples of Christ. After a full and free discussion of every doctrine, we found ourselves in the fullest sympathy with each other and the only thing left to do was to unite in the service of a common MasterJesus Christ. That we might definely understand them the following statement was submitted to us:

"The Russian Christian Congregation, to the Disciples' Missionary Union, Greeting:

"After conference with different members of your union and a full investigation of your teaching, we find ourselves in accord with you in doctrine and practice and feel for the honor of our Lord and the salvation of our people we should unite in the service of Our Lord, that we may understand each other we respectfully submit the following as the basis of coöperation:

1. We pledge our loyalty to Jesus Christ and obedience to Him in all things.
2. We accept the Bible, as our only rule of faith and practice.
3. That we, the Russian Christians, attend to all matters relating to the internal affairs of our congregation, so long as we are in harmony with the teaching of the New Testament.
4. That all matters from the Disciples' Missionary Union must be presented to our congregation, at one of the regular meetings, and only such matters as are properly passed upon shall be binding upon us."

What could we do, but unite and work together for the salvation of the multitudes coming to our shores, from that priest-ridden land of Russia. This we decided to do."

Arrangements were made for a formal opening of the work in the building January 9, with a special service at 3:30 p. m. At the time of meeting sixty-six Russians had gathered and representatives from nearly all of our churches in the city. The service was conducted wholly in the Russian tongue except a short address by the superintendent of city missions which was spoken through an interpreter. The program, as carried out, was as follows:

1. Hymn, "Stand up Stand up for Jesus."
2. Prayer, by Brother S. Krukoff.
3. Special Music, by an Octette.
4. Sermon, by Brother Peter Johnson.
5. Address, by Supt. of City Missions.
6. Special music, by Octette.
7. Sermon by Brother John Johnson.
8. Prayer, by John Johnson and Joseph Keevil.

. Closing Hymn, by congregation, "Abide With Me."

This simple, but deeply spiritual and helpful service marks, we hope, the beginning of a work among this people that will mean the salvation of thousands. In the last two years the Russian Empire and Finland sent to our shores 277,171 of their people. Here is a work God is calling us to do. Shall we not respond? The opportunity is now.

National Bible-School Association

The work which began one year ago in more or less uncertainty has now developed well-defined policies and plans, and has grown into a compact and well-ordered organization with the help of forty-two state Bible-school superintendents and fifteen efficient directors.

We come to the opening of the second year work with a very high standard for Bible-schools, known as the "Front Rank Standard for 1910." All of the forty-two state Bible-school superintendents are determined to bring hundreds of our schools up to this standard.

During the eleven months we have received from all sources $4,659.16; $2,300 of this has come from the treasuries of our missionary societies, which have so kindly helped us. The total expenditures for the eleven months including some present obligations, are $5,121.90.

Including some obligations which this month of January brings to us we find it necessary to have $700 if we close this year without embarrassment of debt. Every Bible school in the brotherhood should send us their next Sunday's regular offerings for this work, that it may be not only relieved from possible debt, but also that large and important plans for the next year be carried and preparing for a larger and better work. by urged to bring this matter before his school next Sunday morning and ask them to send the regular offering that day to our treasury. Very few schools will deny such a request if the superintendent brings it to them. The work which lies before me immediately is a week in each of the four following colleges: Hiram, Butler, Oklahoma Christian University, Texas Christian University; and, the first half of February in Florida; and a number of weeks in Alabama, with a number of important conventions also. Up to the present time there is not even traveling expenses in our treasury.. The need is imperative, and the call is urgent. Please send us this offering at once.

WHEN DINNER COMES
One Ought to Have a Good Appetite.

A good appetite is the best sauce. It goes a long way toward helping in the digestive process, and that is absolutely essential to health and strength.

Many persons have found that Grape-Nuts food is not only nourishing but is a great appetizer. Even children like the taste of it and grow strong and rosy from its use.

It is especially the food to make a weak stomach strong and create an appetite for dinner.

"I am 57 years old," writes a Tenn. grandmother, "and have had a weak stomach from childhood. By great care as to my diet I enjoyed a reasonable degree of health, but never found anything to equal Grape-Nuts as a standby.

"When I have no appetite for breakfast and just eat to keep up my strength, I take 4 teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts with good rich milk, and when dinner comes I am hungry. While if I go without any breakfast I never feel like eating dinner. Grape-Nuts for breakfast seems to make a healthy appetite for dinner.

"My little 13-months-old grandson had been very sick with stomach trouble during the past summer, and finally we put him on Grape-Nuts. Now he is growing plump and well. When asked if he wants his nurse or Grape-Nuts, he brightens up and points to the cupboard. He was no trouble to wean at all—thanks to Grape-Nuts." Read the littie book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

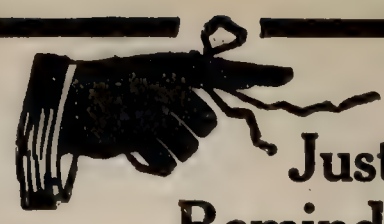
CHAMPAIGN, ILLINOIS
S. E. Fisher, Pastor.

"The Annual Meeting" on the afternoon and evening of New Year's day. The reports in many respects the best in the history of of the congregation. The church raised for general benevolences and evangelism, including missions, $2,500 during the year. The C. W. B. M. Auxiliary is supporting its own Missionary as a Living Link in the person of Mrs. Lulu M. Burner, at Buenos Ayers, South America, and the record of their years work shows splendid progress. The membership has increased 25 per cent in the last six months and on C. W. B. W. day, 25 life memberships were enlisted; a total of 50 life memberships to date.

During the year the congregation entered the list of Living Link churches through the Foreign Missionary Society, sending Herbert Smith, '09 Bethany, out to the Congo country with Dr. Dye in June to be their Living Link at Longa.

The Treasurer of the "Clean Slate Fund" reported between five and six thousand dollars gathered during the year and paid in liquidation of the church debt; the mortgage on the building having been burned just prior to the Centennial Convention. The Clerks summary of all reports including $5000 for current expenses, showed a grand total from all departments and for all purposes of about $13,000.



Eighty-six were added to the church membership at regular services making a total of net resident membership to date of 1016.

During the year the church also became a Living Link in State Missions, cooperating with the Mission Church at Granite City, Ill.

The church in addition to its general Missionary work supports three local missions in Champaign and Urbana. These were reported to be in a flourishing condition.

Among the plans contemplated for the future work may be noted an organized effort to solve the boy problem," a campaign for the enlargement of the present building, the entrance upon the Living Link plan in connection with the American Missionary Society work; the Bible Chair work, which latter will be appreciated when it is remembered that University Place Church of Christ is in the heart of a Student Community of 5000 young men and women. This work has been held in abeyance until the endowment campaign for Eureka College may be completed.

By the terms of the Bondurant Will recently sustained by the courts, a fund of $2000 is provided to aid in the erection of a downtown church building in Urbana, and a similar fund for like purpose to be used in Champaign, funds to be available in about five yea..

Special n ormation Regarding the Use of the Bethany Graded Lesson

Those ordering the new BETHANY GRADED SUNDAY-SCHOOL LESSONS should note one little point in which the Beginners' and Primary Courses differ from the Junior. The former are divided into quarters while the latter is divided into thirds of a year. The new term for the Junior lessons begins, therefore, in February. Unless otherwise instructed we will fill all orders for Junior supplies early in February.

Those schools which have especially ordered Part I of the Junior lessons to use until the new term begins will be interested in the suggestions of Miss Josephine L. Baldwin, the writer of the Junior course. Miss Baldwin selects seven lessons from the Junior Work Book and the Junior Teacher's Text Book which, she says, will make a more adequate use of the seven weeks than to begin at the beginning. Lesson 8, "The Call of Abraham," on January 2; "Lesson 9, "Giving Lot the First Choice," on January 9; Lesson 11, "Abraham Entertaining Angels," on January 16; Lesson 15, "Abraham Willing to Offer Isaac," on January 23; Lesson 16, "Rebekah at the Well," on January 30; Lesson 17, "How Esau Lost His Birthright," on February 6; Lesson 18, "Jacob's Vision of a Ladder to Heaven," on February 13. On February 20 the second book will be taken up and the regular course pursued to the end of June.

It is perfectly practicable to take up these graded lessons—Beginner's, Primary and Junior grades—at any time. But it is important to use the lesson on their appropriate dates. The International Committee has arranged the courses so that the holiday festivals receive due recognition. The graded lessons are seasonal in character, to use the words of Mrs. J. W. Barnes, a member of the Committee. To begin the October lessons in January would play topsy-turvy with the seasons, bringing Christmas lessons at Easter time, the Easter lessons in the winter and Thanksgiving lessons in February.

Besides, one of the great advantages in using the graded lessons provided by the International Committee, in preference to any independent course, is that all graded schools will be studying the same lessons at the same time. Thus within each grade there will be uniformity (the lauded virtue of the old system), making it possible for teachers of a particular grade in the same city to hold interdenominational teachers' meetings with much greater profit than on the basis of the old-time uniform lessons. This would not be practicable if your school disregarded the seasonal arrangement of the lessons.

The Man in the Porch

A Study of Jesus' Healing Ministry

It happened on one of those occasions when the celebration of a national anniversary called Jesus from Galilee to Jerusalem. He did not always attend these gatherings, for there were five important feasts in the year, and no one felt under obligation to observe them all. A man was accounted worthy of honor if he had made several such journeys to the capital, and one who went as often as once a year was especially commended.

The city of Jesus' day was only slightly concerned to care for its unfortunates. But there were a few places where such afflicted ones resorted, and we may be sure that Jesus did not miss the chance to visit them, comfort them, and now and then call one of their number, who was prepared for the experience, from his affliction back to health.

The reserve and caution with which Jesus healed the sick are not less impressive than the outflowings of his power and love in their behalf. At times the pages of the Gospels are thickly sprinkled with the records of such ministries of sympathy. But the first impression of great numbers healed is instantly corrected by explicit instances of careful selection and restraint. It is as if Jesus would make all men understand what was so clear to him, that most sickness and physical affliction is the entailment of such misdoing as knows no other corrective. Nature is too merciful to divorce misdeeds from their inevitable consequences, and when we say Nature, we mean God.

In one of the porticos of an open-air hospital near the sheep-gate of Jerusalem lay a man who for nearly forty years had been afflicted with an unnamed malady. Around him lay many distressed with sickness, blindness, lameness and other disabilities which prey upon humanity.

The place was one of common resort for such classes. For the pool was fed from some mysterious source within the rock on which Jerusalem was built, and had that intermittent character which agitated the water to rise at times with almost the semblance of conscious life. Tradition and superstition had invested the place with healing attributes which made it a favorite rendezvous for the afflicted, and doubtless explained the actual cures wrought by the waters.

To this place Jesus went one day in his desire to see and if possible help some of the sufferers. His glance rested on the unfortunate man who had been so long afflicted, and had made this place the scene of his expectant waiting and disappointed hopes for many weeks. There was something in the man which arrested Jesus' attention and awakened his deep interest. He went up to him, and looking upon him as only Jesus could look, said, "Would you be made whole?"

The man was instantly awakened to the sense of opportuinty by Jesus' words. He did not know who it was that spoke to him, but he was at once conscious that in the question there was the implication of interest and the promise of assistance. He explained that it was only now and then that the waters had healing power. Whenever the spring was agitated it would be worth while to bathe in the waters, but only then. And the number of those who pressed down before him rendered his efforts futile, weak and slow of movement as he was.

In those pathetic words, "Another steppeth down before me," there is the whole heart history of many unsuccessful lives. There is not quite sufficient energy, or the occasion is not quickly enough perceived, and in the meantime some one else takes the coveted place. Life's disappointments could almost all of them be put into that pregnant and moving phrase, "Another steppeth down before me."

But Jesus knew that the real trouble was in the man himself. It was the weakness of his will, not of his flesh, that spelled the long and weary failure of his life. He had no power to summon his resources. He must be awakened to put forth his strength. For, as in most instances, it is the forth-putting of one's own energy, through the power of awakened determination, or by the arousal wrought by the command of a stronger mind that brings the coveted relief.

With whatever mysterious and inexplicable power our thought may invest Jesus, it is clear that we may begin to understand his wonderful deeds, if at any point, on the side of his arousal of dormant human nature to co-operate with the laws of life. Apparently in this instance this was all that was needed. If the sick man could be surprised into effort, summoned by sudden arousal to the outputting of the power he had, quickened into energy by an abrupt and imperious word of command, he could be healed.

It is interesting to see how many incidents of healing in recent times have thrown light upon this particular method, used at times by Jesus to recall men to their normal strength. The evocation of latent power has often sufficed to work what seemed impossible restorations of health. A woman who had been afflicted for years with a baffling malady suffered a severe accident and in the crisis of the shock regained completely her lost strength. A young man, long crippled and compelled to go upon crutches, lost his father in a mine accident, or supposed the father lost, only to discover a few days later, when a few emaciated survivors were brought up from out of the earth, that his father was among the saved. The shock of that discovery instantly transformed the helpless youth into a vigorous man, and casting away his crutches he has gone on from that time forth as if re-created.

An invalid mother apparently beyond help was summoned by the piercing cries of her child in deadly danger from fire. Completely forgetting herself, she leaped from the bed on which she had lain impotent for months, rushed to the rescue of the child, and from that moment has been apparently quite cured. A man of strong personality and resolute will visited a sick friend, whose affliction had kept him for months in total inactivity, bed-ridden and suffering. The friend with concentrated will and commanding voice bade the sick man stand up and walk, and instantly his malady seemed to leave him, and from that day forth he has known no further pain.

Instances such as these are too frequent and too well attested to be worthless as hints at one of the methods of Jesus. Is it possible that he should be less able than another to summon all the reserves of power long latent in a sick man? Must we not suppose that he, with his sensitiveness to all the values that lie within the range of human motive and will, knew best how to lay hold upon the remnants of character before him, and with commanding voice compel them into action?

It would be easy enough to say that Jesus imparted to this weak man the power to rise and walk. But is it not more level to Jesus' purpose that he should summon the sick man to do for himself the thing that lay quite within his power, when once his will was enlisted?

Nor are we to forget that this was Jesus' habitual method wherever possible, in dealing with the inefficient and delinquent lives about him. It was of little value to galvanize them into activity by imparted power. Such action would have been too mechanical to accomplish reformation of character. It was rather by the summoning of all that was best in men to a new standard of conduct that Jesus wrought many of his works of salvation, mightier thereby than any miracle of reorganized flesh.

It is the summons issued by Jesus to the nobler qualities in this unfortunate man that must arrest and hold our thought. Meeting him afterward in the temple Jesus said, "Thou art made whole? Sin no more, lest a worse thing come upon thee." In these words the Master emphasized the close connection between a wrong life and a suffering life. His interest in the man was awakened by the sight of his distress, but the sustained concern of the Lord was in the reorganization of the man's character, and to this higher enterprise he summoned him in his later words of warning.

And thus the Master evermore looks upon the afflicted in mind, body and estate to see whether there be the possibility of calling forth dormant character, inert will and unenlisted purpose. And wherever these can be reached and brought to response, there again the miracle of help and healing may be wrought.

Christian Union on the Mission Field

The signs of union are brightest on the foreign mission field. The recent jubilee celebration of the beginning of missions in Japan has issued in a Federation in which Disciples, Baptists, Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Reformed, Methodists, Episcopalians, and Friends joined Six hundred missionaries and native leaders joined in a celebration of the Eucharist and the Japanese declared for a native church with a national integrity and standing. They do not desire fewer missionaries, but they desire that the Christian church shall assume a status equal to other institutions in the country and be no longer viewed as an exotic.

At Nairobi, British East Africa, the missionaries on the field recently met in common council and reached a working basis of agreement. The Anglican, Methodist, Baptist, Friends, Presbyterian, and Adventists communions were represented. They agreed upon the Bible as the only rule of faith and practice, resolved that the Nicene and Apostles creeds were suitable for use in worship, and agreed in the administration of the emblems of the Lord's Supper. When denominations varying from the Anglican to the Friends can meet on a common platform the hope increaseth. Out on the frontier the task and not the creed is the main consideration, and consecrated men of common sense will not long allow minor differences of opinion and practice to stand in the way of major means of action.

At the recent World's C. E. Convention, held at Agra, India, the dominant note was that they should all be one that India might believe He is the Christ sent of God. Both Anglican bishop and evangelical missionary sounded the note. They agreed that but for ecclesiastical division India would be much more nearly Christian today than she is; that she cannot understand denominational differences nor cares aught for them, and that the Christ that would make all men one is betrayed in divisive sects. Only the personal lives of consecrated Christians, united in a common loyalty to their Master will bring the Glad Tidings home most effectively to the Hindu mind. The Hindu is not of that western mind that worships organization and institution, but of the philosophical bent that scrutinizes the inner life and light.

The Chinese Inland Mission, with its 900 workers, stands with its marvelous work of faith and its success as a living example of the possibility and the power of non-denominational effort. Eleven nationalities and a dozen denominations are represented among its missionaries, and there is no friction and no lack of funds.

The increasing comity between the Boards augurs a better day for union. The London Missionary Society, finding itself unable to keep up all the work undertaken, turned over a mission in India to the Canadian Baptists and another in South Africa to the Canadian Methodists. This magnificent old society is more concerned about Christianity than it is about the interests of the denomination it represents.

A Noble Strike

The most notable strike of the past year seems to be nearing a successful end. On November 22, 30,000 girls of the shirt waist making industry in New York city went out in a fight that centers around the question of a "closed shop." Later, some 10,000 in Philadelphia joined in the battle, and to date 30,000 have won their contention and are at work. They represented one of the most poorly organized trades two months ago, but the strike has made them one of the best organized. Jews, Italians, and Americans stood side by side in one of the most spectacular labor contentions that has been witnessed.

The shirt waist making industry is full of inequalities. It rushes greatly at certain seasons and is so slack at others that the larger number of workers are laid off. Dealing with a class of labor that goes to work for a few years and then changes occupation, it was easy to reduce wage bargaining to its lowest degree. The consequence was that while wages were not so bad when the tide was on, the worker's fortune depended entirely upon the spasmodic rise and fall of rush and slack work. In the busy season they worked until late at night without supper, while in slack time they would come to work in the morning to be given but an hour or two or were liable to be discharged for any length of season without warning. To meet these conditions they demanded a 52-hour week and not more than two hours overtime on any one day; notice of slack work beforehand or at least in the morning of the day; and that all the workers be kept on short work during slack season rather than many being discharged and left workless.

Like all the garment making industries this one lent itself to sweating. Much of the work was done under a sort of padrone system. The maker would let out the jobs to a sub-contractor, who would get the work done at the least price possible and pocket the difference. He would pay from $6 to $10 per week and clear from $25 to $30. The grind came on the workers and the grind operated to make conditions, hours, and wages the worst instead of the best possible. So they demanded that all wages be paid directly by the firm and the sub-contracting system be abolished; that the wage for all forms of work be fixed in advance and be the same all through each shop.

But the great contention was for the "closed-shop" i. e. that collective bargaining be made the rule and the unions not only recognized but dealt with in wage-making directly. There may be many reasons for objecting to the "closed-shop" for every industry, but if it could be defended in any, it could be in this one, where the workers were so at the mercy of conditions and where there seemed no way to remedy evils outside of such a collective effort. This point the workers insist upon and for it they fight on after every other contention was granted. They feel that things would quickly work back to old conditions under any other settlement.

The strike has aroused more interest and a wider sympathy than any of late date. Prominent society women and public men as well as social workers have espoused the cause and aided in the effort. A sensational turn was given by the arbitrary action of police and magistrates in arresting pickets on the technical complaint of assault when there was no actual assault, but only a quiet but persistent effort to persuade scab workers to join in the strike. Respectable young girls were locked up with common prostitutes and fines were laid upon a great number. At one of the Sunday afternoon meetings two hundred of the "martyrs" were on the platform at one time. This, however, but helped to win public sympathy and hasten the victory. The union grew quickly from 500 to 30,00, and is today very compact and strong. It paid all fines and gave strike benefits to those who had dependents.

The "closed-shop" may be a dangerous principle for all trades, but it may be a necessary resort for some, just as the trust may be dangerous under many conditions but beneficial under others. The successful issue of this strike will give great heart to women workers who, as a rule, are poorly paid, and the pawns of circumstance and all such contentions will hasten the day when the issues of industry will center more around the worker and less around the purely property considerations.

An Apostle to Labor

Chas. Stelzle is an Apostle to Labor. He speaks to more workingmen than any other living man. Every Sunday afternoon he addresses great audiences of workers and usually by their own arrangement and at their own expense. These audiences rarely are less than 1,000, and have run as high at 12,000. He has many more invitations than he is able to fill. Through his work a number of unions have appointed chaplains from the local ministerial fraternity and have invited the pastors to become fraternal delegates. Gov. Marshall of Indiana has been emphasizing to both labor unions and ministerial associations that a little fraternal concord was all that was needed to break down suspicions and interest religious forces in the laboring man's problems and the laboring man in the church.

Besides his addresses Mr. Stelzle furnishes a syndicated article, dealing with religious questions in their bearing upon the labor question, that appears in each issue of 350 labor journals. He held a temperance meeting at the recent Toronto convention of the American Federation that was attended by 4,000. Practically all the leaders have gone on record against the saloon. Mr. Stelzle and his helpers conduct shop meetings of an evangelistic character. He was for eight years a mechanic in a New York shop and has lived for twenty-five years in the crowded East Side of the metropolis. For the past seven years he has devoted himself to this effort to bring labor and the church into more sympathetic relationship and is today at the head of the Department of Labor and Immigration of the Presbyterian Home Missionary Society. Last year he visited all the great European lands and studied both the immigration and labor questions from that viewpoint. To all his labors he has added the writing of several readable and informing books. He is awakening the churches to their duty and labor to its opportunities.

The church has been all too fearful of its dogmas and accepted methods of work to undertake original work among those who for one reason or another have not been attracted by her conventional methods. On the other hand, social workers, recognizing the prejudice among the laboring classes in regard to the churches and feeling resentful themselves many times, doubtless, because of the church's failure to act, have feared to have their efforts called religious or in any way linked up with religious institutions. Mr. Stelzle is helping to break down this suspicion and bring co-operation. Others in both the social and religious fields of effort have been bravely battling to overcome it also, but his has proven a strategic positon for this effort. He recently held a sociological conference in New York city that was largely attended by both social and religious workers. All joined in emphasizing the sociological work of the church and the religious work of the social institution and worker. Emphasis was put on the value of social investigation, labor organization, and organized charity. All agreed that the church should work for the benefit of its community in all ways rather than for the one end of building up itself. Each church should know its own community like the settlement worker knows his and adapt methods that will reach that community for its own good. The province of the church as a pioneer in all social good was insisted upon. For instance, if the crowded centers have no recreation spots the church should both point out the need and supply it as far as possible until the general public will arise to the task. It was insisted on that the pulpit deal with living conditions more and dead issues less and join not only with other churches for the social uplift of the "man on the margin" but with other organizations as well. In all it was prophetic of the new life that will come to the church by adapting herself to the new problems of this complex and highly socialized age.

A Notable Missionary Centennial

One hundred years ago (June 29, 1810) the American Board was organized. Five men gathered around a table at Farmington, Conn., on September 5, 1810, and held the first directors' meeting. This was the answer of the Congregationalist churches of Massachusetts to the Haystack Prayer Meeting, held by the five students of Williams College in the summer of 1806, while they were waiting for a storm to pass over. Today they support 635 missionaries at 107 stations with 4,564 native workers, and have a Christian community of 205,880 in their fields, of which the usual proportion of about one-third are admitted to full church fellowship. They conduct 1,483 schools, one of the largest educational undertakings in missionary annals, and make of it their chief evangelistic agency. Suffice it to say they make thus native Christians of the finest character and capacity. They have set $1,000,000 as their centennial offering and will endeavor to have every one of their 6,006 churches make a contribution. They desire individuals to give a permanent endowment of $2,000,000 for their educational institutions and thus insure other fields such colleges as the Doshisha has been to Japan and Roberts College to Turkey and the Balkans. The Centennial convention will be held in Boston October 11-14.

The Great Laymen's Campaign

The most significant missionary movement in the home land today, if not indeed for a generation, is the layman's campaign for increased interest and generosity on the part of the men in the churches to the great cause of foreign missions. J. Campbell White has proven himself a master commander of forces, and every one of the more than a score of cities reached with his monster meetings has recorded victory for him. As high as 2,000 have sat down to the banquets at once and as many as 6,000 attended the meetings, while the most prominent business men have been enlisted and forces organized that promise to mightily increase the support of the work in all the societies. The cities visited pledge themselves to increase their contributions by some definite percentage or to some definite amount. Here are some of the increases promised:

Buffalo	from	$38,000	to	$100,000
Cleveland	from	53,000	to	160,000
Richmond	from	30,000	to	60,000
Washington	from	62,000	to	100,000
Worcester	from	15,000	to	125,000

Richmond has already oversubscribed her full promise. Cleveland and Buffalo have 80 per cent of theirs pledged already. Toronto was the place selected for launching the movement a year ago, and the way she is making good is prophetic for the whole movement. There, three leading Presbyterian churches increased their offerings from $25,500 to $41,500; four Methodist churches increased theirs from $22,000 to $48,000; the four largest Anglican churches went from $13,200 to $35,000; four Baptist churches increased theirs from $13,200 to $36,600. In all thus, these fifteen congregations in Toronto increased their contributions from a total of $73,900 to a grand total of $161,100, a total increase of about 120 per cent. For January, New York and Brooklyn are the center of interest for the campaign. Seventy-five cities will be reached and each of them reach a radius of easy traveling distance in their attendance and influence directly. The whole campaign will come to a climax in a mammoth layman's missionary convention in Chicago in May, modeled after that in Toronto last year.

Every effort to enlarge the scope of the effort to include home missions has been met with firm but sympathetic refusal on the ground that the singleness of purpose will alone beget success. The Baptist Home Mission Society and the Methodist Bishops petitioned for this widening of the propaganda. Every church in the home land is a fixed and standing home mission institution and in all home missions are supplied many fold more adequately than foreign.

Twenty-five Years in City Missions

The statistical report of the City Missionary Society of the Congregationalist churches of Chicago is interesting as representing one of the best supported and most successful city missionary undertakings. In that time they founded seventy-two churches which have today a membership of over 10,000. Of these churches forty-three are now self-supporting and the society is now aiding forty-nine churches and missions in all. These churches organized and supported during the quarter-century have received 13,332 on confession. The society has received $630,000 for this work and is now spending nearly $25,000 annually. Last year its forty-nine missionaries added 915 by confession and 457 by letter. The average attendance at the morning services is about thirty, and at the evening worship about forty-five for each mission or mission church, and the attendance at the Sunday-schools averaged 110. They hold $288,000 worth of property in trust and the churches founded possess property amounting to $841,620.

Cleveland Regains Property

The city of Cleveland has just come into possession of a considerable tract of land upon the lake front, said to be worth from twenty millions to thirty millions. It has been for many years in the possession of the railway companies, who early secured title to it by means which are now recognized as illegal. The example of Cleveland will be an encouragement to many cities who have sold their birthright of public land in the most desirable parts of their domain to some corporation for what seems scarcely more than a mess of pottage. The example of the splendid water front on the south shore in Chicago being monopolized by the smoky and noisy traffic of the Illinois Central Railroad, is a lesson in the lack of municipal foresight. Ultimately this corporation must be compelled to give up its enormous and valuable holdings, to put its tracks underground, and to restore to the city that fair frontage which is now so marred and misused. But the effort to reclaim this possession will cost the city a long struggle and an immense treasure. All this could have been saved by such limitations of corporate rights as were possible when the first contracts were made. Society is gradually learning that transportation companies are the servants, and not the masters of the people. It remains to impress the lesson upon the companies.

Baptist Congress

The Annual Baptist Congress took place during November in New York city. It was a successful gathering and its program was full of interest. Among the topics considered were the following: "Can Pragmatism Furnish a Philosophical Basis for Theology?": "Is the Present Tendency Toward a Coöperative Social Order Desirable?"; "How is Salvation Mediated to Us through Christ?"; "Recent Tendencies to Change Denominational Practice—Are They Desirable?"; "How Can Ethics be Taught in the Public Schools?"; "Realizing the Presence of God." The papers were of a high order, and the discussions were animated and informing. We are glad to notice in the list of membership of the Baptist Congress the names of the following Disciples: Professor Errett Gates, a member of the general committee; and of annual members, J. H. Garrison, W. L. Hayden, A. E. Jennings, A. McLean, F. W. Norton, A. B. Philputt, J. M. Philputt, F. D. Power, O. E. Tomes, G. B. Van Arsdall, H. L. Willett, and W. J. Wright. It is the hope of many of us that next year's congress may be like the one of last year, a joint meeting of Disciples, Baptists and Free Baptists.

Work of the Art Institute

One of the most significant features of the higher life of Chicago is the Art Institute, whose work is commanding increasing public confidence and securing larger attention annually. The historical pageant that was enacted there some months ago revealed the high artistic interests of a large number of the prominent citizens of Chicago who took part in the admirable historical summary of progress through the centuries. A new wing has recently been added to the Art Institute which will help to complete the original plan of the building. The exhibitions which are given from time to time contain nothing of greater interest to the patrons of art in the Middle West than the canvases and statues produced by local artists. At present the annual winter exhibit of the work of western artists is in progress, and some of the features are of great merit. Professor Lorado Taft, for example, has a number of pieces, one of which is especially fine. It is called "Father Time Viewing the Passage of the Ages." It is in two pieces, the first the figure of a man looking steadily at a moving procession; the second the procession itself, in which there are nearly one hundred figures, going forward to their appointed destination. The same artist has on exhibition "A Son of Deucalion," "The Eternal Silence," "Fountain of Time," "A Daughter of Pyrrha," and a highly impressive figure called "An Indian." Citizens of Chicago who do not visit the Art Institute frequently are simply unaware of the educational value of this great institution. Visitors who are passing through the city ought never to think of omitting a visit to the Institute during their stay here, however brief.

A Student's Courage

The daily press and the retrogressive type of religious journals are eager to exploit any reports that come from the leading universities and seminaries regarding the dangerous tendency of university and theological education. For the daily papers it makes good sensational reading, and the half-informed religious editor is always glad of any material that furnishes him ammunition for an attack upon education of any except his own limited type.

It would be very easy to set over against these faulty and misleading reports an overwhelming list of the constructive, helpful and inspiring influences which are going forth from the universities and seminaries. But of this fact there are such abundant proofs that the informed public has come to take the matter for granted, and to discount most of the falsehoods which are spread abroad by a sensational press.

But it is not always known how frequently the element of genuine and splendid heroism enters into the work which university students, and especially those preparing for the ministry, are accomplishing. Instances of this character are known as being of frequent occurrence in university and seminary circles. But they pass almost unnoticed unless some particular incident secures public attention.

Such an incident happened recently at the University of Chicago. A large number of the Divinity students go out regularly to preach in churches of Chicago and vicinity. Some of these students go a long way and preach at points remote from railroad facilities. Many instances of hardship and suffering have arisen in connection with this supply work. It not infrequently happens that in the severest winter weather there is a failure to provide a conveyance for the minister when he reaches the small country station nearest his preaching point, and he is compelled to walk or to give up his appointment. The latter is very rarely the method pursued.

On a recent Saturday one of the Divinity students, Mr. William F. Bosdick, having missed connections with the local conveyance from Aurora to Yorkville, Illinois, started out to walk the ten miles in a temperature that was far below the freezing point. The journey became increasingly difficult and his feet were frozen. He tried to secure shelter in a lodge used as a summer resort, but the care-taker turned him away, refusing him rest or warmth. He finally arrived at his destination exhausted and badly frozen. He has been in the hospital for ten days suffering severely, and the surgeons are still doubtful whether he will be able to save either of his feet from amputation.

Since this incident became known several letters have come to the authorities of the Divinity School telling of other instances in which students performed their duties courageously in the face of most disheartening circumstances, and without even reporting the matter upon their return to the University. Incidents of this kind are the best commentary upon the reckless and untruthful statements which are often made regarding the laxity of religious and moral fibre in the divinity schools of America. Young men do not undertake the self-sacrificing work of ministerial preparation or undergo the hardships which are so frequently incident to their student preaching without a definiteness of purpose and a courage that would offer ample answer to any reasonable mind regarding their disinterestedness and consecration.

Safeguarding Immigrants

It is cheering to learn that steps are being taken by the commissioner of immigration to safeguard immigrants from the abuses to which they are subjected by the transportation companies that bring them to America. The darkness, filth and inadequacy of the quarters assigned to immigrants, the crowded conditions that result, the lack of privacy, the shameful and insulting treatment accorded these people, especially the women, by the employes of the ship lines, have issued in a volume of protest and rebuke which has become so great that the government has at last been compelled to intervene in behalf of the sufferers. The abuses are aggravated by the fact that the immigrants are, for the most part, quite helpless, as much through ignorance of their rights as through physical inability to enforce them. The reports brought by government inspectors who have traveled in the steerage to observe the actual conditions are sufficient to awaken the indignation of every one who has the interests of our newly arriving citizen at heart. Reforms are promised at once.

The Method of Making Good

It is one of the hopeful signs of the times that the Disciples are awakening to their true mission in the world. After a beginning that was due to recognition of the great principle of Christian unity; a second generation that was confronted with subordinate but impressive problems that diverted attention from the central idea; and a third generation that has been largely devoted to numerical increase and denominational success, we have come to the beginning of our second century.

At this moment, so significant in our history, and so likely to be determinative as to our success or failure, there are some questions that we must ask ourselves and be prepared to answer with frankness and recognition of all they involve. The first of these is this: Have the Disciples as yet accomplished in any notable degree the purpose for which they came into being? To this there can be but one answer: They have not. While no little advance has been made by the Christian world toward unity since the days when Thomas Campbell first spoke upon this theme, it has been the result in large measure of deepening conviction on the part of the entire church of the sin and weakness of sectism. Only in a subordinate degree and in limited territory have the Disciples influenced to any appreciable extent the conscience of the universal church on this theme.

The next question is, Do the Disciples want to make good? The answer cannot be so definite to this question, for the reason that there are many varieties of sentiment among them. But if we are to take into account those who are most sensitive to the crying need for unity, and most fully aware of the purposes for which we ourselves have historically stood, there would be no doubt as to the answer. This section at least of the Disciples that is really anxious to vindicate their right to existence, would without delay answer: Certainly the Disciples wish to make good, and are willing to put forth any effort to accomplish this desirable end.

Closely following, there is the more practical question, How shall this be done? We cannot longer delude ourselves with the easy-going assumption that the mere preaching of Christian union as a theory will accomplish any notable results. So far as propositional statements are concerned, the Disciples have never left themselves without witness on this point. The weakness of their advocacy lay in its almost total divorce from any serious efforts to bring the ideal of unity to pass.

Practically speaking, the Disciples have depended upon the alluring, but wholly impracticable effort to absorb their religious neighbors into one huge denomination. And they felt confident that this absorption would justify them in describing the resulting aggregation as the Church of Christ. They have not generally put it in this bald and repellant form, but it has amounted to the same thing in the minds of very many of our people.

It is now perfectly apparent to the least discerning observer of current religious history that if there was ever the slightest promise that this method would prove successful, that promise grows less day by day. In spite of our extraordinary activity in evangelistic effort, and the unusual success that has attended these attempts to swell the membership of our churches, it is now practically certain that during the past five years the Disciples have gained little, if anything, in membership. And it is highly probable that if our statistics could be reliably compiled, they would show an actual loss.

Of course this disappointing condition grows out of the fact that the efforts which ought to have been directed to the strengthening of the churches by educational work, by development of Christian character, and by the conservation of forces easily at hand for constructive effort, have been rather directed to evangelistic activities which have temporarily and superficially increased the membership of the local churches, but only at the expense of their more solid development, and actually with a gradual loss in available and permanent numbers.

It is then apparent that by this method of evangelism the Disciples are neither making good nor have any likelihood of doing so. And in the meantime, we are losing out in the thought of those Christian people around us who are taking the large tasks of the kingdom of God seriously, and who know that the work of the church is not to be done through spasms of evangelistic fervor, alternating with periods in which every energy of the minister, and those of his people who are really efficient, is taxed to keep up vitality in a half-converted and poorly instructed membership.

Just as the Disciples have wasted time in the past over questions that were unimportant and methods that were vain and even frivolous—controversies, misunderstandings, legalistic interpretations of the Gospel, and quarrels over methods of administration—so we are losing time today wherever we are not arousing ourselves to the essential business of our brotherhood, the unification of the Christian forces of the communities where we live.

Our business is not to enforce a creed, written or unwritten. And certainly the number of creeds, consistent with the great apostolic creed we all confess, tends to grow more numerous rather than less.

We are not advocates of a particular form of worship, not even that which embodies the studied simplicity which many of our churches affect. There will always be diversity of method in Christian worship.

It is no business of ours to debate over forms of organization. All the different types of church construction profess to trace their origins back to the New Testament. Our thesis is not the settlement of this vexed and widely mooted question.

Nor are we the champions of a particular set of ordinances. We can well afford to leave to sacramentarians and literalists the useless expenditure of strength upon the defense of this or that view of the simple and beautiful customs which found sanction in the ministry of Jesus and the life of the early church.

Nor can we delude ourselves that the mere possession of numbers is a strength to the cause we advocate. Nothing would be more fatal, in fact nothing has been more of a hindrance to the accomplishment of our historic ideal than the multiplying of half-informed and indifferent members in churches, every one of which should be a living advocate and example of Christian unity.

The serious business of the Disciples is to put their plea for Christian unity into instant expression. It is not for them to wait until some good-natured and tolerant neighbor offers to meet them half-way in a union service, but so to enforce the principle of unity wherever they are found that no person in the community could possibly be ignorant of the fact that there was among them a people whose voice was insistently heard upon this great need of the hour.

The methods by which Christian unity may be exemplified are numerous enough if our ministers and churches really take their task seriously. Wherever the Disciples promote united effort on the part of the Christian forces in any community, a step has been taken that cannot be without the most valuable results. Wherever a union communion service can be held that is inspired by the sense of common love and reverence, there progress is being made. Wherever union evangelism can be organized, whether with the leadership of one of our own preachers or not, it is possible to illustrate even under unfavorable circumstances the principle for which we plead.

Wherever public interests can be promoted by the coöperative action of the churches in any town or city, there it is the business of the Disciples to urge and foster that union sentiment and activity. And wherever the work of municipal and civic righteousness can be set forward by uniting the forces of decency and order which are always to be found in the churches, there the Disciples have again found their opportunity to promote effectively the great cause which is our only excuse for existence in any place.

The Uncompromised Life

Abraham had a proper sense of personal dignity. It was more than clan etiquette that kept him from accepting pay for rescuing the inhabitants of Sodom from the invaders. He was a man with a mission and he felt that it would be inconsistent with his high purpose for him to accept a gift from the king of Sodom. In ancient Rome there was a man who rushed with his trained servants to every fire he heard of and offered his assistance in putting it out, but he always demanded a large share of the property for saving it and would never fight fire until he was sure of his pay. He doubtless reasoned that the owner would be deprived of all his goods if the firemen did not come to his assistance and that therefore he ought to be willing to give half or more than half for putting out the fire. Abraham might have reasoned that he was entitled to the spoil of Sodom on the ground that it would have been carried to the Euphrates valley if he had not recovered it for the land of Canaan. But he was more of a man than the Roman fireman. Others had toiled for the goods of Sodom and he wished them to enjoy the fruits of their toil.

Special Privilege.

To know whether a man is uncompromised we must know what are the ways in which he gets his living. Wealth is produced collectively. No intelligent man believes that he is the sole producer of that which he possesses. The honest man simply asks for his share in the products of common toil and foresight. But some are not satisfied with the honest man's share. They seek and secure special privileges which enable them to get hold of what ought to go to other men. They have a process of reasoning by which they justify themselves in taking more than their share of the common goods. Their chief reliance is upon shrewdness. It is the shrewd man, not the honest worker, who has a right to the good things of life. We are justly suspicious of the economic and social theories of the man who enjoys special privilege. He compromises himself by accepting the privilege of getting something for nothing. For clear thinking on moral and religious questions we must go to men who ask no advantage over other men and who have intelligence enough to know what is fair.

The Unbiased Mind.

The unbiased mind is a fiction. No such mind exists. The best we can do is to make an honest effort to study facts without prejudice. We never succeed wholly in discarding prepossessions that obscure the truth. The man who boasts of his impartiality is the very one to watch; he is either a rascal or he is so ignorant of the sources of error that he ought not to be trusted. But there are some things which we may reasonably demand of ourselves. We need not sell out to any party or sect. There is no party or sect big enough to satisfy entirely the mind and heart of the least of the children of men. It is treason to the mind to sell it into the service of any combination of men. We may join with men in their search for truth provided we do not agree to accept anything that does not satisfy our own minds. We should consider ourselves companions of all who strive to know. If they can help us we ought to be thankful to them for the information they give and the inspiration of their example. It is a calamity to be suspicious of one who is sincere and who can lead us into larger truth.

"In the World."

We are forbidden to love the things that are in the world. What does this mean? Does it mean that we cannot be independent unless we withdraw from business and social life and live apart from men? Not in the least. "The world" is made up of the wrong attitudes of people, base desires and ambitions. In the same place where the bad man surrenders himself to the world the good man surrenders himself to God. The fight of faith is on the same ground that is overrun by the hosts of wickedness. The gifts of nature which the wicked consume are needed by the righteous. The difference is in the use of things, not in the things themselves. One man is vile and he defiles everything he touches. Another is pure, and under his touch things lose their grossness. Political life is corrupt when politicians are corrupt; it is clean when clean men are in politics. Business is dangerous to morals when thieves engage in business: honest men make it a school of morals. Formalists make the church contemptible; strong men and women make it a mighty fortress.

The Achievements of A Century

An Address Delivered at the Centennial Convention

By Perry J. Rice

EDITOR'S NOTE.—So much has been said about a single one of the five addresses on the Progress and Achievements of a Century, delivered at Pittsburg last October, that we regard it fitting to give our readers one of the others, which in our judgment, was one of the most admirable speeches of that memorable occasion. For strict adherence to his theme, for sympathetic and reserved assessments of his people, for sensitive awareness to the currents of modern life, for fairness and tenderness of temper and for chaste and dignified expression we do not think Mr. Rice's paper was excelled. It is not often that we print articles so long as this and we at first intended to greatly shorten this one. But upon attacking it, blue pencil in hand, our hard editorial heart failed us and we decided to give it every inch of space it needed. We hope our readers will carefully read every word of it.

It is not too much to say that during the past one hundred years the world was made over. Places that were considered remote and inaccessible are now on the beaten highways of the nations. Natural forces were discovered and harnessed to the tasks of humanity, working revolutions in the methods of commerce and industry, and resulting, it is estimated, in the production of three times as much wealth as was produced during the eighteen preceding centuries. Towns became cities, and cities grew to mammoth proportions. At the beginning of the century the city of Pittsburg was a town of about two thousand inhabitants; New York numbered less than one hundred thousand souls, and Chicago was a trading post. The growth of urban populations was not peculiar to the United States. London attained four-fifths of her present size during the century; Berlin outstripped Chicago in the rapidity of its growth and the population of Osaka, Japan, was quadrupled.

Growth in Knowledge.

It is freely affirmed that the greater part of the world's knowledge is less than a century old. The physical sciences were, for the most part, created during the century. All the sciences, including theology, have undergone radical changes. Our conceptions of the physical universe do not differ more widely from those entertained by our forefathers than do our conceptions of God, of Christ, of the scriptures, of sin, and of salvation. A new feeling has arisen with reference to the mission and message of the church. The interest in dogma has yielded to a popular demand for instruction in righteousness, the ascetic tendency has given place to a profound interest in the problems of social life. Our fathers could scarcely have conceived a program of such practical activity as we know to be in full operation today.

The period under consideration witnessed, at its beginning, a rising tide of democracy, both in religion and in government. The spirit of liberty was asserting itself against dogma; the spirit of equality was demanding the overthrow of ecclesiasticism, and the sense of fraternity was beginning to decree the doom of sectarianism. In the midst of such conditions the movement whose centennial we are now celebrating had its beginnings. In one sense it may be regarded as the expression of a revulsion of feeling against prevailing conditions. In another sense it may be regarded as a child of the times. It was both a protest and an appeal. It centered about three dominant ideals. It originated in a plea for the union of Christians; it proposed to attain such a union by the restoration of primitive christianity, and it had as its ultimate object the evangelization of the world. It was, therefore, idealistic, practical and purposeful. It presented a great plea, a fascinating program and a glorious objective. In the three fields thus indicated the Disciples have wrought with greater or less efficiency. A century is a cycle of sufficient duration to measure the effects of any movement, and it is therefore with a degree of interest that we inquire with reference to the effects of this movement inaugurated by the saintly Thomas Campbell in the publication of that Magna Charta of

Perry J. Rice.

Christian liberty, the Declaration and Address.

Standing so close to it, both in point of time and personal relation, it is difficult to estimate it justly. It is natural that we should rejoice in our triumphs. But we should be unworthy the heritage into which we have entered if, in the midst of our rejoicing, we should fail to exhibit a proper spirit of humility. If the world should detect in us any tendency to self satisfaction or self complacency, any disposition to blind our own eyes to the services others have rendered in the promotion of objects which are dear to us, it would be justified in refusing to regard us seriously. The best apologetic we can offer to the world is an honest attempt to relate our achievements to the progress of the century, estimating them not for purpose of self glorification, but in view of all the facts and forces which may properly come within the range of our inquiry.

The Declaration and Address was a clarion call to the followers of Christ to bury their differences and unite for the conquest of the world in the name of Christ. The immediate response was meager indeed. There appears to have been little desire for union and no readiness to minimize the importance of the credal formulations which had been developed in the progress of Protestantism. The lines which separated the various religious bodies from each other were clearly drawn, and loyalty to party standards was everywhere the basis of fellowship. Denominations were constantly clashing with each other in their zealous defense of doctrines which they had come to regard as final expressions of truth, each one being determined to overthrow the heresies of all the others. Only a very few people could be found who were willing to espouse the cause of union, and most of these were personal friends of Thomas Campbell. Such was the temper of the church a century ago. The change which has taken place is as complete as it is splendid. There are, it is true, not fewer but more kinds of Christians, than there were then. The census bureau reports forty-one new kinds developed in the United States in the brief period from 1890 to 1906. This fact only proves, however, that there are eddies in the current of the church's life or that the spirit of independence has continued to thrive along with the spirit of unity. There can be no question but that the latter has become much more pronounced. A hundred years ago only a very few people desired union; now everybody longs for its fuller realization. Then sectarianism was defended as natural and necessary; now it denounced as the "Scandal of Christendom." Then division was thought to be advantageous, promoting a holy rivalry; now it is decried as the greatest hindrance to the work of the church. Then denominations held themselves aloof from each other, refusing to coöperate in any manner; now their people mingle freely and rejoice in the fellowship that is ever widening and deepening like the river as it flows toward the sea.

Near to Union.

We still hold our individual opinions but are less inclined to impose them upon others. We still cling fondly to the particular group with which, for one reason or another, we have been identified, but we rejoice in opportunities to cross over the lines and share in the wider fellowship. If we are not ashamed of our divisions we are profoundly sorry that they exist and long to see them healed. Denominations closely allied in doctrine and polity are approaching each other, and in ways too numerous to recite and too familiar to need mention, all the churches are giving expression to their essential oneness.

The forces that have produced this change of sentiment are numerous. New visions of the world and its almost limitless needs have arisen before us. The cry of the ignorant and the oppressed of every nation has been heard, and the conscience of the church has been aroused to a sense of the urgency and importance of her mission. In our efforts to discharge that mission we have been compelled to lay aside the petty peevishness of our party contentions. New generations have arisen, one after another, who have refused to be shut in by the narrow walls of prejudice which circumscribed their ancestors. Catching larger glimpses of truth and beholding with clearer vision the eternal purposes of God, they have arisen to heights where the old artificial boundary lines are scarcely discernible. The changes that have taken place in theology have wrought havoc with all the creeds until they no longer serve as formidable barriers to union. The people of the Orient, among whom we have been sending missionaries, have had little patience with our sectarianism. Christians of every name have been meeting each other on the fields of service and, feeling the warmth of love and devotion to Christ which is common to all. A sense of mutual appreciation and esteem has arisen which doctrinal divergences cannot smother. The present sentiment in favor of union is therefore the natural outgrowth of the church's progress during the century. The plea which the Disciples made was like the voice of the Prophet of the Wilderness heralding a better day, whose dawning has been gradual. Throughout the century they have borne unceasing testimony to the conviction that sectarianism is sin, and that union is essential to the successful prosecution of the work of the church. It is possible that sometimes our spirit has belied our message; that we have appeared to be contentious and dogmatic, veiling an attempt to thrust upon others our intellectual conclusions under a specious plea for union. Preachers are not all prophets. It is not possible that everyone should behold with clear vision the lofty ideals of Thomas Campbell, nor that we should have fully escaped the subtle tendency, inherent in humanity to crystallize about the truths great leaders have discovered. Nevertheless, we believe the plea has, for the most part, been nobly presented, and that it has lent itself definitely to the promotion of the union of the followers of Christ.

Plea for Primitive Christianity.

The Disciples have also been ardent advocates of a return to primitive Christianity. This was the program by which our fathers hoped that the church might be reunited. Thomas Campbell held the conviction that the restoration of the church in "its doctrine, its ordinances, and its fruits, as exhibited in the New Testament," would result in cleansing its corruptions and healing its divisions. The reformers, therefore, set themselves to the task of restoration. They determined to eschew all formulations of religious doctrine and make their appeal directly to "The Law and the Testimony." They adopted as their motto the famous proposition: "Where the Scriptures speak we speak, and where the Scriptures are silent we are silent." Thus they were led to a re-examination of the Scriptures on somewhat independent lines, and to the discovery of new and important phases of truth.

Having set themselves to restore the primitive church, the reformers immediately began to inquire into its nature and constitution. Gradually they were led to certain definite conclusions which have formed a considerable part of the Disciples doctrinal propaganda throughout their history. They determined that the church should be known only by such names as did honor to her divine head, and were sanctioned by New Testament usage; that the form of its organization should be a congregational, with evangelists, elders and deacons, selected because of peculiar fitness to serve as ministers in these several capacities; that there were but two ordinances—baptism, administered according to apostolic precedent, and the Lord's Supper, standing as the perpetual memorial of the sufferings of the Messiah, to be observed on every first day of the week. Following the examples of conversion recorded in the Book of Acts the reformers concluded that people became Christians and members of the body of Christ, which is the church, by believing in Jesus Christ, repenting of their sins, openly confessing their faith and submitting to the ordinance of baptism. Thus the principle of restoration, becoming operative in the hands of our fathers yielded a four-fold result. It gave added authority to the Scriptures, especially of the New Testament; increased glory and prestige to the name of Christ; re-established the apostolic church according to methods of interpretation which they employed; and developed a clearly defined doctrine of salvation.

These conclusions have seemed to the Disciples well-nigh ultimate expressions of truth. The very nature of our appeal has made the temptation to dogmatize almost irresistible. In every instance the effort has been to "speak as the oracles of God speak"; to base all our teachings and practices upon "an express precept or an approved precedent" of the New Testament. The feeling has been general that in this effort we have succeeded, and that therefore no changes can occur in what we have come to regard as the essentials of Christianity without doing violence to the Scriptures themselves. This tendency to make finalities out of our intellectual conclusions has been ever present. It has led to many unhappy controversies among ourselves which have seriously interfered with the plea for union and militated against the highest success of the movement in other respects. It has been partially checked by the antipathy of the reformers to creeds as tests of fellowship. But even this has not always guaranteed to us that degree of liberty of conscience and conviction, which is an essential feature of New Testament Christianity. What seems to one to be true all too easily becomes the standard by which he judges another. The opinions of one master mind readily become the convictions of the many, and written or unwritten, they are made, almost unconsciously, tests of fellowship. The only escape from this result is the frank recognition of the fact that the principle of restoration is forever operative, and will continue to be operative until man shall be as God, knowing all mysteries and all secret truths and understanding their varied and intricate relations to each other. Mr. Brierly quotes Vinet as saying: "The reformation is ever present in the church even as Christianity. It is Christianity restoring itself by its own inherent strength. So that even today the reformation is still to be done, a thing to be recommenced and for which Luther and Calvin only prepared a smoother and broader way."

A Long Way Forward.

The way back to primitive standards and ideals is a long way. Really it is a forward and not a backward way at all, and it ever stretches before us inviting us to walk upon it. It presents difficulties, precipitous heights which we must climb, and deep gorges into which we must descend. Our fathers entered upon this way with true heroism and followed it with fidelity and courage. Without boasting we may confidently affirm that many of the positions which they assumed had in them elements of abiding value which the religious world has come quite generally to recognize, but the search for truth did not stop with the conclusions our fathers reached. The nineteenth century witnessed unprecedented activity on the part of scholars everywhere. The study of the Scriptures has continued with unabated interest and enthusiasm. The principle of the division of the Word, for a long time recognized only by the Disciples, has been in general use for decades. Every document that enters into the canon has been examined with reference to its author, its purpose and its historic setting. The buried treasuries of the past have been made to yield their secrets, and the social, political and religious ideals of the people among whom these documents were produced have been studied as never before. The emphasis which the Disciples have given to the fact of the supremacy of Christ has been caught up by the church universal. Modern scholarship has fixed upon this as the fundamental fact of Christianity, and everywhere the cry is heard: "Back to Christ." His supremacy is acknowledged by all and the restoration of his ideals is the passion of the hour. Thus, under the pressure of the principle of restoration, the employment of which is no longer peculiar to the Disciples, significant and important changes have taken place. So far as these changes have affected the great doctrines of the church they have for the most part only caused the truth of our earlier contention to appear more clearly.

But we must not lose sight of another fact of equal significance. The emphasis has shifted from the formal and doctrinal to the vital and practical. The modern man is not indifferent to the importance of correct thinking and right conclusions, but he is more concerned with correct living and right motives. The restoration of the apostolic church, in its doctrines and ordinances, was the goal toward which our fathers set their faces. The realization of the Kingdom of God with its ideals of sacrifice and service is the fond hope and eager pursuit of all modern religious leaders.

Adaptability of Disciples.

The adaptability of the position of the Disciples to such changes as have taken place and are taking place is one of its unique and important features. There is a position which insists upon belief in doctrines as the essence and test of Christian life. It is forever framing convictions into creeds and seeking to impose them upon the minds of men. Essentially this is the attitude of sectarianism and always results in division, since doctrinal creeds are in their very nature exclusive rather than inclusive and therefore divisive. The attitude of the Disciples, as expressed in the phrase, "In faith, unity; in opinion, liberty; in all things, charity," is its direct opposite. Instead of imposing doctrinal tests we have throughout our history insisted only upon such faith in and loyalty to the person of Christ as evinces itself in an overt act of self-surrender and a manifest desire to do His will. This position insures stability in the midst of ever changing intellectual conceptions, while the former, as Phillips Brooks has said, "Is always sacrificing stability to progress or progress to stability." We believe that many of the conclusions our fathers reached are still worthy of emphasis, and we shall continue to present them as our witness to the truth. The genius of our plea not only permits us to preach what we believe to be true, but it compels us to grant to everybody else the privilege to do likewise. We hold that open-mindedness toward all truth and warm heartedness toward all lovers of truth are as essential as doctrinal soundness. Our hope of union rests, not in the ultimate character of "Our position;" but in the essential supremacy and triumphant leadership of our Lord Jesus Christ, who woos and wins us to himself by the grace and beauty of his humanity and by the power of his divinity, and who constantly allures us into larger conceptions of life and fellowship, as we catch new glimpses of his unfolding purposes and increasing glory. When the love which prompted his life of service and sacrifice fills all our hearts then will the music of his speech enable us to keep step as we march toward the realization of his ideals. Whatever else the churches may have adopted from the testimony which the Disciples have presented, we are persuaded that this position of loyalty to Christ and liberty in Christ is destined to become universal. It is indeed a recognized feature of modern Christianity. Its wide-spread acceptance registers remarkable progress over the attitude of the church a century ago, a progress in which the Disciples have shared and to which they have made important contributions.

In the fields of evangelism and missionary service the achievements of the Disciples have been notable. From the beginning they have manifested an aggressive spirit. The Christian Association of Washington announced as its "sole purpose" the promotion of "simple evangelical Christianity." It agreed to administer such funds as might be committed to its trust for the support of ministers who should be "sent forth to preach at considerable distances." The message of the evangelists who went forth as the exponents of the plea was simple, positive and direct. They preached a gospel which consisted of facts, commands and promises, and it made a powerful appeal to the common people who accepted it with eagerness and in turn became its defenders and advocates. Many of our early preachers, like the minute men of revolutionary fame, left the plough in the field to respond to the call of conscience and of duty. They became preachers of surprising power and effectiveness. Every service was a mission in which the simple Gospel was presented, and people were urged to accept it. Alexander Campbell, as the recognized leader of the movement, became widely known as a scholar, a preacher, and a defender of the faith. He traveled extensively for those times, often speaking to vast audiences in the larger churches, in public halls and in groves, and he never failed to leave definite impressions. The preaching of Walter Scott gave to the movement a simplicity and definiteness of expression and an evangelistic fervor which have characterized it throughout the century.

Long a Rural People.

For many years the Disciples were distinctly a rural people, spending the greater part of their energy in sparsely settled communities and in the smaller towns. Although we are celebrating the centennial of our beginning we have very few city churches whose history covers more than a half century. The fact that we are represented in them so strongly at the present time is not due to any settled policy on our own part to evangelize them, but is incidental to the rapid growth of urban populations. We did not go to the cities, but the cities have grown up around us. In recent years there has been a growing disposition to recognize the urgent religious needs of the cities and their vast importance as centers of influence, and efforts have been made to evangelize them. In the Central States where we had earlier developed strong constituencies, this effort has met with marked success, in other sections the results have been less gratifying. We have scarcely touched the great centers of New England and of the east. In the north and in the south we are still comparatively a weak people. In the rapidly developing northwest, in the states bordering on the Pacific Coast, and in the growing southwest, whither the people from the Central States have been going in large numbers, our growth has been very satisfactory.

From the beginning the Disciples have been interested in education. Numerous institutions of learning of various grades have been established and equipped. Provision has been made for the religious instruction of the young people assembled in our great state universities. Schools have been established also in the south for the education of the negroes and the mountain whites in Kentucky and Tennessee. A literature of considerable proportions has been produced. Alexander Campbell made large use of the press and since his death periodicals almost without number have sent forth an increasing volume of literature, Numerous books, mostly of an apologetic character, have been published, but only a few have circulated extensively outside the ranks of our own people.

We have been eager participants in the enterprise of world-wide missions. As early as 1849 a society was organized to engage the churches in missionary service both at home and abroad. Not much was undertaken in foreign fields until about the beginning of the last quarter of the nineteenth century. The Christian Women's Board of Missions was organized in 1874 and the Foreign Christian Missionary Society came in existence the following year. Since that time the Disciples have prosecuted vigorously the work of missions both at home and abroad. Millions of dollars have been collected and disbursed for the evangelization of the darkened portions of the earth. Schools, hospitals, and orphanages, as well as churches have sprung up in the wake of our missionaries who have penetrated the remotest regions of heathendom. We have born our testimony for Christ in England, Scandinavia and turkey, in India and Japan, in Australia, Africa and Tibet, and in the islands of the sea. We have gone into the cities of Mexico and South America with the evangel of life, and have sought to keep pace with the march of empire as it westward takes its way in our own land.

In all modern movements looking toward the promotion of learning, the enlistment of the young, the relief of human suffering and the reformation of society we have tried to perform a reasonable service. As opportunity has been presented, and as we have had ability, we have co-operated in every enterprise that has had for its object the fuller realization of the Kingdom of God in the life of the world. Our work has been largely among the common people. We do not number many names of those who have arisen to places of distinction in scholarship, in statesmanship or in the marts of trade, but we have not wanted for great leaders, who, with high resolve and unfaltering courage, have served both the church and the state with credit to themselves and honor to all with whom they have been connected. Without assuming any undue credit we may safely say that in every sphere of human activity we are represented today by men and women of unquestioned character and recognized ability.

And what shall I say more? How feebly does the recital of these facts tell the story of sacrifice and service, of labor and love. Only God knows all that has been wrought by the hands of the unknown heroes and heroines who have joined themselves to this century old movement. Literally "'the blind have received their sight and the lame have been made to walk, the lepers have been cleansed and the deaf have been made to hear, and the poor have had the Gospel preached to them." Gradually the larger service which our Lord requires of His people has presented itself to our minds, and as the vision has appeared clearer and more glorious our people have responded with money and with lives. Measured by the standards which our Lord has set for us, we feel very humble, but measured by the standards which are usually employed, we feel that our achievements are worthy the recognition of the world. Many of us who are here today have had little to do in shaping the past. Others have labored and we have entered into their labors. We are heirs to a rich inheritance bequeathed unto us by worthy men of God. We have tried to read the significance of their service in the results which have followed, and in the light of the world's advancing knowledge. We turn from the first century of our history with a profound consciousness of the responsibilities which the progress and the achievements of the past have laid upon us. With Tennyson we doubt not.

Through the ages one increasing purpose runs."

"Through the ages one increasing purpose and believe that in proportion as we make it our own we shall be able to bring to consummation this movement, so rich in fruits and so plentiful in buds of promise.

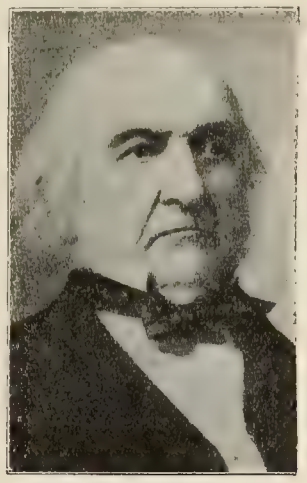
The Christmas Season



The readers of these items will wonder why mention is made of this topic so long after Christmas, and will doubtless think the only excuse to be that this column must necessarily be written some time before it appears in print. But that is not the defense. When I was a boy I had two supreme regrets in regard to Christmas, one was that it was so long in coming and the other was that it was so soon gone. And when I came to England and found that little or nothing was made of New Year's which in America serves as a sort of aftermath of Christmas, my disappointment was great. I would have prefered the Scotch or French method of making much of Jan. 1st. But with further acquaintance with English customs one finds that Christmas is by no means confined to one day. In the first place there is Boxing Day, which is the day after, which is a universal holiday, one of the four "Bank Holidays" so familiar in England; a splendid day on which to invite friends in to help clear up the leavings of the Christmas dinner, or to return the compliments of the day before; then there are the delayed Christmas trees for various children's organizations in connection with the churches or temperance societies, especially those of a mission character; the Christmas parties extend for six weeks or more after Christmas; and last but by no means least in the minds of many, come the Pantomimes in many of the theatres. The Christmas season without the pantomime season would not be complete. "Aladdin," "Cindarella," "Blue Beard," "Alice in Wonderland," "Peter Pan" and other popular children's stories hold sway to the delight of the children, and of older people as well who are glad of the excuse to accompany them to the matinees. Yes, and even the mistle-toe continues to hang for some weeks after Christmas, and it is a saucy thing for any lady to stand under it if gentlemen are in the region, for there can be but one interpretation, viz. that she is challenging them to claim their right to a kiss in fulfilment of a long-standing custom. So it will be seen that Christmas will still be a live topic in "Merrie England" when this article is read.

The Gladstone Centennial

The year 1909 saw the celebration of quite a score of important centennial events, including our own at Pittsburg. Perhaps the last to be observed was that of the birth of W. E. Gladstone, the one hundredth anniversary of which occured two days before the close of the year. All sections and men of all political persuasion have vied to do him honor. True, both parties have tried, on account of the political situation, to make political capital out of the event, but both have paid him honor. The Conservatives have been saying that were he alive today he would repuditate the Socialistic principles of the Liberal party, and the Liberals are saying that if he were alive he would oppose with all his strength the campaign for tariff reform. The Liberals do not refer to the fact that when he first entered politics he defended the Corn Laws which eventually brought on the Hungry Forties, or if they do they call attention to his repentance, and the Conservatives say nothing of his championship of Home Rule, when they are condemning Mr. Asquith for his commendation of it when he promises the Irish home rule, as applied to internal affairs.

The most significant events in connection with the celebration were the wreaths and tributes paid by other nations, especially small countries, as their representatives gathered round the statue erected to his memory in The Strand, London. They bore such labels as these: "To the memory of W. E. Gladstone, the friend of small nations, from the citizens of Finland." "From grateful Armenians in memory of the greatest friend of the oppressed." "Gladstone, thou shouldst be living at this hour, England hath need of thee," sent by the League of Young Liberals. Bulgaria sent a special silver wreath said to have cost twelve hundred dollars, which was raised by popular subscription limited to small sums. Doubtless in view of the religious and educational controversy, if Gladstone were alive today he would be between two fires. But although he was a High Churchman he had great sympathy with the Free Churchmen whom he regarded as the backbone of the Liberal party. And since he disestablished the church in Ireland there is not much doubt as to his attitude toward Welsh Disestablishment under present conditions. A memorial fund of 100,000. shillings is being raised by the leading Liberal paper, to be used mainly in issuing campaign literature. Perhaps $25,000.00 cannot be better spent at such a time.

Year Books of the Churches.

The Congregational and Baptist churches have issued their reports for the year 1909. Both of them show a loss again in their total membership. This has been going on for the past three years and is discussed in religious circles as "arrested progress." The Congregationalists have lost 2,534 members, 7 ministers, 21 Evangelists and lay pastors, and 95 lay preachers, and have 29 more churches without pastors than last year. Their S. S. scholars have increased by 2,694, but their teachers have decreased by 102. The church membership in England and Wales is 465,613, and the number of ministers 2,956, and the lay preachers number 5,273. The loss in membership is largely accounted for by the loss in Wales which is no less than 2,048. The churches have been suffering from reaction for the past three or four years, following upon the revival. The Baptists report a decrease in membership of 1,553, which is little more than one-fourth of the decrease shown in the two previous years. Their total membership is 422,455. In England, Scotland and Ireland there was a slight increase, the loss being wholly due to Wales. Perhaps by next year the churches will have rallied from the handicap of such a historical revival as that of 1905.

Our Church Men

By John Ray Ewers

A Great New Current

By Dr. S. M. Cook

It is a great pleasure for me to present this week an article from the pen of Dr. S. M. Cook of Weston, Ohio. Among the honored Disciples of Ohio, none rank higher than the saintly physician-preacher of Wood County. A graduate of the University of Michigan, he is a scholarly man. He has a large library, and reads the latest books. In a recent letter he says, "I want to keep in touch with the boys." He has gray hairs, but he is not old, for he loves to see new light. No man is old as long as he learns. There are two marks of age, to care nothing for play, and to be unable to get a new idea. Dr. Cook is sixty-four years young. Besides being a skilled physician, he is a preacher of unusual power. His saintly, self-sacrificing life is a benediction to all who know him. Time, talent and money are all lavished by him, with never a thought for himself, in the service of men. He might have been rich, but for this wonderful generosity. Ah, he is rich, for who is richer than the man of many loyal friends. I count myself fortunate to have been led, gently, into the Church of the Living God by this noble man. To have been taught the way of life by him, to have been baptized by his strong, true arms, to have enjoyed through the years his love and kindly advise, has constituted one of my greatest life-blessings. Out of a rich experience, out of a loving heart, out of an optimistic faith, this Father in Israel sends this message from his library desk in his beautiful home. His contribution follows. It was written November 28, 1909.—J. R. E.]

I am a half Centennial. I became a member of the Church of Christ fifty years ago. The Y. M. C. A. is just my age—sixty-four. The W. C. T. U., the Anti-saloon League, the Y. P. S. C. E. and kindred union movements have been launched since my majority.

Among our own people the Foreign Missionary Society, the C. W. B. M., the Church Extension enterprise and our Benevolent Societies have come into existence since I began preaching. "The Christian Standard," "The Christian Evangelist," "The Christian Century," and many other worthy periodicals have all started since I became an interested reader of our religious journalism.

One of the most marked and healthy growths, in our work in the last thirty years, has been along the line of Ministerial Education. Not only in academic work, but in University study and the broadening of intellectual life. We always have had some well educated and well prepared men in the ministry, but, during the last thirty years, there has been a great change in the educational equipment of the large mapority of our ministry. Today, as never before, the young man who proposes to give his life to the service of Christ in this work, has a heart-felt, consciencious desire to do prepare himself that the Master shall have the best service that education, training and heart life can give. Christ as Master is worthy of it. It is prophetic of a better and greater success.

After returning from Pittsburg and reflecting upon the things I saw and heard there, the great achievements in missions, evangelism, education and benevolence I was most impressed by the "Men's Movement." It means so much along all lines of our work. It had been a neglected field. I was interested in the thought that the gospel in times past, has, in its love and simplicity won childhood, and in its affection, pathos and emotion has attracted the most devoted women, yet, when properly presented, in its manliness, nobility and power the gospel is even now winning the men. Men are being enlisted in the interests of the Kingdom of Christ as never before. When men see that the mission of the church is not mere dogma, or even denominational glory; when they see that it is not Sunday sanctimoniousness divorced from strenuous business, every-day life and its "battle for bread," but, on the other hand, it is the bringing of our lives up to the fullness of the Ideal Manhood, in morals, in business, in heart-felt fraternal duty, in the highest code of honor, and in strong, intellectual life, then will men espouse the work of the church with unbounded enthusiasm.

In order to hasten this glorious work the ministry must not only be thoroughly educated, but each individual minister must follow the apostle's injunction and actually show himself a pattern of good works. The movement must be contagious as well as educational. Life must attract. All must be "lovers of good men." Men must see that the gospel of Christ makes not only clean men, moral men, but also useful and honorable men. They must see that this gospel makes men not only sympathetic, but brave men, indeed, whose growth and development on earth is prophetic of the immortal life

I do not look for a new gospel, for the hold of Love shall endure for ever, but I believe that we are on the eve of such a growth of the knowledge of Christ and of his plans and purposes for man's happiness and welfare here, as well as hereafter, that his glory will fill the whole earth.

This splendid body of men must be employed immediately in some useful service or it will soon disintegrate. There is great need of the influence and power of Christian men. We need their high ideals of honor in political life. It will be the salt to save our nation. We need their code of Christian ethics in business as well as business in Christianity. We need their "Golden Rule" in the conflict of Capital and Labor. It stands for the "Square Deal"—the glory of true manhood. We need them in the fraternal and benevolent work. It will teach us that one is our Master and all of us brethren. We need them in the Bible School as object lessons for the boys. We need Christian men in our homes to give us all a taste of heaven. God bless the men.

Our Reader's Opinions

The Baptism Question

Editors Christian Century: I have just finished reading your editorial on working on the Baptism Question. I want to commend it as the most sensible statement of the real issue at stake I have ever read. You have changed the point of discussion to the proper question. If we shift the point of discussion to the question of conscience we can be instrumental in breaking the deadlock. Your editorial is the first real step toward breaking the deadlock that has been taken. I shall revise all my sermons on Baptism with your editorial before me. I hope to see more along this line from your pen in the succeeding issues of The Christian Century. These are real contributions to the Union Problem. Very sincerely yours,

Princeton, Ill. CECIL C. CARPENTER.

Editors Christian Century:—I have read with deep interest your editorial in the Century of Jan. 15 on "Working at the Baptism Problem". I have a criticism, a commendation and a suggestion. You say,, "Manifestly its influence for unity will not carry, if it simply say: 'We will search the Scriptures to find which side to this controversy is right!' For both sides of the controversy have been searching the Scriptures on this subject for generations, and they have come to a deadlock in their understanding of what the Scriptures mean".

My criticism is that this sentence just quoted is not true. Is it not a fact that ALL religious bodies that have laid special stress on the Bible as a rule of faith and practice have been immersionists? And is it not a fact that the unanimous verdict of the scholarship of the whole church agrees on what the Bible teaches? Is there any scholar worthy of the name who will risk his scholarship on an affusionist interpretation of the Scriptures?

I want to commend most heartily your proposition to put the question on a high basis and put it up to the people where it belongs. If you will lead in a move to get all immersionists to unite in an appeal to the optionists on the high plane of loyalty and love and for the sake of unity you will have a mighty following. Prof. Dean once put it aptly when he said immersion is current coin everywhere. Let us have a united appeal to the "free-Silverites" in religion, for the one universally accepted "gold-standard."

I thank you for the material of this editorial for a sermon that I am to preach within the next week.

Millersburg, Ohio. C. A. FREER.

[We go further than Mr. Freer in criticising the sentence quoted from our editorial and say that the first part of it does not even make sense! It was one of those sentences that slips through the best proofreader's mind without challenging examination. What we wrote was this, speaking of a Christian union movement: Manifestly its influence will not carry far if it simply says, "we will search the Scriptures to find which side to this controversy is right," etc. We thank Mr. Freer for giving us occasion to correct it. As to the three questions asked, we must respond to the first by asking, what are the religious bodies that have laid special stress upon the Bible as rule of faith and practice? We know of no evangelical body that can be said to have preëminence in this respect. Our reply to the second and third questions must needs be short and perhaps may not be clearly understood on that account, but we promise our correspondent and other readers to consider at greater length some future time the points involved in the questions. Just now it must suffice to say that the scholarship of the whole world is not in agreement on what the Bible teaches on baptism, and that there is not only one scholar who will "risk his scholarship on an affusionist interpretation of the Scripture," but that probably a majority of the greatest scholars are, unhappily, on that side of the question.—EDITORS.]

Editors Christian Century: I wish to express my appreciation of your editorial work in recent discussions of the scriptural teaching about Christian Baptism. They were strong, clear and true to the word. After saying this I want to urge two suggestions respecting your treatment of the baptismal deadlock in issue of Jan. 13. You use the word dogma in connection with the subject in several places. Because of the very bad repute of the word dogmas as men now think and talk, would it not be a wise change in our speech to substitute for this misused and much abused word some such expression as this: the New Testament teaching or ordinance? I think this change would get for your words a more favorable reading. Suppose we all think this over.

The second suggestion relates to a matter of more vital importance. In stating the optionist view (No. 3) you write "baptism means more than immersion," etc. For reasons which follow would it not be a decided gain to especially emphasize that thought in stating the immersionist position? My own course in the classroom where the topic comes up for discussion is to lay stress on the spiritual character of the water baptism of the Lord's commission. This stress is fully justified in view of the following from the pen of President E. Y. Mullins, which was published in one of our daily papers, Jan. 7.

In a letter to a local minister of his own church he says: Baptism has no spiritual efficacy whatever. Our Baptist position, as of course you well know, is that the ordinance of baptism has no spiritual efficacy. The writer of these two sentences is the most widely known representative Baptist in the south, if not in America. The southern Baptist church accepts them as sound Baptist teaching. Of course we all know that the baptism which the Lord commanded is just as spiritual as uttered prayer, or confessing Christ, or giving money, or performing any other religious act whatever we perform in loyal obedience to the Lord. The New Testament does not know any thing about any command of our Lord, or of his apostles, which is without spiritual significance. The moment it becomes merely formal it is no longer a scriptural requirement. Further, just so long as a large body of immersionists deny spiritual significance to a Christian baptism so long will we find the plea for immersion falling on heedless ears. Multitudes will ask, 'If baptism is a matter of form only why make so much ado about it.' Disciples are greatly hindered today in their plea for unity of teaching on baptism because of this unscriptural Baptist tradition that baptism has no spiritual significance whatever. We must persuade them to accept the water baptism of the New Testament, which is as spiritual as the fervent utterances of President Mullins when he leads a church in prayer, before we can look upon them as specially helpful allies in the effort to carry the campaign for the act of baptism in the way in which He commanded us to perform it.

Now, Mr. Editor, is not this the time opportune for a splendid editorial on Christian baptism as a spiritual act? You have the ear of many readers who would be greatly benefitted by such a paper as you can write. Yours for His truth.

B. C. DEWEESE.

Lexington, Ky., College of the Bible.

[(1) We do not find any word that connotes just what we mean except the word "dogma." Certainly Professor Deweese's suggestion of "the New Testament teaching" would not fit the case at all. He would be readiest to agree with us that not all dogma is New Testament teaching. His dogma is New Testament teaching, of course, and so is ours! But the dogma that the bread becomes the actual body and the wine the actual blood of our Lord is neither to him nor to us New Testament teaching. (2) The suggestion concerning a treatment of the question, "Is Baptism Spiritual?" is one we shall gladly take up as soon as our space and program can make place for it.—EDITORS.]

"The Daily Altar"

Dear Christian Century: I am delighted with your announced purpose to emphasize the devotional aspect of our home and daily Christianity. Oh! for a closer walk with our Lord. Doctrinally we have kept close to the Gospel, we have driven "the nail" of First Principles and have done it well; now it remains for us to reproduce the spiritual life of the apostolic church. We have nothing to surrender so far as First Principles are concerned but we have to add the holy life without which no one shall see God. And that is to be acquired by daily and constant calling upon the name of the Lord.

Hence you are certainly justifiable in your plea for "The Daily Altar." You ask us to relate our experience: I will with some hesitancy repeat part of mine. I married when I was nineteen years old. My wife and I were Christians and we felt the need of the daily altar, and erected one in our little, humble cottage. Daily we read the Word of God and called upon him prayer. Three children came and when the older ones had reached the period of development when they could join us, we found that when the hour came that we had observed, they were sleepy or asleep. Then we tried having them with us at worship just before and then for awhile just after breakfast. With all those little hindrances that will occur, finally we hit upon the idea of reading and praying at breakfast table and have followed this for more than fifteen years.

BEN F. HILL.

Editors Christian Century: I want to thank you for your live discussions of the living things we preachers are meeting in our every day life in the churches.

A word about "The Daily Altar." I give my word hesitatingly because the workableness is not entirely assured, yet I may tell you how I am heading. I felt the need you are supplying to the extent that I purchased about the middle of December a book of Daily Devotions at a cost of one dollar. I like your readings better. I clip them out as they come each week, and after pasting them on a sheet of paper of suitable size; I put the same in an individual file I have. This file opens like a book and puts the readings into usable shape. The Cook and Cobb Company of Brooklyn publish the same in letter and half-letter sizes at a minimum cost. Your readings for the devotional hour alone are "worth the price of the paper."

The writing upon the paper, whatever it was, brought the angry blood to Mary's cheek and she crushed it in her hand and said to Mullens:

"Come, let us go away!"

"Why, what's the matter?" Billy asked quickly. "What was on it? Did it make you mad? Here," turning to the Englishman, "What was on that paper? I don't let anybody insult my girl?" he blustered.

The Englishman laughted, and said with brutal suggestiveness, "Oh, I dare say, she's quite used to it!"

Already excited by what he had been drinking, Billy sprang at the man and struck him a blow that sent him rolling into the gutter. He recovered from the attack and returned the blow. Instantly the crowd closed round them, no one made an effort to separate them and they struggled and fought brutally, heaping upon each other all manner of foul abuse. Eleanor's face grew scarlet with shame and embarrassment, but she could not leave Mary in her distress.

All at once a tall, black-browed woman, flashily dressed, whose face was coarsened with indulgence and sensuality, her cheeks smeared with rouge, appeared on the edge of the crowd, dragging by the arm a wretched, thinly-clad little child which she jerked cruelly when it hung back in terror. Loosing her hold on it, she dashed into the midst of the mob, shoving men right and left, and with an oath fell fiercely upon the Englishman and succeeded in rescuing the well-punished Mullins.

Mary now fell back to the edge of the gaping mob, crying and wringing her hands. Someone had called the police, the clang of the patrol wagon was heard and the people parted to let it pass.

"Get Mary out of the way at once. Bring her to me!" said Eleanor anxiously.

Brainard approached the terrified girl and said: "Come away, child! Miss Crofton wants you—she is here. We must get away before arrests are made, if possible!" Mary did not resist, she was terrified and humiliated by what she had undergone and was only too glad of their protection on the homeward walk.

When they had left her safe at her own boarding-place Brainard delicately commended Eleanor for her course toward the girl.

"It was really you who saved her," she replied simply, "I should not have been there but for you!"

"I think, had you been alone you would have gone to the rescue just the same!" he insisted.

"Perhaps I should, but it was dreadful!" she said, looking up into his eyes, her face softened and spiritualized by the moonlight. 'I hope good will come of it. I would not have dared to interfere, but the scene she has just witnessed will do more to weaken the man's influence over her than any persuasions or arguments of mine could possibly have done. Billy Mullins is base in every way, and Mary's infatuation has given me the deepest anxiety."

Brainard could have supplemented Eleanor's comment with an opinion of his own, had he thought it justifiable. He was not only a teacher to the young men he gathered about him on Sunday afternoons, but a friend whom they could approach freely. Teddy Wilkins was an especial favorite and Brainard had won his entire confidence. He honored his manly ambition to have a home and a wife, and he suspected the difficulties he had encountered in winning Mary's favor. It was the old story—she had been flattered by the attentions of the rich man's son, with no thought of what they really implied, which she was far too innocent to suspect. Her vanity was gratified in the prospect of having a fine house which Billy assured her he meant to give her, and fine clothes that she loved so dearly, which were also generously promised. For, of his base scheming, he had as yet given no hint. He knew that her honor would take alarm at the first suggestion of wrong-doing and, deeply schooled in vice, he realized that her mind must be corrupted by slow degrees. He believed that her weak, yielding nature would give him the opportunity, finally, for which he plotted.

That evening as they left the boarding-house Mary had realized that Billy was not quite sober, and she had walked about the streets with him dreading some such brawl as had occurred. She was bitterly ashamed that Eleanor and Brainard should have seen her in his company and should have witnessed the brutal fight, the interference of the woman—Mag Lewis—the abandonment of the wretched little child, that she might champion Billy. She was overwhelmed with humiliation at it all. She resolved that she would never speak to Billy Mullins—never be seen with him again! So all things worked together for good.

B. F. Mullens, the head of the county political machine, having much influence, was able to keep the scandal out of the papers. The fine was paid and the affair hushed up. Mary escaped the notoriety she dreaded and her acquaintance with Mullins came to an end, as she had vowed it should.

CHAPTER XII.

The Rally.

The Saturday before election day had been selected by the local Republican Club as the date for the closing rally of the campaign. For weeks, placards had been posted in the delegations promised to excel all former efforts and the preparations had been under way for a week or more.

In a huge vehicle contrived from a heavy log-wagon, the States and Territories were to be represented by young girls dressed in white, with sashes of red, white and blue, and coronets of gilt paper on their bared heads. In front, upon an unsteady dais, it was customary to pose the most beautiful of all in classic drapery, wearing a Liberty cap, holding a flag-staff, half enveloped in the folds of bunting draped about her, thus personifying the Goddess of Liberty. It was a much-coveted honor and its award usually resulted in heart-burnings that long survived the excitement of the campaign. Less conspicuously posed in the rear, Justice was also typified, clothed in deep black, with blinded eyes, carrying her scales that tilted and jangled with the jar of the heavy wheels over the uneven road. Nothing created half so much enthusiasm as this be-garlanded wagon; not even the carriages containing the speakers and distinguished men.

Mary Benson had been chosen to represent the Goddess of Liberty and Jessie Clark to impersonate Justice. The Neighborly Club helped to make their costumes, under the supervision of Eleanor and Susan Johnson, their esprit de corps getting the better of their political prejudices when they were of opposing opinions.

The momentous Saturday dawned at last. The Johnsons were up bright and early and as Eleanor sat at breakfast she saw Susan sweeping off her porch, while Alonzo and Teddy were energetically blacking their shoes.

Eldora was to be one of the territories and she was already arrayed in her white gown. Ned, too, was clad in new clothes and a patriotic button adorned his breast. Susan had nothing to do but to put on her best gown and lock up the house. She and Ned were to see the procession from the windows of the Odd Fellows' Lodge, while Eleanor had accepted Miss Abigail's invitation to look on from the balcony of Brainard's office. He was to preside at the "over-flow meeting," the chief orators of the day being the Governor, the senior Senator, and a distinguished party leader from New York.

Susan and her family, with Mary Benson, Jessie Clark, Teddy Wilkins and one or two others arranged to picnic together at the Fair Grounds, where the speeches would be made.

Almost at day-break the delegations began to arrive from every precinct in that and adjacent counties. They came with waving banners, screaming fifes, rattling drums, and the loud dissonance of country brass bands.

Those who could not take a day off, saw strange sights moving along the roads in the chill dawn; companies of mounted trappers, in fur caps and fringed leggings; floats heaped with pumpkins and cider barrels; other "big wagons" with states and territories, rivals of the Carlinville girls.

The sky at dawn had been overcast with a dull haze, but as the sun rose it was dissolved, and the paraders were blessed with perfect Indian Summer weather. It was well for the muslin clad "States" and "Territories" and for the proud Goddess of Liberty and her sombre attendant.

The marshals—mild grocery clerks, county officials, and inoffensive young attorneys in borrowed military uniforms with full complement of brass buttons, shoulder-straps, swords and sashes, mounted on fiery livery stable steeds, clutching nervously the pommel of the saddle with one hand, galloped to and fro, reviewing their respective divisions and giving final orders.

At last there was a piercing peal of bugles, a thunderous roll of drums, a mighty crash of the Carlinville Silver Band, and the head of the procession, resting in the Court House square, moved forward. The carriages containing the orators of the day took the lead, followed by B. F. Mullens in his victoria with Bannister, who was also to speak. In due order came the "big wagon," the Wire Fence float, the log cabin on wheels with its "coon skin" tacked on the door, and a live animal cowering in fright on the roof; while those of lesser importance followed.

When they had paraded till their energy began to flag the procession wended its way to the Fair Ground, where it dissolved.

The main stand had been erected in a well chosen spot under the oaks whose leaves had not yet fallen. Rough benches were provided for those of the multitude who were disposed to listen to the oratory, to hear which was the main purpose of the meeting. But, on the outskirts of the crowd, "Indians" and "frontiersmen" speedily engaged the "States" and "Territories" in lively conversations which were anything but political.

A Wonderful Ship

We built a ship upon the stairs,
All made of the back bedroom chairs,
And filled it full of sofa pillows
To go a-sailing on the billows.

We took a saw and several nails,
And water in the nursery pails,
And Tom said, "Let us also take
An apple and a slice of cake"—
Which was enough for Tom and me
To go a-sailing on, till tea.

We sailed along for days and days,
And had the very best of plays;
But Tom fell out and hurt his knee,
So there was no one left but me.

How Betty Won the Prize

BY EVA M. TURNER.

More than a hundred years ago there lived in a quaint old village in Massachusetts a little girl named Betty Hathaway. Her mother had died when Betty was a tiny baby and soon after her father had been lost at sea. Betty had no memory of any other home than her Aunt Hetty's, a stately white columned old house that was built by her great-grandfather. No family by another name had ever lived in the old house. Aunt Hetty, who had never married, was a sweet faced, gray-haired woman, with a kind and loving heart. She had lived alone for many years before Betty came to her. Betty loved her Aunt Hetty; but she was often times lonely in the big, quiet house, and in the great still out-of-doors, for the house stood by itself in the midst of a garden and orchard that quite hid it from its neighbors.

It was because Betty was lonely that Alice Denny came. "Alice Denny," explained Betty to Aunt Hetty, "is just a pretend girl." Up in the wide cobwebby old garret, or out under the great trees that cast their pleasant shade on the smooth lawn, Alice Denny kept Betty company. "'Cause," Betty would say, "I am just a bit afraid when I am alone." "What is my little girl afraid of?" questioned Aunt Hetty. Betty answered solemnly, "I'm afraid of the great big quiet."

One morning Aunt Hetty was cutting a basket of roses in the garden. Under a great tree near by Betty was spreading a table for her dolls. Aunt Hetty heard her say, "Alice Denny, there are two things that begin with 's' that I don't like. Can you guess what they are?" Evidently Alice Denny could not guess, for Betty added, "Then I'll tell you. One is Sunday and the other is sewing." Aunt Hetty was a good deal disturbed. Betty was a very winsome little maid, but certainly a good child ought to like to sew and to love the Sabbath day.

Aunt Hetty had noticed, too, that Alice Denny never seemed present when Betty was sewing the seam that was her daily "stint," nor did she ever come on Sunday. One day she asked Betty, "Why doesn't Alice Denny ever come on Sunday or keep you company while you sew?" The little dark head bent low over the hated sewing, as Betty replied, "'Cause it wouldn't be pleasant for her." "Why not?" asked Aunt Hetty in surprise. "'Cause," Betty answered slowly, "I don't feel pleasant inside, and Alice Denny would know it."

The Interloper

BY MISS Z. I. DAVIS.

"O mamma, can't I have one just like it?" and Blaine looked longingly at the large gray owl on the perch in the bird show, as it blinked at him in its wise and knowing way.

"Yes," assented mamma, "if the man will sell you one."

Blaine was very fond of pets. No one had thought he cared so much for dumb animals until one day Aunt Ellen had given him a pair of gold fish.

"He will not take care of them," said his mother a little doubtfully. "He may feed them a few days and then it will soon be an old story."

But the pretty little fish had never been neglected by their small owner. From the morning Aunt Ellen presented to him the large, handsome globe in which the tiny rainbow swimmers darted in and out among the pebbles and moss, Blaine had felt a new responsibility.

His next pet had been a fine St. Bernard's dog from cousin John. He was not only a hero in name but one by nature. Once when Blaine had ventured so near to an air hole that he broke through the ice into the water, Hero had rescued him from drowning.

A third addition to his domestic animals as he called them to his friends, was a beautiful white angora cat. At first Snow Ball tried to fight with Hero. She was very rude and impolite, jumping at him with claws spread and mouth open. But Hero was too noble to quarrel with anything smaller than himself. And whenever Snow Ball attacked him for a juicy bone, or nice piece of meat, Hero would let her have it. After awhile the new kitty grew ashamed of herself when she saw how kind the large dog wanted to be. And then there was harmony between them.

After the canary birds were through with their parade and their cardinal suits were laid aside, the manager upon seeing Blaine still watching the gray owl intently, came near where he was and spoke to him.

"O please, Mr." began the lad, "would you sell him to me? I want an owl so very much."

"No," replied the man with a smile, "we could hardly spare him." Then seeing the look of keen disappointment in the boy's face, he led him over to a cage of small animals. There were several compartments behind the wire netting. One contained squirrels, one chipmonks and another rabbits. How cunning they were in their clean suits of shiny fur. The squirrels were sitting up in such a comical way and gnawing nuts held in their fore paws. Their wide furry tails were draped over their backs like golden plumes. At first, Blaine thought he would like a pair of these bright eyed little creatures, but when he saw the chipmonks scurrying back and forth with their cheeks filled out with grain, he was much pleased with them. When the manager showed him the rabbits, he could not keep still any longer.

"Mamma," he cried, "just come here and tell me which to take. Mr. Orr says I may have either kind that I choose."

"We appreciate his kindness, I am sure," said mamma. "If I were going to accept his offer, the rabbits would be my choice." Blaine clapped his hands. He knew he should like them very much. They were white as snow and their eyes were a bright pink.

One day after the rabbits had grown to feel quite at home, Blaine came into the kitchen much excited. "You know, mamma," he began, "that yesterday there were six baby rabbits."

"Yes," said his mother. "Are they all right?"

"No," cried the boy. "One is gone. Do you suppose Snow Ball took it?"

"I do not tnink she is the guilty one," said mamma. "She has plenty of milk. But we might watch her closely until the little creatures are larger."

The next day another rabbit was missing. "I am going to keep guard over them tonight," announced Blaine as it came time to retire.

"Are you sure you are brave enough?" asked his mother.

"Hero will watch with me, won't you, old fellow?" said Blaine, patting the great shaggy creature's rugged head.

It was a night in late fall, not cold enough to freeze, but damp and raw. The moon would not rise until quite late. Blaine and Hero were hidden in a clump of rose bushes where they could see the rabbits without being seen. His dark lantern was in readiness and a club was close at hand. Hour after hour dragged wearily away. There was scarcely a sound to break the solemn stillness. As midnight approached, Blaine began to waver in his purpose of watching out the night. He would not like to have even his mother know that he was afraid. Besides, he was sleepy and numb with cold.

Just as he was about to give up his plan of discovering the thief, there was a sound of wings in the air. Blaine sat up very straight and flashed a lantern ray in front of him.

"Who—who," same in weird accents. Then a large night owl lighted down among the rabbits. So sure was it of its prey, that it did not look about, but defiantly bent over the nest of helpless fur babies.

Suddenly it was surprised by two strong hands that grasped its wings and feet firmly. Realizing that it was pinioned, the great bird uttered a shrill cry.

"Stop thief," laughed Blaine in great glee over his capture. At last a coveted owl was in his possession. He shut it in the corn crib until morning.

"Isn't he a nice bird?" said Blaine the next day as he brought the owl to his papa and mamma.

"I am proud of my brave boy," said mamma, looking at the wise-eyed creature. "You may take him to Mr. Orr if you want to and let him train him for you. If it had not been for the rabbits you would not have caught him. I think now that I know who stole my chicken. But the rest of them will be safe, I am sure."

Of course, Blaine was much pleased at the thought of having his new pet given special training. He never cared for stuffed owls and wondered how any other real, live boy could. But a trained, living owl would be interesting, indeed.

A Butterfly's "Umbrella"

He was only a butterfly, one of those beautiful, large bluish-black ones that we so often see about the garden, but he knew enough to get in out of the wet.

It was during one of the heavy showers that so frequently, in the hot days of midsummer, come suddenly upon us, driving everyone to the nearest cover. To escape the downpour, which meant great injury, if not destruction, to so delicate a creature, he quickly flew to a nearby balm of Gilead tree, where alighting on the under side of a large leaf, he clung with wings closely drawn together and hanging straight downward using the big leaf as an unbrella to shield him from the great drops falling all round. High and dry, here he remained until the shower had passed, and the blue sky and warm sun called him once again to his favorite haunts.—"Nature and Science" in June St. Nicholas.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and to Family Worship

SUNDAY, JANUARY 30.

The Baptism of Jesus.

Theme for the Day.

Scripture.

And straightway, coming up out of the water, he saw the heavens rent asunder, and the Spirit as a dove descending upon him; and a voice came out of the heavens, Thou art my beloved Son, in thee I am well pleased.

Lines.

But, as I rose out of the laving stream,
Heaven opened her eternal doors, from whence
The Spirit descended on me like a dove;
And last, the sum of all, my Father's voice,
Audibly heard from heaven, pronounced me his,
Me his beloved Son, in whom alone
He was well pleased.
—John Milton ("Paradise Regained" I).

Prayer.

Our Father, we read with deep interest the record of our Savior's self-dedication to the work of righteousness in the world, and of his induement with the Spirit for his mighty ministry. We should like to follow him in his devotion to the will of God, and in his life of holiness and service through the indwelling Spirit of truth. Help us to know that the opportunities and the joys of the life of goodness are as truly ours as our Master's, and that thou art more willing to grant us the Holy Spirit than are we to receive. As we were once in darkness, may we henceforth walk in the light of our Lord. Amen.

MONDAY, JANUARY 31.

Theme for the Day.

The precious memory of our loved ones who have entered into life.

Scripture.

And the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be therein, and his servants shall do him service; and they shall see his face; and his name shall be on their foreheads.—Rev. 22:3, 4.

Lines.

They are all gone into the world of light!
And I alone sit lingering here;
Their very memory is fair and bright,
And my sad thoughts doth clear.
—Henry Vaughan ("Beyond the Veil").

Prayer.

God of our fathers, we bless thee for the mercy that endureth forever. The life we live is but a transient thing, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away. If death were the end, how sad would be our losses, how hopeless our defeat. But we have a sure and blessed hope, and know that those who have left our side have entered another chamber in the Father's house, where we shall meet them in the days to come. Comfort our hearts with this good hope, and may the way grow brighter as we come nearer home. Amen.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 1.

Theme for the Day.

God's presence and protection everywhere.

Scripture.

If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the innermost parts of the sea; even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me.—Psalm 139:9, 10.

Lines.

Cast all your cares on God; that anchor holds.
Is he not yonder in the uttermost
Parts of the morning? If I flee to these Can I go from Him? and the sea is His,
The sea is His; He made it.
—Alfred Tennyson ("Enoch Arden.")

Prayer.

Our Father, we offer Thee our grateful love because of this new day in which to labor, and to enjoy the gifts of Thy love. We would abide with Thee. We would not try to escape from Thee. Such effort would be futile and ungrateful. Thou art with us everywhere, and in that fact is our confidence. Give to all our loved ones this same sense of thy presence. And bring us at last to Thyself. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 2.

Theme for the Day.

The freedom with which Christ makes his people free.

Scripture.

Jesus said, If ye abide in my word, there are ye truly my disciples; and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free.—John 8:31.

Lines.

Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage;
Minds innocent and quiet take
That for a hermitage;
If I have freedom in my love,
And in my soul am free,
Angels alone, that soar above,
Enjoy such liberty.
—Richard Lovelace ("From Prison.")

Prayer.

We bless Thee, Lord, that Thy service is perfect liberty. When we have followed the devices of our own hearts and thought ourselves free, then have we been most the slaves of foolish and vain things. But Thou, O Lord, canst lead us into the freedom that finds its secret in the truth, and brings no sense of shame. Grant us Thy presence as we turn to our work. May we do with our might what falls to our hands, in the spirit of freedom and joy. And may the evening bring us quiet and the night its rest, under Thy benediction. For Christ's sake. Amen.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 3.

Theme for the Day.

Divine refuge in distress.

Scripture.

In my distress I called upon the Lord, and cried unto my God; he heard me out of his temple, and my cry before him came into his ears.—Psalm 18:6.

Lines.

When I lie within my bed,
Sick in heart, and sick in head,
And with doubts discomforted,
Sweet Spirit, comfort me!
—Robert Herrick ("The Litany.")

Prayer.

O God, may we never doubt Thy love nor question Thy will to save. Help us to understand that in the moments of our greatest trial Thou art standing within the shadow, keeping watch above Thine own. We thank Thee for Christ, in whom all the treasures of grace and truth are ours. Teach us to trust Thee, O God, that the experience of life may be a means of blessing, and that through the dark doors of sorrow we may pass to eternal joy. Amen.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 4.

Theme for the Day.

Jeremiah, the martyr-prophet of ancient Israel.

Scripture.

The word that came to Jeremiah from the Lord, saying, Stand in the gate of the Lord's house and proclaim there this word, and say, Hear the word of the Lord, all ye of Judah. —Jer. 7:1, 2.

Lines.

The story of a soul at strife
That learned at last to kiss the rod,
And passed through sorrow up to God
From living to a higher life.
—Henry Van Dyke ("Tennyson's In Memoriam.")

Prayer.

Most merciful Father, in Thee we live and move and have our being. Glorify Thyself in us. If like Thy prophet of old we are called upon to suffer for the truth, help us like him to bear with patience and courage the burden put upon us. Make Thou the plans for our lives. Aid us that we may be faithful witnesses for Thee. Then in Thy merciful kindness save us from regret, from despair and from all sense of failure. Turn us again, O Lord, and cause Thy face to shine upon us, and we shall be saved. Amen.

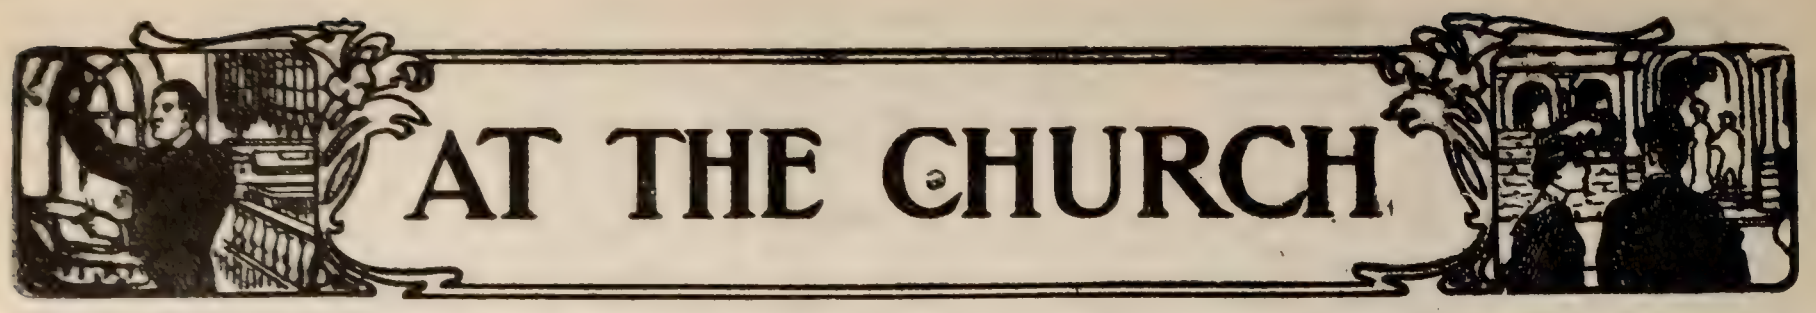
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 5.

Theme for the Day.

The wonders of God's work in the starry heavens.

Scripture.

When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars which thou hast ordained, what is man that thou art mindful of him.—Psalm 8:3, 4.



Lines.

My soul her wings doth spread
And heavenward flies,
The Almighty's mysteries to read
In the large volume of the skies.
—John Habbington ("Nox nocti indicat scientiam.")

Prayer.

O Lord, Thou art the Creator of all things. Thou hast made the earth, and the heavens are the work of Thy hands. In wonder we view their beauty, rejoicing that it is our Father who has made them all. They shall perish but Thou remainest. And Thou hast made us also, in Thine own image and after Thy likeness. Help us, we beseech Thee, to be worthy of our birthright. May we so imitate Jesus our elder Brother that we may help men thus to know Thee, to whom be glory, forever and ever. Amen.

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The Dangers of Formalism*

It is the purpose of all spiritual religion to save men from the error and blight of making forms of any kind a substitute for right relations with God, and with one's fellow men. Religious exercises of various kinds have prevailed in every form of worship. They have been changed from time to time, because of the discovery that they were inadequate, and the hope that some other rite would be more effective. All the great teachers of religion of whom the Bible speaks did their best to remove the emphasis of national and individual concern from ceremonies to the inward life, from forms to the free spirit of reverence and worship. Both the prophets and Jesus illustrate this fact.

The Three New Preachers.

One of the most notable periods in Old Testament history was that of the exile. Then the national institutions of Israel were broken up by the destruction of Jerusalem, the impossibility of worship at the temple, the scattering of the priesthood and the abandonment of sacrifice. To the people exiled in Babylonia there must have come at first the feeling of hopelessness because of the discontinuance of all the customary practices of religion. They had neither temple nor altar, priest nor sacrifice, in the new lands of their sojourning. But they learned that God was not less precious to them on this account, and that the approach to him was just as free as before. Hence there grew up in the exile the three forms of religious practice which became as sacred as the old ritual of the temple had been. These three customary methods of pleasing God were prayer, fasting and alms-giving. It seemed that when they superceded the old externalism of sanctuary and sacrifice, long strides were taken in the direction of a spiritual religion.

Jesus' Protest.

Yet, astonishing though it may seem, it was these three forms of religious conduct which Jesus denounced with such unmeasured reproof as the resort of those who wished to make a show without possessing the realities of religion. By the time he came into the world even these beautiful methods of testifying to the joy of the human heart in the worship of God had become stereotyped, formal and mechanical. Jesus found it necessory to insist that man should retreat from the publicity which these practices permitted to a devoted and secret exercise of the spirit of worship.

Jesus' Ideals.

Jesus did not denounce the giving of money for charity. In fact his whole spirit shows that he was in the deepest sympathy with all efforts to relieve distress. But the application of the Christian principle has the effect, wherever explicitly attempted, of relieving not so much the beggar himself as the whole condition of beggary in which he is involved. The world needs charity, no doubt. But far more, it needs justice and the application of the principles of the Gospel whereby beggary, except on the part of those who prefer it, shall become impossible. Our Master has therefore taught us two things in these lines of instruction. One is that aid should be given to those who are unfortunate in the measure of our ability and of their desert; but never in a manner merely to satisfy our own wish to be rid of importunity nor in such a manner as to do injury to the applicant. The second is the principle that in the right kind of a social order, such as Jesus intended, there will be no beggary, because social justice, helpfulness and brotherhood will prevail.

Public Prayer.

Frequently in the progress of this discourse Jesus used the word "hypocrites" to describe the men and women who made pretense of goodness without actually possessing it. The word means a play-actor, one who assumes a role for the purposes of dramatic presentation; therefore, one who is not what he seems to be. The word has become a sinister one through Jesus' use of it, for the hypocrite today is one who intends to deceive by false appearances. A second form of hypocrisy that Jesus denounces was that of ostentatious prayer. It would seem pathetic that men should steal the very holiest form of relation to God in which to practice the arts of deception. Yet so strong is the feeling of approbation when one is known to be in the habit of daily prayer, that the custom lends itself easily to the cloaking of fraud because it disarms suspicion. Jesus did not wish to reprove public prayer. It had its value, as he knew. But he would have his disciples know that no one can pray in public with the expectation of accomplishing good thereby who is not accustomed to private prayer. Otherwise, as Jesus said, the reward is already gained in the applause of the spectators, and not in any good that the prayer really accomplishes. Rather is one's own chamber the fitting place for communion with God. There all distractions and all publicity are put away, and the presence of the Father becomes the joy of the worshipping soul.

Vain Repetitions.

The heathen practice of repeating frantic appeals to deity with constant and wearisome insistence was known by Jesus and his listeners, and he warned them against all such mere multiplying of words as both useless and impertinent in the worship of the God with whom they had to do. All that makes prayer eccentric, forced, unnatural, dramatic, loud, or grotesque is unworthy of any disciple of Jesus.

The Lord's Prayer.

This particular section of the Sermon on the Mount closes with the little prayer that Jesus evidently taught the disciples, not as a form to be followed explicitly in their daily worship, but as an ideal which included all the elements of gratitude, companionship and petition. The Lord's Prayer, as we have become accustomed to call it, is one of the unspeakably beautiful parts of the New Testament. There is not a word to spare in its few short lines. It begins with the widest sweep of the kingdom of God. The holy name, the divine will, the coming of the kingdom with power all take precedence of any personal request. It is a prayer which unites the worshiper with all who have faith in God. He cannot pray it without thinking of his fellowmen.

Personal Needs.

Then come the more personal petitions. Daily bread is asked for. The petitioner must be modest enough to ask for the things of each day in the day, and must at the same time recognize the responsibility laid upon himself to be the instrument through which God answers the prayer. Prayer is not intended to be a substitute for effort, but the attempt to put one's self in perfect harmony with the life and the laws of God, so that the divine blessing may fall upon the efforts made. Forgiveness is needed as well as food. Not the mere obliteration of some book record of sin, but such a readjustment of life to the program of God as shall satisfy both God and the man himself. Such a reorganization of life is the only competent definition of forgiveness, and even this cannot be obtained except upon condition of having the forgiving heart toward all others who have offended. And lastly, temptation is to be avoided by the divine grace. We are in the world but not of it. Its temptation we cannot wholly avoid, for then must we leave the world. But they can be rendered harmless by fastening attention upon holier things. Thus, in this prayer which is less a rubric than an ideal for devotion, every important interest of the human soul is given a place. And the reality of man's relationship with God is both affirmed and directed.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres.

The Model Christian Endeavorer, February 6, Jno. 15:1-8.

The husbandman cultivates the vineyard for the fruit which it yields. And those vines which bear no fruit are quickly replaced by those which do. Fruit is the thing sought by the vine-dresser. This is a true parallel to the life of the ideal Christian Endeavorer. He must bear much fruit, i. e., manifest in your life love, joy, peace, kindness, sympathy, longsuffering, patience, forgiveness and the like By the manifestation of such character, "shall ye be my disciples." The ideal Christian Endeavorer is one who works at his job, i. e., endeavors at all times to manifest and be governed by the spirit of Christ.

There probably is little difference of opinion as to the truth stated above, but there is a wide difference as to the method by which this fruit is to be secured. It is at this point that so many Christian Endeavorers fail. The parallel of our Scripture here I think is very striking. If a gardener were to bring into your house a twig from a rose bush, or the vine dresser a branch from a grape vine and tell you to lay them up on the mantle and that you would have a beautiful rose next summer from the twig of the rose and some luscious fruit from the branch of the grape vine you would probably look at him in astonishment and would at least insist that it would be impossible. All would at once insist that the branch could not bear fruit apart from the vine. After setting forth this very truth which is so self-evident, he says, "Neither can ye (bear fruit, i. e., acquire Christian character) except ye abide in me." Dwelling in Christ then is the indispensable condition of the model Christian Endeavorer.

Just what then do we mean by dwelling in Christ, or "abiding in Him," as Christ expresses it? Simply seek at all times to make the deeds and principles of your own life consistent with the ideals of Jesus. That is you will meet temptations, condemn the wrong and stand for truth and righteousness and justice with the same spirit of fairness, regardless of all consequences, as did he Your life purpose will be saturated with His spirit, and in the atmosphere you will seem ever to move. It is the point of view from which you approach every problem and decide every question of business, of politics, of social relations, of recreation and amusments. This is to dwell in Christ.

The dead branches, those separated from the vines, are useless and, therefore, are gathered together and burned. This again parallels the result of the man who lives a apart from Christ. Jesus clearly shows us that in the testing time of all things such a man will be found useless and must be gotten out of the way. Life has its testing time and if we cannot meet it, sorrow and bitterness will surely follow. The experience of every race, and of scores of individuals whom we have known, the voice of history, the declarations of science and the precepts of our Lord in mighty concourse declare this awful truth.

The Passing of A Great Man

Sketch of the Church Life of Peter Whitmer

By Edgar Dewitt Jones

Peter Whitmer lived in Bloomington for more than half a century. He was so thoroughly identified with the community that he seemed an integral part of it; hence, the severity of the shock and the dismay when the news of his sudden death spread rapidly through the city. So well known was Mr. Whitmer, to our citizenship, and the daily press the past two days has given such extended notice of his career that little need be said by me of a biographical nature.

Mr. Whitmer was of German descent. Pennsylvania was his birth state and his early life was spent on a farm. These are simple but none the less significant facts. He had a good heritage with which to begin life. As boy and youth, he was nourished in an environment that has produced most of our ablest men. As a public spirited citizen and a safe and successful business man, lofty tributes have been paid Mr. Whitmer's memory. Hon. Adlai E. Stevenson, Judge Reeves, Mr. M. L. Moore, Mr. H. M. Senseney, and others have spoken or written out of almost a life-associateship with him and their tributes become thereby the more worthy and significant.

These business associates have eulogized Mr. Whitmer's honor, his high ideals, his principles of sound commercial ethics, and have pointed out that throughout his long business career he never once departed from the lofty line of duty, conviction and integrity.

There is however, one aspect of Mr. Whitmer's life and that an exceeding large and worth-while one that the public press has only mentioned. I refer to Mr. Whitmer's beautiful and consistent religious life, his active and earnest church relationship. It is of Mr. Whitmer as a Christian that I wish to speak. For he was such, simply and grandly a Christian. One could say of him truthfully as Mr. John Morley in his Life of Gladstone says of that eminent man, "He was a great Christian."

Mr. Whitmer's piety was unobtrusive and quiet but it was deep and strong. Fifty-two years ago, he committed himself publicly to the leadership of Jesus in the eloquent ordinance of Christian baptism which symbolizes the death to the old manner of life and the resurrection to the new with its exalted ideals of life and service. For half a century he was a member of the Bloomington church, as regular in attendance on its services as he was at a post of business or in keeping an appointment. There are people connected with churches who give their presence to the meetings but withold financial support. There are others who seldom attend the services yet contribute liberally to the work. Mr. Whitmer gave of his means and his presence to the church of his choice. Only sickness could keep him away from worship. He was never too busy to look after the interests of his church.

PETER WHITMER,
"A Great Christian."

In his gifts to his church which he loved until the last, Mr. Whitmer was ever generous. His attendance here the Sunday morning before his death and his fellowship in the service were characteristic of his half century of Christian life. He made four contributions that day to the cause he loved, one to the regular expense budget and two to special Christmas funds, and one to a missionary offering. One gift was for the Moulton St. Mission, a work which was always very dear to him. For years it had been his custom to give a generous offering to the Christmas entertainment there and when the superintendent failed to ask him for it Sunday, Mr. Whitmer searched him out and as he handed him the gift smilingly said: "I was afraid you were going to forget me this year."

Mr. Whitmer's home was and is a Christian home. Every member of the family came into the church and became not merely nominal members but earnest, zealous workers happy in the activities of the congregation.

He lived to see his children grow to maturity and happily married. With the wife of his youth who was one with him in tastes and devotion, he grew old graciously remaining still young in spirit. Loved by his family, respected and esteemed by his business associates, revered by his fellow members of the church, his was a singularly successful and happy life. And the manner of his death while it was sudden and came as a shock to family and friends, yet is not without appropriateness. Active and alert to the very last, discharging his obligations to society with the same thoughtfulness and fidelity he died as he had lived. There was with him no experience of wasting illness, nor was there need that he should pray:

"Carry me over the long, last mile,
Man of Nazareth, Christ for me,
Weary I wait by death's dark stile.
In the wind and waste where the wind blows free."

But rather his passing was such as Mrs. Barbauld in her familiar lines devoutly desired:

"Then steal away, give little warning;
Choose thine own time.
Say not 'Good night,' but in some brighter clime
Bid me 'Good morning.'"

The shattered anchor, the broken column, or snapped harp strings are not fit symbols of this man's life; a sheaf of ripe wheat is the only true symbol of his long and complete career.

Mr. Whitmer's death, so close to Christmastide, the joyous season when families gather in happy reunion, was not without pathos, and yet nevertheless, the note of triumph is still ringing in our ears. If these sweetest and dearest relations of earth be but preludes to those still happier, larger and more beautiful as we believe they are, then we cannot but regard the home coming of this dear, good man as altogether fitting and tenderly beautiful.

We do not think of this good man as dead, or of his masterful yet gentle personality as ended; rather we regard his life as grafted now upon the infinite where it "May make one music as before, but vaster."

Fate?

A poet with eyes like the stars at night
Walked where the lilies bloomed, tall and white;

Men said he had genius, the words from his pen
Brought thoughts high and pure to their bosoms again;

And today seemed his cup of joy full to the brim,
For he knew that the woman he loved loved him,—

Like a vision life's scroll unrolled to his gaze
And he thought of the work that should hallow his days.

In the pathway, a little brown snake raised its head—
Poised, struck—but an hour and the poet was dead.

Gone all the bright promise because he should pass
Where a little brown snake lay hid in the grass.

Church Life

The March offering, first Sunday in the month.

As the seed time must precede harvest, so there must be preparation for the missionary offering.

The offering of your church in this first year of the second century of our history—what should it be?

No department of The Christian Century elicits more favorable comment from its readers than "The Daily Altar." We welcome this as a sign of increased interest in the devotional life among the churches.

Again this week there appears a page of "Our Readers' Opinions." This is a free forum, and no man is barred because his opinion differs from that of the editors. Indeed the man who differs is the more likely to get into print.

Rev. D. S. Stewart, Selma, Calif., is spending the winter at DeLand, Fla.

T. W. Bellingham is preaching in a revival meeting with the First Church, Benton Harbor, Mich.

Hampton and Newport News, Virginia, are on the lookout for ministers. These are good churches.

The Freemason St. Church, Norfolk, Virginia, has decided to erect a new and modern building in the early spring.

David H. Shields writes that the offering of the Eureka, Ill. church on educational day will reach $400.

The Christian church of Brazil, Ind., has called Rev. Mr. Gorisch of Memphis, Tenn., as pastor.

T. W. Grafton, pastor, is preaching in a series of revival meetings being held in the Central Church, Anderson, Ind.

William J. Slayter, singer and helper, is available for meetings during February. He may be addressed at Litchfield, Ill.

The church at Gallatin, Mo., has called C. M. Liewellen of Brunswick as pastor. Mr. Liewellen formerly preached at Hamilton, Mo.

H. E. Wilhite, evangelist, and F. C. Tuckerman, singer, have been secured by the Christian church at Hebron, Neb., to conduct a series of meetings beginning in March.

Barclay Meador, for many years assistant to W. F. Richardson in the work of the First Church, Kansas City, Mo., has accepted a call to the church at Lebanon, Mo.

John Ray Ewers, Pittsburg, Pa., goes to Kansas City, February first, to assist W. F. Richardson and the First Church in a meeting.

The cold weather has compelled the congregation at Garfield, Washington, to quit work on their new $8,000 concrete block building. They will finish in the spring or early summer.

Dr. Francis T. McConnell, president of De Pauw University, addressed the great men's meeting at the Main St. Christian Church, Rushville, Ind., Sunday, January 16, placing the modern types of lost men into three classes; he used the parables of the lost sheep, the lost coin, and the lost son.

Dr. Paul Shorey, professor and head of the department of Greek at the University of Chicago has been elected president of the American Philological Association for the current year.

A. C. Stewart closes his work with the church at Urbana, Pa., the first of April. Mr. Stewart is a young man, and married, and will be prepared to consider a call to another field.

Oliver W. Stewart, Chicago, was the chief speaker at a meeting of the Men's Association of the church at Wabash, Indiana, on a recent evening. Following the banquet Mr. Stewart gave a lecture in the church auditorium.

From the report of the pastor, Ira L. Parin, Sterling, Ill., we gather the following items. Net increase in membership during the year, thirty-one. Church paid indebtedness of $600. Total receipts, $1974.36. Sunday school attendance increased 33 per cent.

Jasper S. Hughes, South Bend, Ind., desires the addresses of all persons who are making or who have made a special study of the revelation of John in exile; also all who would like to engage in a free correspondence class for mutual help.

J. S. Pierce, pastor at Gridley, California, has just passed to the great beyond, leaving a family of three sons, three daughters, and the mother. Mr. Pierce was born in Illinois in 1854, and has lived in California since he was nine years of age. The funeral service was conducted by G. L. Lobdell of Chico.

March Offering Flash Lights

Please order your March offering supplies today while you think of it.

———

This is the time to make your church a Living-link.

———

Let us make a new and higher record in the March Offering this year.

———

This is the first offering for Foreign Missions of our New Century. It is important that it be made a good one.

———

And what are you doing toward reaching the apportionment of your church March 6?

———

Please do not fail to make careful provision for the full amount of your apportionment at least.

———

The New Century March Offering Manual is worthy of your careful study. It is a small missionary library in itself.

———

By the way, have you seen the new Concise History of the Foreign Society? It is just off the press and is an interesting book.

———

The preacher that is not a leader in the missionary cause is not apt to lead in anything.

Do not fail to hold a Foreign Missionary Rally in your church Sunday night, February 27. A suggestive program will be furnished free of charge upon request.

Missions is the one supreme business of every church. Keep this in mind and insist upon it. The church that is not a missionary church will be a missing church.

———

Remember there are over 800 workers depending upon the results of the March Offering.

———

Last year thirty-two new Living-links were swung into line. Let us have a still larger number this year.

———

Take the offering promptly on time. This is important. Many churches that delay their offering never get to it. Better get in line at once.

———

We are making history in this great offering. Future generations will refer to it. See that it is a worthy one.

———

The churches expect the preachers to lead them in large and aggressive things for the extension of the Kingdom.

———

No Foreign Missionary Society in the world has made a finer growth than our own Foreign Society during the past ten years, and we are now ready to make still larger advances.

If the churches as churches give $175,000 in this offering, then we may confidently expect to reach $400,000 or more this year.

Last year our churches as churches that contributed averaged $43 each in their offerings for Foreign Missions. Can we not bring the average up to $50 this year?

———

How does the missionary thermometer stand in your church? How does it stand in your own personal life and interest?

———

We now have more than 100 Living-link churches. This is a good start on the second century, but it ought to be only a start.

———

The Foreign Society is in the greatest need of a special building fund of $50,000 at once to provide buildings that are most urgently needed.

———

We received more different offerings for Foreign Missions last year than in any previous year, and we hope to surpass the record before this year closes. Help us!

———

If you have not ordered March offering supplies we recommend that you communicate with the office of the Foreign Society in Cincinnati at once. Your request will receive prompt and courteous attention.

The annual report of the church at Table Grove, Ill., where Fred S. Nicolls is pastor, shows that the church raised for all purposes $1,600.30.

A. L. Ward is making progress in his work with the First Church, Boulder, Colo. At the annual meeting it was voted to pay the remaining debt on the parsonage during the present year. The Sunday school recently gave $100 to the Orphan's Home at Denver.

Henry B. Robison, for three years pastor of the church at El Paso, Texas, has begun work with the church at Mobile, Alabama. Mrs. Robison and their two daughters will soon join Mr. Robison in their new home.

W. J. Lhamon and B. L. Burdett are in a meeting at Wellsville, N. Y. Interest in the meeting is growing and there have been a large number of accession to the church. Mr. Lhamon has been asked to repeat his lecture to men only.

The men of the First Church, Omaha, Neb., acted as hosts at a reception given to the ladies of the church on a recent evening. A special feature was the singing of songs written for the occasion.

The Wayne St. Church of Lima, Ohio, has awarded the contract for their new $30,000 building. Work will begin as soon as the weather permits. When completed this will be one of the best equipped buildings in the state of Ohio. G. W. Watson is the minister.

Rev. Charles H. DeVoe of Peru, Ind., has been called to the pastorate of the church at Mason City, Iowa, where he succeeds E. G. Roberts. Mr. DeVoe, who has served successfully as pastor of the Christian church at Peru, is a Canadian, and was education at Kentucky University.

At a meeting of the curators of Transylvania University on January 5 President R. H. Crossfield, W. T. Donaldson, J. W. Hardy, and a number of curators outlined plans by which they believe that the quarter of a million dollars needed for improvements and endowment may be raised for the university and the college of the Bible.

Professor D. C. Kellems, prinipal of the school of oratory, and professor of Sacred History and Homiletics in the Bible University at Eugene, Oregon, assisted the church at Heppner, Oregon, in a meeting during the holidays. There were thirty-seven additions to the church. J. P. Conder is pastor at Heppner.

The County Association of Washbash County, Ind., has decided to try the plan of grouping the village and country churches in one pastorate, by locating a man with Laketon, Roann, and Bachelor Creek. Any preacher interested in trying such a work should address E. F. Daugherty, Wasbash, Ind.

The Wabash Ave. Church, Kansas City, Mo., has made definite arrangements for the erection of their new building in the early spring. A novel feature of the building will be a roof garden, swimming pools and shower baths. The cost of the building will be about $50,000. The structure will be of native stone and slate roof. David Y. Donaldson is the pastor.

The Sunday school of the West Park Church, Indianapolis, Ind., has adopted the following system of grading: For being present, 55 per cent; contribution, 10 per cent; on time, 20 per cent; bringing Bible, 15 per cent. On a recent Sunday there were 239 present at the Sunday school service, and all but thirty-nine brought their Bibles.

Sunday night, January 16, there was a great service in the Bellevue (Pa.) Christian Church, where William Ross Lloyd is minister. The great men's class of 236 had six of their best speakers to present the duty of the church and the class to cultivate the best young men for the ministry. Two signified their desire to study for the ministry. The congregation was deeply interested.

The twentieth annual session of the Southern Educational Association was held at Charlotte, North Carolina, December 28-30. The association comprises sixteen states and the District of Columbia, and is divided into sixteen departments. President Crossfield of Transylvania University read a paper on "Disciplinary Education." He was elected vice president of the department of higher education for the ensuing year.

The church at Muskogee, Oklahoma, under the leadership of Melvin Putnam, has just completed the erection of a three-story building, or "temple." The building is of St. Louis pressed brick, and is equipped with parlors and class rooms for all departments of the church work, and has a seating capacity of fifteen hundred. The lower floor is rented for offices and other business purposes. The officers of the church give much credit to the pastor for the prosecution of this work.

One of the most vigorous and successful departments of work carried on by the church at Tipton, Indiana, is that of the boys' club, organized as auxiliary to the Knights of King Arthur, of which William Byron Forbush, Ph.D., is the president and founder. A banquet was given the boys by their mothers last week at which the members of the club, their parents, and the official board of the church and their wives were present. More than one hundred and fifty were in attendance. G. I. Hoover is the pastor.

The sermons of J. C. Todd, in the meeting with the church at Green Castle, Ind., are generously commended by the people of Green Castle. Mr. Todd is pastor of the First Church, Bloomington, Ind., with a membership of over one thousand. His meeting at Green Castle was in return for a similar service rendered the Bloomington Church by J. M. Rudy, pastor at Green Castle. Such meetings as these are growing in favor with the Disciples.

Professor Milton Elliott, who graduated from Transylvania University in '97, and for a number of years has been principal of the Dudley Grammar School, has been elected to fill the vacancy made by the resignation of Professor Barry Bullock as principal of the Lexington High School. Transylvania is well represented in the educational interests of Lexington. Besides furnishing many teachers, all of the principals of the five public schools of Lexington are either alumni or former students of the university.

The report of the church at Columbia, Mo., which came too late for publication last week

How they shone—those old folks—
at a function or reception—
But oh! what they missed in their lack of all conception of a food so good as

Uneeda Biscuit

The Soda Cracker that makes our days the best of days

NATIONAL BISCUIT COMPANY

is interesting. The church raised for all purposes more than $14,000. This includes donations to the Bible College, amounting to $6,209.50. The church has its living link in both the foreign and the home field. Without a revival there were ninety-eight accessions to the church during the year; net increase, thirty-three. During the year the church has started a North Side Bible School, which has met with success. Madison A. Hart is pastor.

Ernest Carroll Moore, late superintendent of schools in Los Angeles, California, has been elected as professor of education at Yale University. Professor Moore is a graduate of the University of Chicago, having taken his Ph.D. degree there in 1898. A coincidence exists in the fact that he succeeds Professor C. H. Judd, who resigned last year to become professor and head of the department of education and director of the school of education at the University of Chicago.

The men's club of the church at Elkhart, Ind., held a very pleasant meeting on a recent evening when they invited the ladies to be present. S. G. Buckner, pastor, was toastmaster. Interest was given to the meeting by literary and musical numbers. The chief speaker of the evening was Professor J. A. Wood, superintendent of the schools of South Bend, whose subject was, "The Boys and Girls on Our Streets."

O. W. Winter closed his work as pastor of the church at Belding, Michigan, the second of January. He left the church at Belding out of debt and with the record of more additions during the last year than any one year in its history. Mr. Winter has not yet accepted a call to another work and may be addressed at Dixon, Ill. The official board of the church at Belding gives generous praise to him for his work with the church there during the past two years and more. "He has been effective as a preacher and a good business manager, a faithful pastor and a true friend."

Following the holidays Keuka College opened again with a good increase in attendance. The present enrollment is exactly fifty per cent over that of last year at this time. A spirit of earnestness and hopefulness pervades the student body and faculty. The Ball Brothers of Indiana have made conditional gift to the school this year. One half of the amount named in their condition has already been raised. It seems certain that the remainder will be in hand well before the time closes in June. There is in connection with the College a Union Church composed of Free Baptists and Disciples. We trust that this is a prophecy of what is to be between these two great bodies.

The readers of The Christian Century will watch with interest the work of the Independence Boulevard Church, Kansas City, Mo. George H. Combs has been pastor of this church for more than fifteen years. In that time it has grown from about two hundred to twenty-two hundred. Nor does the church propose to stop here. They have a paid superintendent, who gives his entire time to directing the work of the Sunday school, with a stenographer who works under his direction. James Small has recently become associate pastor and cares for the pastoral work of the church. The financial work of the church is also in the care of a salaried officer with a paid stenographer. In this business-like way the church carries forward its work. Not a single person is absent from the Sunday school or the church without a record being made of the fact, and immediate attention being given to the absentee.

The West Park Christian Church, corner of Addison and Washington streets, Indianapolis, Indiana, dedicated their completed building, Sunday, November 21, 1909. Rev. Z. T. Sweeney of Columbus, Indiana, made the dedicatory address. The rapid growth of this church has been remarkable. It was organized in a tent, August 26, 1904, with fifty members. For almost a year the organization was without a regular pastor, the pastors of the various churches of the city filling the pulpit. In June, 1905, Franklin P. Smith was called to the pastorate. At once the church took on new life, and from that time the growth has been steady. A Sunday school room, study, and basement were built, and for four years were sufficient for the work. But the work of the Sunday school, with classes in all parts of the building, dressing rooms, baptistry, and even the furnace room, proved that an auditorium was an absolute necessity. The building as dedicated, with an auditorium seating about 500 people, cost $16,000. The church now number 350 members, with all the departments showing great activity.

Don't Weep At The Ice House

Some people swell up on "emotion" brewed from absolute untruth.

It's an old trick of the leaders of the Labor Trust to twist facts and make the "sympathetic ones" "weep at the ice house." (That's part of the tale further on.)

Gompers et al sneer at, spit upon and defy our courts, seeking sympathy by falsely telling the people the courts were trying to deprive them of free speech and free press.

Men can speak freely and print opinions freely in this country and no court will object, but they cannot be allowed to print matter as part of a criminal conspiracy to injure and ruin other citizens.

Gompers and his trust associates started out to ruin the Buck Stove Co., drive its hundreds of workmen out of work and destroy the value of the plant without regard to the fact that hard-earned money of men who worked, had been invested there.

The conspirators were told by the courts to stop these vicious "trust" methods, (efforts to break the firm that won't come under trust rule), but instead of stopping they "dare" the courts to punish them and demand new laws to protect them in such destructive and tyrannous acts as they may desire to do. . . . The reason Gompers and his band persisted in trying to ruin the Bucks Stove Works was because the stove company insisted on the right to keep some old employees at work when "de union" ordered them discharged and some of "de gang" put in.

Now let us reverse the conditions and have a look.

Suppose the company had ordered the union to dismiss certain men from their union and, the demand being refused, should institute a boycott against that union, publish its name in an "unfair list," instruct other manufacturers all over the United States not to buy the labor of that union, have committees call at stores and threaten to boycott if the merchants sold anything made by that union. Picket the factories where members work and slug them on the way home, blow up their houses and wreck the works, and even murder a few members of the boycotted union to teach them they must obey the orders of "organized Capital?"

It would certainly be fair for the company to do these things if lawful for the Labor Trust to do them.

In such a case, under our laws the boycotted union could apply to our courts and the courts would order the company to cease boycotting and trying to ruin these union men. Suppose thereupon the company should sneer at the court and in open defiance continue the unlawful acts in a persistent, carefully laid out plan, purposely intended to ruin the union and force its members into poverty. What a howl would go up from the union demanding that the courts protect them and punish their law-breaking oppressors. Then they would praise the courts and go on earning a living protected from ruin and happy in the knowledge that the people's courts could defend them.

How could any of us receive protection from law-breakers unless the courts have power to, and do punish such men.

The court is placed in position where it must do one thing or the other—punish men who persist in defying its peace orders or go out of service, let anarchy reign and the more powerful destroy the weaker.

Peaceable citizens sustain the courts as their defenders, whereas thieves, forgers, burglars, crooks of all kinds and violent members of labor unions, hate them and threaten violence if their members are punished for breaking the law. They want the courts to let them go free and at the same time demand punishment for other men "outside de union" when they break the law. * * * Notice the above references is to "violent" members of labor unions. The great majority of the "unheard" union men are peaceable, upright citizens. The noisy, violent ones get into office and the leaders of the great Labor Trust know how to mass this kind of men, in labor conventions and thus carry out the leaders' schemes, frequently abhorrent to the rank and file: so it was at the late Toronto convention.

The paid delegates would applaud and "resolute" as Gompers wanted, but now and then some of the real workingmen insist on being heard, sometimes at the risk of their lives.

Delegate Egan is reported to have said at the Toronto convention:

"If the officers of the federation would only adhere to the law we would think a lot more of them."

The Grand Council of the Provincial Workingmen's Association of Canada has declared in favor of severing all connection with unions in the U. S., saying "any union having its seat of government in America, and pretending to be international in its scope, must fight industrial battles according to American methods. Said methods have consequences which are abhorrent to the law-abiding people of Canada, involving hunger, misery, riot, bloodshed and murder, all of which might be termed a result of the practical war now in progress in our fair province and directed by foreign emissaries of the United Miners of America."

That is an honest Canadian view of our infamous "Labor Trust."

A few days ago the daily papers printed the following:

(By the Associated Press.)

Washington, D. C., Nov. 10.—Characterizing the attitude of Samuel Gompers, John Mitchell and Frank Morrison of the American Federation of Labor in the contempt proceedings in the courts of the District of Columbia, in connection with the Bucks' Stove and Range Company, as "a wilful, premeditated violation of the law," Simon Burns, general master workman of the general assembly, Knights of Labor, has voiced a severe condemnation of these three leaders. Mr. Burns expressed his confidence in courts in general and in those of the District of Columbia in particular.

APPROVED BY DELEGATES.

This rebuke by Burns was in his annual report to the general assembly of his organization. He received the hearty approval of the delegates who heard it read at their annual meeting in this city.

"There is no trust or combination of capital in the world," said Mr. Burns, "that violates laws oftener than do the trust labor organizations, which resort to more dishonest, unfair and dishonorable methods toward their competitors than any trust or combinations in the country."

Mr. Burns said the action of "these so-called leaders" would be harmful for years to come whenever attempts were made to obtain labor legislation.

"The Labor Digest," a reputable workingman's paper, says, as part of an article entitled, "The beginning of the end of Gomperism, many organizations becoming tired of the rule-or-ruin policies which have been enforced by the president of the A. F. of L."

"That he has maintained his leadership for so long a time in the face of his stubborn clinging to policies which the more thoughtful of the workingmen have seen for years must be abandoned, has been on account partly of the sentimental feeling on the part of the organizations that he ought not to be deposed, and the unwillingness of the men who were mentioned for the place, to accept a nomination in opposition to him. In addition to this, there is no denying the shrewdness of the leader of the A. F. of L., and his political sagacity, which has enabled him to keep a firm grip on the machinery of the organization, and to have his faithful henchmen in the positions where they could do him the most good whenever their services might be needed.

"Further than this, he has never failed, at the last conventions, to have some sensation to spring on the convention at the psychological moment, which would place him in the light of a martyr to the cause of unionism, and excite a wave of sympathetic enthusiasm for him, which would carry the delegates off their feet, and result in his re-election.

"That his long leadership, and this apparent impossibility to fill his place has gone to his head, and made him imagine that he is a much greater man than he really is, is undoubtedly the case, and accounts for the tactics he has adopted in dealing with questions before congress, where he has unnecessarily antagonized men to whom organized labor must look for recognition of their demands, and where labor measures are often opposed on account of this very antagonism, which would otherwise receive support.

"There is no doubt but what organized labor in this country would be much stronger with a leader who was more in touch with conditions as they actually exist, and who would bring to the front the new policies which organized labor must adopt if it expects to even maintain its present standing, to say nothing of making future progress."

We quote portions of another article, a reprint, from the same labor paper:

"Organized labor, through its leaders, must recognize the mistakes of the past if they expect to perpetuate their organizations or to develop the movement which they head. No movement, no organization, no nation can develop beyond the intellects which guide these organizations, and if the leaders are dominated by a selfish motive the organization will become tinged with a spirit of selfishness, which has never appealed to mankind in any walk of life at any time since history began.

"It can be said in extenuation of certain leaders of organized labor that the precarious position which they occupy as leaders has had a tendency to cause them to lose sight of the object behind the organization. The natural instinct in man for power and position is in no small measure responsible for the mistakes of the leaders, not necessarily in labor unions alone, but in every branch of society. This desire for power and leadership and personal aggrandizement causes men who have been earnest and sincere in their efforts in the start to deteriorate into mere politicians whose every act and utterance is tinged with the desire to cater to the baser passions of the working majority in the societies or organizations and this is undoubtedly true when applied to the present leaders of the Federation. We mention the Federation of Labor particularly in this article because that organization is the only organization of labor which has yet found itself in direct opposition to the laws of the land. There are other organizations of labor whose leaders have made mistakes, but they have always kept themselves and their organizations within the bounds of the law and respected the rights of every other man in considering the rights of themselves and their constituency; whereas, the motto of the Federation is just the reverse, and unless the leaders conform themselves and their organization in accordance with the laws of the land, the leaders and the organization itself must be disintegrated and pass into history, for in America the common sense in mankind is developed to a greater extent than in any other nation on the earth, and the people, who are the court of last resort in this country, will never allow any system to develop in this country which does not meet with the approval of the majority of the citizens of the country.

"This must have forced itself upon the leaders of the Federation by this time. If it has not, the leaders must be eliminated. The organization which they head has done many meritorious things in times past and the people are always ready and willing to acknowledge the benefits which their efforts have brought to their constituency as a whole, but at the present time labor organizations in general, and the Federation of Labor in particular, stand before the bar of public opinion, having been convicted of selfishness and a disposition to rule all the people of the country in the interest of the few. The people are patient and awaiting to see if the object lesson which they have been forced to give to these leaders is going to be recognized and if they are going to conform themselves and their future work and actions in accordance thereto."

Let the people remember that comment, "The Federation of Labor in particular stands before the bar of public opinion having been convicted of selfishness and a disposition to rule all the people of the country in the interest of the few."

The great 90 per cent of Americans do not take kindly to the acts of tyranny by these trust leaders openly demanding that all people bow down to the rules of the Labor Trust and we are treated to the humiliating spectacle of our Congress and even the Chief Executive entertaining these convicted lawbreakers and listening with consideration to their insolent demands that the very laws be changed to allow them to safely carry on their plan of gaining control over the affairs of the people.

The sturdy workers of America have come to know the truth about these "martyrs sacrificing themselves in the noble cause of labor" but it's only the hysterical ones who swell up and cry over the aforesaid "heroes," reminding one of the two romantic elderly maids who, weeping copiously, were discovered by the old janitor at Mt. Vernon.

"What is it ails you ladies?"

Taking the handkerchief from one swollen red eye, between sobs she said:

"Why we have so long revered the memory of George Washington that we feel it a privilege to come here and weep at his tomb."

"Yas'm, yas'm, you' shore has a desire to express yo' sympathy but yo' are overflowin' at de wrong spot; yo' is weepin' at de ice house."

Don't get maudlin about law-breakers who must be punished if the very existence of our people is to be maintained.

If you have any surplus sympathy it can be extended to the honest workers who continue to earn food when threatened and are frequently hurt and sometimes killed before the courts can intervene to protect them.

Now the Labor Trust leaders demand of Congress that the courts be stripped of power to issue injunctions to prevent them from assailing or perhaps murdering men who dare earn a living when ordered by the Labor Trust to quit work.

Don't "weep at the Ice House" and don't permit any set of law-breakers to bully our courts, if your voice and vote can prevent. Be sure and write your Representatives and Senators in Congress asking them not to vote for any measure to prevent the courts from protecting homes, property and persons from attack by paid agents of this great Labor Trust.

Let every reader write, and write now!

Don't sit silent and allow the organized and paid men of this great trust to force Congress to believe they represent the great masses of the American people. Say your say and let your representatives in Congress know that you do not want to be governed under new laws which would empower the Labor Trust leaders with legal right to tell you when to work, Where! For whom! At what price! What to buy! What not to buy! Whom to vote for! How much you shall pay per month in fees to the Labor Trust! etc., etc., etc.

This power is now being demanded by the passage of laws in Congress. Tell your Senators and Representatives plainly that you don't want them to vote for any measure that will allow any set of men either representing Capital or Labor to govern and dictate to the common people, who prefer to be free to go and come, work or not, and vote for whom they please.

Every man's liberty will disappear when the leaders of the great Labor Trust or any other trust can ride rough shod over people and mass their forces to prevent our courts from affording protection.

"There's a Reason."

C. W. POST, Battle Creek, Mich.

H. H. Jenner is the new pastor with the Stuart Street Church, Springfield.

I. J. Spencer began a meeting with J. E. Lynn at Central Church, Warren, Jan. 17.

The First Church, Beaumont, Texas, has given $700.00 to Texas Christian University.

The Brooks Brothers have been engaged for a meeting with the church at Waco, Texas, for a meeting in April.

T. L. Noblitt has been elected president of the Ministerial Alliance of Guthrie, Okla., for the coming year.

Stephen J. Corey, assisted by F. E. Hagin, Japan, and Dr. Paul Wakefield, held a Missionary Rally at Galesburg, Ill., Monday, January 24.

Claris Yeuell, who has been doing evangelistic work for some months past, has accepted a call to the pastorate of the church at Paulding, Ohio.

J. J. Cole is the new pastor at LaPorte, Ind. There is a good group of people in this church and the pastor is encouraged by the response they are making to his work.

Geo. P. Rutledge recently read a paper before the Ministerial Union of Philadelphia. This union is composed of seven denominations and has 800 members.

C. A. Park has just closed two years' work with the church at Whiting, Iowa, and has accepted a call to the church at Great Falls, Montana.

At Guthrie, Okla., where T. L. Noblitt ministers the church raised during the last year $3,964, and there were sixty-one additions to the membership of the church.

Walter L. Martin, evangelist closed a meeting at Hamilton, Mo., December 19, with forty-four accessions to the church. January 2, he began with the church at Elmwood, Neb.

The church at Llano, Texas, is looking for a strong man to lead them. To the right man they will offer the privilege of giving half time to a nearby church. In this way a good salary can be provided.

Victor Dorris and V. E. Ridenour are leading the forces in a meeting at Hutchinson, Kansas. They have been holding afternoon meetings, and in the evening are met by crowded houses.

Rev. E. B. Barnes, pastor of the Lyons Street Church, Grand Rapids, Mich., is assisting G. Webster Moore in evangelistic services at Ionia, Mich., with excellent results thus far.

Harry G. Hill of the Third Church, Indianapolis has recently addressed men's mass meetings at Greenfield and Danville. His new subject on such occasions is striking, he terms it: "The Manly Art of Self-Respect."

A new church, costing about $4,100 was dedicated at Exline, Iowa, January 3. Dean A. M. Haggard had charge of the service. The amount needed to clear the church of indebtedness was $1,700. The amount raised during the day exceeded this by $200. Harry Green is the pastor.

The church at Elkhart, Ind., is planning for a meeting to be held in the early spring. They will have the assistance of Evangelists Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Varney, and O. J. Marks, leader of song. S. G. Buckner is the pastor.

The young people at Davenport, Okla., have paid the last of the $100 which they pledged on their building fund. The congregation is now out of debt and happy. James Cage, the minister, reports that there are about forty of these young people and they are a great force in the work.

A Big, Generous Offer

The same mails that have brought us an unexpectedly large list of orders for THE BETHANY GRADED SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS have also brought us letters from many pastors and Sunday school workers regretting that their supplies had been ordered before they saw the announcement of our new series. They assure us that they intend to place their order for THE BETHANY SERIES with us for the spring quarter.

We wish as many schools to get under way as soon as possible with the graded lessons. In order to enlist the schools which had purchased their supplies before they realized the incomparable superiority of THE BETHANY SERIES, we have decided to make the following big and generous offer:

If you will send us your order for THE BETHANY GRADED LESSONS (for the elementary grades only) we will credit your account with the amount you have paid or agreed to pay for the Winter Quarter supplies which THE BETHANY GRADED LESSONS will displace. We will ask you to send us the publisher's bill or an itemized statement signed by the pastor of your church, showing what materials are being displaced by THE BETHANY LESSONS.

This is a big and generous offer. It means that a limited number of schools will secure the new series FREE, for THE BETHANY LESSONS are no more expensive than the ordinary uniform materials. At most THE BETHANY LESSONS will cost your school but a trifle if you take advantage of this proposition.

The reason we can afford to make this almost gratuitous offer is very simple: We KNOW that ninety-nine out of every one hundred schools that once use THE BETHANY LESSONS will continue them right along.

NOTE CAREFULLY that this offer is limited to the stock of supplies we have on hand. When our present stock is exhausted we shall not hold ourselves obligated to fill orders on these terms. Therefore it is to your advantage to get your order in at once for the main bulk of our supplies for this quarter has already been consumed by our regular orders.

You can make out your order on the basis of our advertisement on page 2. Or if that is not clear write us at once for our regular order blank.

THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO. 700 East Fortieth St., Chicago.

Before the ministers of St. Louis, Dr. J. M. Philputt, the retiring pastor of the Union Ave. Church, St. Louis, Mo., urged the union of all the missionary interests of the church. This question will doubtless be one of importance to be considered at the next convention in Topeka.

"The Church of the Future" was the subject of a recent Sunday evening sermon by Lowell C. McPherson, in the meeting at Parsons, Kansas. Mr. McPherson insists that the church of the future must be a universal church, that the union of the churches must precede the evangelization of the world. He was heard by a large crowd, to whom he spoke for more than an hour.

Bishop Charles Edward Chenney will next week celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of his wedding and at the same time the close of the fiftieth year of his pastorate of the Christ Reformed Episcopal Church, at Twenty-fourth street and Michigan avenue, Chicago. The Bishop is still vigorous and spoke at the meeting of the Sunday Evening Club in Orchestra Hall last Sunday evening.

R. W. Abberly is giving a series of illustrated lectures on the life of Paul at the Main Street Christian Church, Rushville, Ind. The first lecture was on the Youth of the Apostle and was heard by a large audience. The lectures are given on successive Sunday evenings.

W. Y. Allen, who has been pastor at Fort Scott, Kas., less than a year, has just received a unanimous call to remain with the church permanently. When Mr. Allen came to the church last April, there was a debt of $1,800 upon the property. More than one-half of this has been paid, and the church built up along all lines of work since then.

L. C. Howe has just entered upon the sixth year of his service with the church at New Castle, Ind. He will begin a meeting with them the 30th of January, in which he will have the assistance of F. H. Capps, as leader of song. January 16, six young people united with the church. All departments of the work are in flourishing condition.

The church at Corydon, Ind., gave last year, $2,200 through all departments of her work; $291 of this went for missions; $300 for improving building and the remainder for current expenses. Total membership, 196, of whom about one-half contribute to church and one in five belong to the missionary society. The Sunday-school enrollment is almost as much as the church membership. W. D. Bartle is the energetic pastor.

Prof. A. C. Gray, of Eureka, Ill., delivered a lecture on "The History of the English Bible," at the Howett St. church, Peoria, Jan. 20. The church was crowded to its utmost while Prof. Gray dealt with the sources, manuscripts, versions and translations of the Bible. "The lecture is educational and at the same time intensely interesting. We had a large number of visitors from various city churches and Prof. Gray was urged by one of them to publish his lecture. The only result that can come from the address is an enlightened and abiding faith in the Old Book," so writes Pastor, William Price.

The Union Ave. Christian church of St. Louis recently tried the experiment of teaching its members how to sing. Although at the very worst season of the year, and in the midst of stormy weather, the experiment demonstrated the value of emphasis being laid on the congregational singing. LeRoy St. John, one of our best known singing evangelists, spent three Sundays with the congregation during the Christmas season. It was a very profitable time.

After a very successful pastorate for a period of two years at the Central Christian church, Pueblo, Colo., Scott Anderson has tendered his resignation to take effect March 1. He has reached this decision with the purpise of entering the evangelistic field. His headquarters will be Enid, Okla., where he was pastor four years prior to going to Pueblo.

An all day rally was held by the church at Wellsville, Va., Sunday, January 16. The Sunday-school attendance was 357, of these, 130 were in the "Centennial class." Prof. L. L. Farris, of Lynchburg, spoke at the morning service. At a great Union Endeavor meeting at 5:30, Dr. J. W. Griffin, of the United Presbyterian church, was speaker. President T. E. Cramblett, of Bethany College, gave the address at the evening service. The pastor, C. L. Morrison, has been with the church but a few months, but has done remarkable work in bringing into it a spirit of unity and developing all lines of activity.

Perry J. Rice is preaching the following series of Sunday evening sermons in his church at El Paso, Texas, during January:

"The Church and the Social Crisis," or should the church undertake social reconstruction? "The Church and Laboring Men," or has the church anything to offer the laboring classes? "The Church and the City Government," or has the church any relation to civic affairs? "The Church and the Christian Religion," or does the church adequately represent Christ to the world? "The Church and Its Critics." Does "The Calling of Dan Matthews" fairly represent the modern church?

Henry F. Keltch has just been welcomed by the church at Hoopeston, Ill., as successor to Louis R. Hotaling.

The contract for the construction of a new building has been let by the First Christian church, Angola, Ind.

Geo. E. Prewitt is the new pastor at Cooper, Texas. The outlook at that church and Sunday-school is flourishing and the prospects good.

The Foreign Missionary rally in Chicago will be held in the Metropolitan Church, Oakley avenue and Van Buren street, Monday, January 31. Secretary Stephen J. Corey will conduct the rally with the help of two of our strong missionaries.

GRADE YOUR SCHOOL
On the Installment Plan!

Every informed Sunday-school worker desires to have the graded system introduced into his school. But it seems like too big an undertaking to grade the school all at once. Hence nothing at all is done, and the school goes on in the same old absurd way of teaching the children the lessons provided for grown-up people.

The International S. S. Committee has made it possible to bring the graded system in, like the Kingdom of God comes, "without observation." You can have your school graded without any agony—almost without knowing it, except in its beneficent results. Begin at the bottom now—with the elementary grades, the pupils under twelve years old. Provide teachers and pupils with the Bethany Graded Lessons, based on the outlines already authorized by the International Committee. Later on—perhaps in nine months or a year from now—when the Committee authorizes an outline of lessons for the Intermediate grades you will be ready to adopt them and the Bethany Series will be ready with the helps for you. And so on, through the Senior and Advanced grades, follow the International Committee and as fast as they provide the lessons you will be ready to adopt them.

Our advice to all schools, then, is: FOLLOW THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE. No independent course yet devised is better than that provided by the International Committee, if indeed there is one so good in all respects. Besides, there is advantage in the whole Sunday-school world studying together when our leaders really lead—as the International Committee is now doing.

The Bethany Graded Lessons may be commenced at any time. Purchase the main bulk of your supplies wherever you wish, but let us furnish you these fascinating lessons for your pupils under twelve. THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO., 700 East Fortieth Street, Chicago.

More than half of the 685 alumnae of Hiram College are missionaries, preachers, teachers or religious workers; a splendid showing for an institution of that size.

J. M. Vawter, of Sullivan, and J. Francis Ashley, of Jacksonville, Ind., exchanged pulpits January 16. These are two busy churches of Western Indiana.

The church at Kirksville, Mo., has increased the salary of E. J. Willis, their pastor. This is a good indication that Mr. Willis is meeting the difficult conditions that have had to be faced at Kirksville.

E. E. Conner, of Irvington, Ind., was preacher at the First church, Frankfort, Ind., Jan. 16. His morning theme was, "The Progressive Christian Life." In the evening he spoke on "The Living Christ."

The official board of the Central church, Des Moines, Ia., have arranged to employ a financial secretary, who will give her time to securing new subscriptions, and calling upon those who are delinquent.

We are glad to give to our readers the following report of the good work of L. H. Otto at Ottumwa, Iowa: Number added to church, 185; number dismissed by letter and death, 31; net gain to membership, 154; number funerals preached, 16; number couples married, 24; resident membership, 604; non-resident membership, 107; total membership, 711; total money raised and expended for all purposes during the year, $4,142. The church gave more for missions than in any previous year. The C. W. B. M. was increased from 20 to 95. The membership of the church, Endeavor society and Sunday school have been doubled in the last three years. In the last four years the congregation has built and partially paid for a $20,000 church home. The pastor began his fourth year January 1, 1910.

As We Go to Press

Carlisle, Ind., January 17.—Yesterday at our Bible school service a man and wife from the M. E. Church took membership with us. —Leonard V. Barbre, Minister.

Carbondale, Ill., January 16.—Splendid progress. Two confessions at our morning service. Two not previously reporter. House full at regular service. Great increase in Bible school attendance. Average for first three Lord's Days of 1910, 228. Forty-five in men's Bible class today.—L. E. Chase.

Arkansas City, Kan., January 17.—Four additions for five consecutive Sundays.—Thomas H. Popplewell.

Professor Willis J. Beecher, D. D., of the Auburn Theological Seminary, will lecture in the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, each day during the week of January 25 to 29 inclusive, at 11 o'clock. He will deal with the interpretation of the Bible as literature, giving exegeses illustrating its principles. The public generally is invited. On Thursday evening at eight o'clock, a special lecture will be given to Sunday school teachers and superintendents and members of adult Bible classes, on these principles as illustrated in "The International Sunday school lessons.

Keokuk, Ia., Jan. 23.—Deep spirituality pervades every service. Great crowds. W. Thompson leading us up to heights sublime by the pure Gospel, which he is presenting nightly with divine power. Miss Roth splendid leader of song. Miss Thompson doing wonders with the children.—N. E. Cory, Pastor.

Vincennes, Ind., Jan. 23.—Wilhite and Tuckerman preaching and singing the Gospel to record breaking crowds. Never in the history of the church has there been such a great interest awakened in so short a time. Meeting eight days old; eighty-seven additions, forty today. Church greatly pleased with work of evangelist.—William Oeschger.

International Convention in England

The following resolution was presented and unanimously carried at the Centennial Convention at Pittsburgh, morning session, Hall C, October 16, 1909:

At a meeting of the English, Australian and Canadian brethren, together with some brethren of this country who had labored in England, held in Hotel Schenley on Thursday evening, Bro. Frank Coop was called to the chair. After a free and full conference on the subject of holding an international conference of Disciples in England at such time and place as may be determined by the English brethren, a motion prevailed that such conference be held and a committee was appointed to present this matter to this convention and request its approval and cooperation, through its boards, in holding such a convention. It is believed that the World's Missionary Conference in Edinburgh in June of next year (14th to 24th), together with the decennial presentation of the Passion Play at Oberammergau, will attract many of our people to Europe during the coming year, and our brethren in England desire to avail themselves of these facts to give an international character to their annual conference at such time and place as will make it possible for those who go to Edinburge to attend said convention. Your committee recommends, that, in view of the fact that several of these brethren have traveled long distances to enjoy fellowship with their American brethen, that we lend what encouragement we can to this international conference and urge as many as can do so to attend and participate in the same, to the end that we may srengthen the hands of our faithful workers in the mother country.

INSOMNIA

Leads to Madness, if not Remedied in time.

"Experiments satisfied me, some 5 years ago," writes a Topeka woman, "that coffee was the direct cause of the insomnia from which I suffered terribly, as well as the extreme nervousness and acute dyspepsia which made life a most painful thing for me.

"I had been a coffee drinker since childhood

"I had been a coffee drinker since childhood, and did not like to think that the beverage was doing me harmetaoineuelelededed erage was doing me all this harm. But it was, and the time came when I had to face the fact, and protect myself. I therefore gave up coffee abruptly and absolutely, and adopted Postum for my hot drink at meals.

"I began to note improvement in my condition very soon after I took on Postum. The change proceeded gradually, but surely, and it was a matter of only a few weeks before I found myself entirely relieved—the nervousness passed away, my digestive apparatus was restored to normal efficiency, and I began to sleep, restfull yand peacefully.

"These happy conditions have continued during all of the 5 years, and I am safe in saying that I owe them entirely to Postum, for when I began to drink it I ceased to use medicines." Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Dedication at Edgewater, N. J.

For many months the "Disciples Missionary Union of greater New York City and Vicinity" has been helping an earnest band of believers at Edgewater, N. J., just across the Hudson River from New York City. Within the last month M. Mosser Smyser has been chosen to spend part time as minister; also a temporary chapel, 40x25, has been erected on a well-located lot of ground overlooking the Hudson. The new building will be dedicated on Sunday, January 16 at three p. m., and a congregation organized under the name of Edgewater Christian Church. It is expected that all the ministers of Christian churches in greater New York will be present, as also many of their church members. The Sunday school at Edgewater, with Mr. George Robbins as superintendent, has been in existence for years and is very flourishing. Lately the ladies of the mission have organized a "Dorcas Society," or ladies' aid, and are hard at work. All the workers at Edgewater are greatly encouraged and hope to have a self-supporting congregation in a permanent church building within a few years.

News from the Foreign Society

W. R. Hunt reports a dozen baptisms at Shanghai. Additions are from the Chinese self-supporting church.

Twenty-three of our missionaries in India attended the great Christian Endeavor Convention of Agra. This was one of the most significant conventions in the history of Christianity for that land.

David Rioch reports thirteen baptisms at Mungeli, C. P. India. Nine of these were lepers. He says that they are expecting more soon. Many are inquiring the way of life.

Dr. M. E. Poland, Nangtungchow, China, reports that the land has been secured for the new hospital. This is a great victory.

Misses Dale and Miller and Dr. Butchart and family have reached China. The missionaries gave them a warm reception.

W. R. Hunt reports that all the missionaries in China are enthused over the splendid prospect. He says that China is moving steadily toward a regeneration.

The summarized statistics from the mission fields of the globe show that three-hundred and seventy-seven were won every day last year from the non-Christian population.

P. A. Davey reports twenty baptisms at Tokio, Station, Japan.

Dr. E. I. Osgood reports thirteen baptisms at Chu Cheo, China, making sixty converts in the past few months. He says that the missionaries are looking for a large in-gathering soon.

Last week the Foreign Society received a gift from a friend in California on the Annuity Plan. This friend has made several gifts before in this way.

The church at Galesburg, Ill., has decided unanimously to become a Living-link in the Foreign Society in the March Offering. This is moving in the right direction. J. A. Barnett is the pastor.

The Harlem Avenue Church, Baltimore, Md., B. A. Abbott, pastor, hopes to raise as much as $1,000 for Foreign Missions the first Sunday in March. The men of that church are greatly aroused and they mean business.

Our College in India

Professor G. W. Brown.

I often wonder if the people in America, Disciples of Christ, realize the responsibilities that God has given them. Do you know that in our mission field, in the various parts of the field, there are twelve people to be evangelized for every Disciple that we have at home? I mean, no one else preaches to those people but the Disciples of Christ. No one will preach to them. You, each one of you, is responsible for twelve souls in heathen lands. We must multiply our force, and that is why we have our Bible classes, to pick out and train the very best young men and young women in India, that they may go out and tell them of the Gospel of life, give themselves to salvation through the Lord Jesus Christ, and it is my blessed privilege to be in charge of the particular work of ours in Jubbulpore, India, preparing those young men and young women to go out and preach and teach. We have about forty students, male and female, each year in the institution, and we send out every year about half a dozen young men, graduates of the school, after studying three or four years, after having practical training there, preaching, teaching Sunday-school, whatever they are able to do. We send out about as many young women, to go out and teach the women in their homes, and that is what we are doing and how we are going to multiply our power, carry the Gospel to those people. About twenty of those young men are now out and at work in that way, and nearly as many young women. You hear a deal about the ferment in India, its awakening national live. The saddest feature of it to me is that awakening is a pagan awakening, it is a heathen awakening. The people who are at the head of it do not want the common people to rise up to their level; and while to a certain extent foreign education, foreign influences are responsible for that, nevertheless the old heathen caste idea is strong in India, and they do not want the common people to rise. I was talking with an educated man sometime ago in India, and at the close of the conversation, after he had rebuked the government for training up the common people and educating, he said, "We do not want that kind of thing; we want those people to be our slaves," and that is the sentiment which really inspires the people who are at the head of the nationalistic movement. Now, we want Christianity for two great reasons: We want to raise the common people up so that they may know that they are the equals of others, and we want to give Christiainity to those other people, that they may not feel like trampling down their brothers.

New York City Mission Notes

The first Sunday in October 1909 the Disciples Missionary Union of this city began a mission work at Edgewater, New Jersey, one of the beautiful suburban sections near the city. No suitable hall or building could be secured in which to carry on the work, we were compelled to provide at least a temporary building. A splendid corner lot, well located, was secured and a subscription started: when about half the cost was provided for, the contract was left and the building erected. Sunday January 16, 1910, the Edgewater Church of Christ was organized with twelve members and their building dedicated to the service of the Master with a most delightful service participated in by representatives from each of our churches in the city. W. B. Craig, of the Lenox Ave. Church, preached the dedicatorial sermon, E. J. Gantz made an appeal to cancel the indebtedness of $375.00; the total amount was raised and the building dedicated free from debt.

Brother M. M. Smyser is leading this vigorous mission and is already on the ground. With a suitable meeting place provided the work will go forward, and we hope to soon have the second strong church built in the state of New Jersey.

Mr. Herbert Gladstone, son of the great Commoner, has just been appointed by the British government as first Governor General of South Africa. He has long been a successful member of Parliament and has held the responsible position of Chief Whip of the Liberal party. His appointment to the newly created office of administrator of English authority on the entire region of South Africa is a well deserved honor, a credit to himself and to the government.

The Bethany Graded Sunday-School Lessons

Will the new Graded lessons make their way into the Sunday-schools and become the standard lessons of the Sunday-schools of the world as the Uniform lessons have done? There are many signs indicating that this is precisely what will happen.

1. All the authorities in religious pedagogy have been a long time agreed that it is better to suit the lesson to the learner than to compel the learner to adapt himself to the lesson, regardless of his stage of mental development.

2. The International Committee which has for thirty-five years selected the Uniform lessons has now begun the issue of an additional series called the International Graded Course, consisting, not of one Scripture lesson for the entire school, but of a separate series of lessons for each year or grade, chosen with direct reference to the age and ability of the pupils.

3. These lessons are being adopted by the best schools of all denominations. The Presbyterians report that about two thousand of their schools adopted the International Graded courses for children under twelve years, last quarter. This is phenomenal. The Methodists and Congregationalists had to go to press the second and third time to supply the unexpected demand for the graded lessons.

The New Christian Century Co. is supplying these lessons to the Disciples' schools. There is no single achievement in which the publishers of this paper take greater satisfaction than in connecting our schools with this most significant Sunday-school advance of the last fifty years.

The editors of The Christian Century, Mr. Morrison and Professor Willett, both regard the Graded principle as essential to the highest efficiency in religious instruction, and both believe that the Bethany Series is the truest, simplest and most artistic set of supplies for the elementary grades that has ever been put out.

Our pleasure in offering the Bethany Graded Lessons to the brotherhood is enhanced by the fact that our orders for supplies for the winter quarter have been much beyond our expectations. Many other schools have assured us of their purpose to adopt The Bethany Lessons at once. This series may be begun at any time. See full description on another page.

Dog and Kitten

A correspondent sends to the London Spectator the following anecdote:

The servant man of a family took a kitten to a pond with the intention of drowning it. His master's dog went with him, and when the kitten was thrown into the water the dog sprang in and brought it back to land.

A second time the man threw it in, and again the dog rescued it; and when for the third time the servant tried to drown it, the dog, as resolute to save the little helpless life as the man was to destroy it, swam with it to the other side of the pool, ran all the way home with it, and deposited it before the kitchen fire.

From that time the dog kept constant watch over the kitten. The two were inseparable, even sharing the same bed.—Youth's Companion.

SEND For EASTER SUPPLIES

The new Easter Cantata entitled

"THE EASTER FLOWER GARDEN"

was prepared by

and is in some respects the best concert exercise she has ever written. It is designed to be used by the young people of the Churches of Christ in behalf of Orphanage work in Mission fields.

We have some very attractive helps to aid the young people in raising their Easter offering. These are an "Easter Egg" and "Easter Egg Envelope," to be used together for the smaller children, and the envelope alone for the older ones.

Order as many of all these supplies as you will need. They will be sent, prepaid, free of charge. Address

The Bethany Graded Sunday-School Lessons

Will the new Graded lessons make their way into the Sunday-schools and become the standard lessons of the Sunday-schools of the world as the Uniform lessons have done? There are many signs indicating that this is precisely what will happen.

1. All the authorities in religious pedagogy have been a long time agreed that it is better to suit the lesson to the learner than to compel the learner to adapt himself to the lesson, regardless of his stage of mental development.

2. The International Committee which has for thirty-five years selected the Uniform lessons has now begun the issue of an additional series called the International Graded Course, consisting, not of one Scripture lesson for the entire school, but of a separate series of lessons for each year or grade, chosen with direct reference to the age and ability of the pupils.

3. These lessons are being adopted by the best schools of all denominations. The Presbyterians report that about two thousand of their schools adopted the International Graded courses for children under twelve years, last quarter. This is phenomenal. The Methodists and Congregationalists had to go to press the second and third time to supply the unexpected demand for the graded lessons.

The New Christian Century Co. is supplying these lessons to the Disciples' schools. There is no single achievement in which the publishers of this paper take greater satisfaction than in connecting our schools with this most significant Sunday-school advance of the last fifty years.

The editors of The Christian Century, Mr. Morrison and Professor Willett, both regard the Graded principle as essential to the highest efficiency in religious instruction, and both believe that the Bethany Series is the truest, simplest and most artistic set of supplies for the elementary grades that has ever been put out.

Our pleasure in offering the Bethany Graded Lessons to the brotherhood is enhanced by the fact that our orders for supplies for the winter quarter have been much beyond our expectations. Many other schools have assured us of their purpose to adopt The Bethany Lessons at once. This series may be begun at any time. See full description on another page.

The Task of the President

Duties of The President of the American Christian Missionary Society

It has long been the conviction of The Christian Century that there ought to be some one person who, during a current year of our history, would stand as the most conspicuous representative of the interests of the Disciples and could speak with something of the assurance and urgency that such an official position would permit.

The nearest approach we have to such an office is the presidency of the American Christian Missionary Society. The rotating nature of this office makes it almost the only complimentary and honorary position to which the brotherhood can elect any of its number. The presidents of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society and the Christian Woman's Board of Missions are really executive officers in charge of those particular interests. It might be well if the same were true of the president of the Home Society. But in the absence of any representative organization, which includes all our interests as a brotherhood, the president of the American Society has been regarded as the person whom the brotherhood desired to honor for a year. As such, he has never had any executive duty. He has been merely the presiding officer at the sessions of the Home Society. The nearest approach to the exercise of brotherhood responsibilities was in the preparation and delivery of an address which some of the men in the list of presidents have construed as a broad and representative message for the entire body of Disciples. While others have made it a direct message regarding the work of the American Society.

Peter Ainslie, President American Missionary Society.

When the Disciples unify their conventions, or rather organize a convention which shall be representative of all their interests, naturally its president will stand as the common denominator for the entire brotherhood, for the year of his administration. This will give him a dignity and significance to which no man can approach in our present loosely organized condition.

But we wish to offer a suggestion regarding an important service which might be rendered the president of the American Christian Missionary Society, even under existing conditions. Technically, his position is limited to the work of a single organization and, in practice, as has been said, it is limited to the use of the gavel on two days during the week of our national gathering. Yet, by virtue of the custom which has regarded him as in some sense the representative man of the brotherhood for the one year, why should he not become something more than the mere figure-head which the brotherhood has permitted these presidents to be in the past?

We can conceive of no more helpful service to be rendered the Disciples than for the president of the American Christian Missionary Society, who is always a man to be loved and trusted, to be invested with real leadership for the year of his incumbency. We believe that he should visit the important centers of the brotherhood with a series of strong and urgent messages regarding the great duties and opportunities of the time. A series of assemblies could easily be organized in the more important cities to which all the churches of the neighboring district would be invited. Such a series of gatherings in cities like Pittsburg, Cleveland, Chicago, Kansas City, St. Louis, Cincinnati, and as many others as time would permit, would be of incalculable good in unifying the ideals and purposes of the brotherhood and setting higher standards of effectiveness in all our lines of work.

It is easy to see that the plan would involve a great deal of hard work on the part of the president himself. This is precisely what we believe should be the case. The office ought to be no mere complimentary title. There is a great service to be rendered to our people each year by some strong man in the brotherhood. And we should like to see this service made regular and consistent. In the hands of that succession of notable men whom the brotherhood selects to be its representatives for the various years.

The time that would be required for such a visitation ought to be given up cheerfully to this work both by the man himself and by the church he serves. The expenses of the visitation would be gladly borne by the various centers to which he would come. From every point of view the plan would be desirable. It would be a series of local conventions with a new ideal and a different order of the results from those now sought or obtained by state or district conventions or by local lectureships.

We have begun the new century with the election of a thoroughly worthy repesentative and faithful man as the president of the American Christian Missionary Society. Peter Ainslie has accomplished a notable work in his own city of Baltimore and in the Temple Church, which he has built up to a resourcefulness and influence of high character, especially when one considers the conservative influences of the East in which he labors. He has begun the work of his year of presidency with the manifestation of a sincere and genuine interest in the progress of our people and in the work that may be accomplished at once, looking to greater results. We believe that Mr. Ainslie would consent to make a visitation of the more important centers of our brotherhood after the manner we have outlined above. We believe that he would be everywhere welcomed with enthusiasm and listened to with deep interest and his message would be invested with a representative and commanding character which no other man's could have in this first year of the new century. We believe the results would be in every way admirable. We should like to have the plan tried, and we have no doubt regarding the outcome.

Such has long been the custom in other religious bodies, and with the very finest results. The president of the Free Church Council in England considers himself the servant of the body to make visitations of this character. The moderator of the Congregational Council spends a great deal of time in visiting the centers of denominational life. Similar officials among the Presbyterians, Baptists, and other religious bodies perform like valuable services. The Disciples need precisely this type of leadership. May we not see the effort made to realize this need beginning in this very year when the opportunities are so promising and when the officer whom we have at our disposal is so well qualified to meet the demands of the hour?

The following three rules are said to have been given by an old Quaker to Senator Scott, of West Virginia, when he was a young man. In following them the Senator claims to have made his success in life:

"Not what thee eats, but what thee digests, will make thee healthy.

"Not what thee earns, but what thee saves, will make thee wealthy.

"Not what thee reads, but what thee remembers will make thee wise."—Exchange.

Cannon or Cannonism?

It is now perhaps a foregone conclusion that the doom of our Uncle Joe is written in large letters. His one defeat in the matter of appointing the Ballinger investigating committee would not mean much within itself, but it has given courage to those who feel themselves between the devil of political prestige and patronage in Washington, and the deep sea of popular wrath in their constituencies. There is no doubt about the wrath in many of the constituencies and it has put many a poor politically-wise congressman in a nerve racking dilemma. The statesmen among them have stood straight up, but the time-serving are kept dodging, not knowing which way was going to bring success. On the one hand the speaker sits with the power of political life and death in his hand so far as "getting things through" in the House is concerned, while on the other hand either the tide of popular disapproval must turn or his favor will mean the next term at home for some erstwhile followers. Thus, when the "czar" gets a clear defeat, those who have the "courage of the coward" take heart in that they see their dilemma solved and a chance offered them to play safe by joining the majority against the speaker, and so retaining the majority at the next election. Mighty is the majority.

But whether or not Uncle Joe is thrust down is not the real issue. The thing that makes Uncle Joe is the real issue, and that is the rules. It will do no good to dethrone the king while the shout, "long live the king," goes up. It will not matter so much about Uncle Joe if the rules that make him odious are reformed. Uncle Joe is a very able, genial, vulgar old man of the day-before-yesterday type of statesman. He is against the tides of our times and especially its moral crest, but it is not Cannon that is so bad as Cannonism.

A Pre-Rooseveltian Viewpoint

It looks as if the Ballinger-Pinchot controversy may be the event of the Taft administration. Mr. Ballinger may be a much wronged man. We can afford to await the investigation before making popular judgment, but popular bias will not wait upon this investigation. Mr. Ballinger is in an unhappy position, whether innocent or guilty. He was the attorney for certain interests and afterwards had to pass upon the claims of these same interests. To be sure, the specific claims that he represented in a legal capacity were referred to subordinates in the department when brought there after he was elevated to its head, but the same clients had other interests and as the attorney for such claimants and with a mind bent that way, it was only natural that his viewpoint should be that expressed in his declaration of last November, viz., that "the proper course to take with regard to this domain is to divide it up among the big corporations and the people who know how to make money out of it and let the people at large get the benefit of the circulation of the money."

This is Mr. Ballinger's viewpoint. It is the pre-Rooseveltian viewpoint. With this mind in him, the Secretary of the Interior could very well favor the claimants and recall the Roosevelt withdrawal of millions of acres. Roosevelt, being in favor of having the domain developed by the mass of home-seekers and for their direct benefit, withdrew everything the law did not forbid. Ballinger, being in favor of the indirect development through the syndicates, withdrew Roosevelt's withdrawal on the technical plea that there was no law demanding such withdrawal. Then, too, by the same bias he could seek to validate the claims of the Cunninghams to great coal fields in Alaska. These claims were not strictly legal, and while Land Commissioner, Ballinger tried to get Congress to make them so. After leaving that office, he became attorney to get them made so, and after becoming Secretary of the Interior he rendered a ruling that would have made them so, but Attorney General Wickersham overruled him on every point, and they were not validated.

On the other hand, Gifford Pinchot is the father of the Roosevelt policies in regard to conservation, as the ex-President more than once stated. He was born to wealth, but preferred work to ease, and the public welfare to private gain, so carved out a career for himself by studying forestry and so educating the public upon it that he became first authority and was put at the head of the unheard-of department in the Interior office at Washington. His ten helpers have become 3,000, and his functions grew from a very perfunctory kind to that of directing the affairs of a governmental asset twice as valuable as the Army and Navy combined. No one ever doubted Mr. Pinchot's public spirit and absolute disinterestedness.

The Point of Punctilio

Now comes the point of punctilio. The President makes a rule that no subordinate shall make a complaint or make public any departmental matter until it is passed upon by those higher up. This is a very good military rule, perhaps—though it would have effected the "firing" of a certain Rough Rider Colonel when a certain Round Robin went round during the Cuban campaign—and on the technical side may be a very good piece of officialism, but there are dangers in it in a civil office in the "home of the brave and the land of the free." Mr. Ballinger sent a letter to Senator Jones, and it was read in the Senate in the Secretary's defense. Senator Dolliver, being interested in the other side, asked the Chief Forester to state his side, and being on that committee in the Senate, Mr. Dolliver thought he was performing committee business in a proper way. Mr. Pinchot responded and his letter was read just as Mr. Ballinger's had been. But here was the pin point of punctilio, and the chief forester had walked over it. There was great official agitation and the chief conserver of the people's interests was discharged from the department he had made. The President immediately proved himself not to be against the people's interests by appointing a man to the position who holds as strong opinions as the discharged forester.

No non-partizan man doubts Mr. Taft's sincerity, and no clear discerning man, perhaps, doubts that his bias is somewhat like that of Mr. Ballinger, and that he is much more conservative than Roosevelt. It is not a question of honesty or desire to serve the public, but a question of viewpoint and of method. It may be proven that Mr. Ballinger acted as attorney for his old clients after becoming judge of their claims. It may be acknowledged that Mr. Pinchot was "insubordinate" in acceding to Senator Dolliver's request. But one wonders what an Abraham Lincoln would have done in such a case. Would he have discharged one of the most efficient men in the public service for lack of official punctilio, or would he have forgotten all else excepting the ability and efficiency of the public servant? Here is the great big issue, after all. Will it be Roosevelt's new idea of property through the people, or the old-time idea of the people through property? Equally honest men may be on either side. The issue should not be confused with personalities.

What of Our Forests?

We have 550,000,000 acres of forests. There is an area covering one-fourth of the land of the country. We have used up and destroyed 300,000,000 acres. Of that left, one-fifth is yet in the public domain. The four-fifths under private ownership is naturally the best. Of that yet belonging to the public domain, the art of the forester is practiced on 70 per cent of the trees. Of that under the 3,000,000 private owners, it is practiced upon but 1 per cent. One-half of the total has already been cut over and much of it is restocking with young trees and could greatly benefit by the forester's arts. The waste is enormous. Every year millions of acres burn over. The turpentine industry destroys one-fifth of the amount worked over each year. The loss at the mill runs from one-third up to as high at two-thirds of the log. Insects cause much loss. In all, we market but 320 feet of lumber from each 1,000 feet of log, and we are taking from the forests each year three times as much as nature is replacing. We cut 20,000,000,000 cubic feet of wood out each year.

We will come to the time when the forest areas face exhaustion. It may be a considerable time, but a wise prudence suggests the conserving of waste and the replacing of that taken in industry. This is the work of the forestry department. They stop forest fires, destroy the insect enemies, protect and cultivate the regrowth, seek to prevent so large a waste in actual timber cutting and sawing, and try by the withdrawal of large areas of that still in the public domain to save it to a larger growth and from wasteful cutting. By these means the department hopes to supply the lumber markets for generations to come.

The Greater Conservation—Our "White Coal"

The real property Pinchot sought to conserve was the "white-coal," the water power in the midst of the great public areas withdrawn from public entry. With the development of electricity and the art of transmitting its magical current the worth of the public streams became a vast popular asset. There is enough power in them to run many times all our present industries if it could be conveyed to them. With the growth of population industries will spring up about them and with the progress of electrical invention means of successful transmission will carry the power cheaply to greater distances. Then this "white-coal" will produce power much cheaper than our black variety.

Nothing could be more manifestly the natural property of the public than its streams and therefore their water power. In conserving the timber areas they conserve the streams and in withdrawing the timber along the streams from entry, the future water power is held in governmental control until satisfactory legislation can be framed to meet the contingencies that are as sure to arise as time is sure to pass. This legislation should control this mighty new public asset as it is now seeking to control the valuable franchises which it once so freely granted. It should so pre-provide for its use by industry that monopolies in it will be impossible and that no special privilege should hinge upon it.

Wisconsin has seen the vision. Its seer is a man of the Pinchot variety. Educated in the Forestry schools of Germany, like Pinchot, he met the problem in its more advanced stage, for Germany is thickly populated and has a highly developed industrial economy and is facing the problem today that we will come to face in another generation or two. These men are prophets because they have seen with their own eyes the problems that come with the arising of the contingency in another land before it comes to their own. The Badger States Chief Forester, Mr. Griffeth, succeeded in riding the tide of Rooseveltian conservation popularity into the state house and had 3,000,000 acres along the best power streams of Wisconsin withdrawn. He then formed a non-profit corporation to govern it and invited all who used the power of the streams to join and share its benefits. The power is governed by this corporation and all are treated alike but the public is the chief stock-holder. Its interest is not in present per cent for there can be none in this unique corporation. It is but an ingenious device enabling the department to do indirectly what the constitution will not allow it to directly. Mr. Griffeth establishes high and low water marks, governs the placing of dams, builds great storage reservoirs, prevents monopolistic control, and gives every industry using the power a "square deal."

None of these movements mean socialism but they all do mean socializing—i. e., a recognition of the public's weal and interest in those properties and franchises that are natural monopolies.

What Creates the Postal Deficit?

A few years ago there was a narrow guage railroad running from Des Moines, Iowa, down to the southern part of the state. It skirted the hills, fairly waded the swamps, climbed all possible grades and meandered about in any manner that would prevent expense in the laying of the track. The right of way was donated, the rails were light, many counties voted subsidies to help build it, and in the early days it helped to "make the country." But the times outgrew it—yet it continued to do business. One of its secrets was revealed by the farmers along its winding route. During that period of a few weeks when at stated intervals the mails were weighed in order that compensation might be fixed for their carriage by this ancient line of rusty iron, the farmers received tons of governmental reports, all kinds of catalogs, and all sorts of old paper. It was of no use to them but it made that railroad profitable for the annual compensation to it for carrying Uncle Sam's mail was guaged by the plethoric business of this weighing period. That is not cited as an average case but it points to a reason why there was a deficit on the handling of mail that went over that road. Even today it is charged that there are congressmen who frank out great piles of documents during the mail weighing period, thus favoring certain roads that run through their districts and grant favors.

The most flagrant abuse of the present mail carrying system is in the fact that the government pays the roads annually a rental greater than the total cost of the mail cars. When John Wannamaker was Postmaster General he suggested that the government build its own cars and simply pay mileage on them. That would have made the pay of the railroads comparatively simple—too simple, for it to meet their approbation for simplying the matter would decrease the cost to the government to a fraction of the present cost and relieve much of the deficit. The express companies get the same service from the roads at one-fourth the price the mail is carried. The cars cost up to as high as $5,000 to build. The government pays $6,250 per year for rental of each car and then pays for carrying the mail in it besides. It is almost unbelievable but Wannamaker failed to get it changed.

Express Company Melons

The Express Companies have no deficits. In 1909 the Wells Fargo Company made a profit of 86 per cent on its investments, $1,400,000 from profits on accumulated and undivided dividends that had been invented and "cut a melon" of $24,000,000 of undivided profits at Christmas—300 per cent on the investment. The American Company has paid from 15 to 20 per cent annually on investment and has undivided profits invested that bring in over a million a year besides. The Adams Company has an investment of $6,000,000. It pays big dividends and has distributed some $36,000,000 in extra profits in the past few years and has another special distribution of 100 per cent ready. Wannamaker said there were four reasons why we could not have a parcels post and those four reasons were the four big express companies.

In Germany it costs but one-tenth the total expense for transportation of the mails, in Great Britian one-ninth, in U. S. one-third. Greater distances would make some difference, but not so great as is indicated, for Russia pays but one-sixteenth out for transportation. Parcels post makes the mail business profitable in other lands. Germany clears $15,000,000, France $14,000,000 and Britain $25,000,00 annually. Here the Express Companies take the source of profit.

If we would make advertising material pay its own way, restrict the franking privilege, reduce the railroad cost to what is paid by the express companies, create a parcels—post, and allow the rural carriers to carry local merchandise, it is safe to say there would be no deficit and the "muck-raking" magazines would not be held guilty for a condition that existed before they came into existence.

Morgan's Banking Genius

Pierpont Morgan is a financial genius. If anyone doubts it, read this tale. His First National Bank in New York City had a paid-up stock capital of $500,000. In 1902 a dividend of 1,900% was declared and with it the stock was increased to $10,000,000. Of course this was a special dividend coming through accumulated surplus. For the next four years annual dividends of 20% were paid on the $10,000,000. Then business increased enough to allow a 32% dividend. But as this did not disburse all the earnings a $10,000,000 Trust Company was organized out of the accumulated surplus and last year a little dividend of 40% allowed besides. Is it irreverent to ask whether Mr. Morgan and his bank gave society that much in service?

Temperance Notes

Out of twenty-one counties voting at the recent local-option election in Manitoba, eighteen went "dry," making a total of eighty-two "dry" and fifty "wet" counties in the province.

When it is known that but 3½ per cent of the south is foreign, another reason is found for its becoming so strongly prohibition. The modern saloon is un-American.

Chicago gets $7,000,000 per year from its liquor taxes, but runs from $1,000,000 to $1,500,000 behind each year. The saloons run the town and it costs more than $7,000,000 to take care of their product and pay their grafting officials.

John F. Cuneen, a Catholic, produces figures to show that drink costs Chicago $8,000,000 for care of the product of the saloon, that it takes $55,000,000 annually out of legitimate channels of trade, and that it commands the services of 15,000 persons which is worth $22,500,000 more to legitimate industry. The total cost of the saloon is thus put at $95,000,000 for Chicago alone.

The heartless meanness of the saloon business was well illustrated at Cherry when they demanded that they be allowed to open as soon as the miners and their families received their pay, in the midst of their distress and suffering. While the country was pouring in thousands for relief, they proposed to have their toll of blood money from the poor victims of drink. The subordination of a saloon administration was likewise shown by the cowardice of the officials of the village who gave them the permission because they demanded it.

There are now forty counties in Illinois without saloons.

Another Great Gift to Charity

The death of Mr. D. O. Mills of New York, a man prominently connected with the philanthropies of that city, brings to light the fact that in his will a very considerable sum, amounting to over four hundred thousand dollars, was left to charity and educational purposes. Such institutions as the Metropolitan Museum of Art, the Museum of Natural History, the Home for Incurables, the Bronx Botanical Gardens, the American Geographical Society, and the American Red Cross Society, receive large gifts. It is becoming increasingly the custom for men of public spirit, no matter what their degree of wealth may be, to leave a suitable proportion of their estate to the uses of public benevolence. A man is in a measure disgraced who fails in this important regard. It is but a small return at best that one can make for the aid which society has yielded in the development of whatever fortunes he may possess. And there is the higher principle of a duty to society which comes increasingly to attention in the benefactions of citizens who are worthy of the public regard.

Dr. Jowett Declines Call

It has been rumored for some time that efforts were being made to secure Rev. J. H. Jowett, pastor of Carr's Lane Congregational Church, Birmingham, England, as the pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church in New York city, perhaps the wealthiest church in the denomination. But Mr. Jowett has brought great joy to his people by the announcement that he has decided to remain with his church in Birmingham, particularly because the work of the Digbeth Institute, founded and equipped by him for educational and industrial purposes in the heart of the neediest portion of Birmingham, demands the continuance of his ministry in that city. Mr. Jowett is perhaps the most accomplished and sought-for preacher in England.

A Great Missionary Year

Nineteen hundred and ten will go into history as a signal year for the foreign missionary cause. Following the one hundredth anniversary of the American Board (Congregational) held last October in Minneapolis, a great centennial convention is to be held next October in Boston. The Laymen's Missionary Movement, under the leadership of J. Campbell White, John R. Mott and others, is now in process of holding enormous missionary demonstrations in seventy American cities. The one held in New York a few days since was marked by the attendance of the greatest number of Christian men that had ever before participated in a single Christian enterprise in the metropolis. At a great banquet, held at the Hotel Astor, 1,850 men were present, and on Sunday night 5,000 men packed themselves into the great Hippodrome. A resolution to increase New York City's gifts to foreign missions from $400,000, the amount contributed the past year, to $725,000, was passed with tremendous enthusiasm and practical steps taken to carry it out. This series of rallies in all the leading cities of the land is to reach its climax in a monster demonstration in Chicago, May 3-6.

The event of greatest significance in the missionary enterprise this year will be the World's Missionary Conference, to be held in Edinburgh in June. All the missionary societies of the world will be represented in the 1,100 delegates. The conference is a serious attempt to study the missionary problem. Eight commissions, composed of authoritative experts have been investigating the various aspects of the missionary problem for two and three years. Their reports will form the basis of the discussions of this conference. A special steamer has been chartered to take the American delegates and their friends, sailing from New York, May 31. The Disciples of Christ will have fourteen delegates on the floor of this conference.

It is heartening to receive the reports of our foreign secretaries, telling us that our offerings are increasing each week over the corresponding weeks of last year. No more convincing demonstration of the deep-rootedness of the missionary motive in the conscience of our people could be suggested than for us to break our Centennial record in giving. With the rest of Christendom let the year 1910 be a great missionary year among the Disciples!

The new graded courses will do away with the evil practice of trying to stretch the child to an impossible lesson, because they are carefully adapted to the capacity and needs of those for whom they were prepared. Their adoption by the school makes easier work for the teacher, and makes teaching effective.

The Kind of Convention We Need

It is becoming a matter of current comment among the Disciples that the machinery of our general conventions is greatly in need of reorganization. The present plan is too ineffective and cumbersome. It gives no adequate opportunity for the Disciples as a body of people to express themselves upon any question. Even the technical missionary themes which fall appropriately under the different conventions that now gather, do not represent the brotherhood, but only those Disciples who happen to be present or those who constitute the special membership of the board whose convention happens to be in session.

This weakness in our plans for conventions was perhaps inevitable in a time when our numbers were few and our suspicions of any kind of organization had been excited by the experience of other religious bodies, but this period has been outgrown both by us and our religious neighbors. Several of the latter have of late made no little progress toward the unification of all their missionary and philanthropic interest. There is not one of which we know that is attempting to do business with the loose and disconnected plan which the Disciples still employ. Every other religious body of any size and importance has one central and all inclusive convention to which its various organizations make their reports. The latest addition to the long list of such steps toward unity and effectiveness was taken by the Northern Baptist Convention last year in its splendid improvement made over the previous incoherent gatherings to which it had been accustomed.

Several of our state conventions are becoming conscious of the need not only of a unified gathering which most of them have long possessed, but in addition a representative gathering made up of delegates from the different sections of the state. This movement is spreading and ere long it will probably include all of our state conventions. The logical sequence of such a plan is the organization of a single national convention for the brotherhood to which all of our missionary and benevolent institutions shall be reporting bodies.

It is becoming increasingly apparent that the Disciples have no general gathering that is competent to transact any business in the name of the brotherhood. Our annual gatherings are a succession of different conventions. First, there is the convention of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, which admirably represents a large missionary and educational work. Then there is the convention of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, which reports upon the work of that far-reaching and splendidly planned enterprise. Then there follows the convention of the American Christian Missionary Society, which is, by its nature and organization, the administrator of missionary work on the American field. These three conventions follow each other in separate sessions. Each of them still retains some more or less definite form of membership, but in the case of the Foreign and Home societies this is hardly more than an amiable fiction, the survival of a time in which membership was conditioned upon the payment of fixed fees. This plan has now been abandoned for the most part, and in reality each of three conventions is a mass-meeting of anybody who chooses to attend, and all the business transacted is the product of this wholly irresponsible gathering of people. It represents nobody except those present, except by another harmless fiction that these people speak for their churches. But if any action should be taken by the convention which any particular church did not approve, it has only to say, "We were not represented in the decision reached and shall disregard it." Meantime, there is no moment during the entire series of conventions when the Disciples of Christ are actually in convention assembled, with any power to transact business that represents the brotherhood.

As the result of this chaotic condition a number of interests that really require consideration and have looked about for some gathering to which they might make report, have been at last compelled to seek sheltering recognition under the broad and perilously-stretched mantle of the American Christian Missionary Society. We have gone on adding to the number of these suppliants until the original organizers of the Society would hardly recognize half of them as in any manner relevant to the original tasks of the organization. And yet they all of them require some method of expression. It is perfectly evident that we need a Board of Ministerial Relief, a Board of Christian Education, a Board of Publication, a Board of Temperance, a Board of Sunday School Promotion, a Board of Evangelism, and who knows what more? But these have no legitimate place in the sessions of the American Christian Missionary Society, because their work is separate, and it is only by a wholly undue extension of interests that the one organization is made to stand sponsor for so many different causes.

The Disciples have recently been surprised and delighted at a splendid gift of Mr. Long which contemplates a publishing house for the entire brotherhood. The far-reaching influences of such a movement can only be partially realized by even the most prophetic at the present time. But it is clear that the long vexed question with which a representative committee wrestled in vain has been solved in its initial stage at least, by the heroic and effective plan of simply beginning the enterprise.

But instantly there is presented the difficulty inherent in our loose and ineffective plan of organization. There is no convention of the Disciples that can take action upon Mr. Long's proposition. He is offering to the brotherhood a gift of splendid proportion, but neither the American Christian Missionary Society, the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, the Christian Woman's Board of Missions nor any other present institution among us can accept the gift. In other words, the Disciples have no way of responding to Mr. Long except through individual expression of appreciation.

Nothing could illustrate more forcibly our need of a delegate and representative convention that would actually transact business in the name of the brotherhood and therefore be something more than the local group assembled or the body of members constituted by the payment of money to a missionary cause. The Disciples are old enough now, having reached the beginning of their second century of history, to begin to do business on twentieth century principles and not be hindered by antiquated methods which prevent effectiveness and coherence.

Forgiveness

It is the strong who forgive. Bitterness and wrath and malice inhere in the weak character. Where forgiveness is regarded as a sign of cowardice, there brute force is more highly prized than moral worth. The forgiven person is admitted to spiritual companionship from which he has excluded himself by his own act. The strong man shares the moral purpose of God and when he forgives he helps another to share that purpose.

The moral quality of forgiveness is often obscured by the teachings of formalists and sentimentalists. The formalist believes that rules were not made for man but man for rules. For him forgiveness is a matter of legal technicalities and not of personal relation and moral insight. The theory becomes more important than the act. The sentimentalist never gets below the superficial emotions. He cannot understand that the worst sin is the consciousness of no sin. Hence he makes forgiveness too cheap and easy.

The forgiving spirit is active. It seeks opportunity to express itself. If a man does something that threatens to alienate him from us and destroy his usefulness, it becomes our business as disciples of the Lord to find out why he has acted in an unbrotherly way. Denunciation of him to the neighbors before we know his motives is not apt to lead him to repentance. It may be that he is ignorant and needs our instruction. If we once know his mind, we may not charge him with sin at all. Even if he has sinned, we can do him good only by being fair and sympathetic in our treatment of him.

Where there is honest difference of opinion as the morality of an act, there is need of an umpire whose judgment and integrity inspire confidence. The church that has in its membership, men whose decisions are an end of controversy, is a power for righteousness in its community. A church that has no men of this sort is probably a hindrance to the growth of Christian sentiment. He who will not seek the counsel of fair-minded men, but settles his quarrel without regard to its effect upon the church, lacks the spirit of a Christian.

Publicity is urged as one means of keeping the managers of great corporations from stealing. Few men like to be branded as thieves. Sound, public opinion makes most rascals uncomfortable when it is turned against them. The man who is indifferent to the criticisms of honest men is unfit for citizenship in a republic. And what shall we say of the man who pays no attention to the judgment of the church upon his conduct? If the church says that he has slandered his neighbor or insulted him, or injured him in any other way, it is no sign of superior wisdom that he disregards the admonitions addressed to him by the church. He is unfit to be a member of the church unless he has some respect for its judgment upon his life.

"We may observe that forgiveness of sin does not imply a change of heart or principle in the sinner." This sentence was written by an eminent Christian man, but he was not reasoning as a Christian when he wrote it. Sin separates a man from God. Forgiveness is restoration to God's companionship. How can a man whose motives are wrong walk with God? The sun riseth on the good and the evil and the rain falleth on the just and the unjust. The kindness of God is not withdrawn from the worst man. If we were fully civilized, we should be kind in the treatment of criminals, but that would not mean the running of the government to suit the notions of the criminals. The thief and the murderer must change their minds before they can share in the ideals of good citizens and be admitted to the responsibilities of citizenship. God invites us to be workers with him. He says to us that past sins need not deprive us of the blessing of his companionship. Faith is the sharing of God's purposes and, therefore, faith is essential to forgiveness.

It is no mystery that God forgives only those who forgive their brothers. The one who shows no mercy to his brother is hostile to the mind of God and cannot be admitted into the company of those who do the will of God. Men may whitewash crooks and thieves, but God does not pronounce a man right until he is right. The selfishness and cruelty of the servant who would not do unto his fellow servant as he asked that his lord do unto him, are matched in the lives of men who expect God to be forgiving to them while they are making merchandize of the virtue and happiness of human beings. Nothing could be more dangerous to morals than to teach that God forgives men of that sort. The king of the parable did not know the heart of his servant at first and therefore cancelled the debt. God knows the heart and does not need to call us back for a second trial.

Biblical Problems

By Professor Willett

My interest in social problems leads me to make an inquiry or two à propos of your reports and discussions about the Pittsburg centennial. If you keep in touch with charitable (I prefer the term Christian) work you know of the conditions revealed by the investigations made and published by the "Survey" about social and industrial conditions in Pittsburg. These are almost unspeakably bad, and Christian civilization is the cause of them. What effect will the church's gatherings have on the city? Will these conditions be improved? What will the partaking of the "Supper" in such a public way do to relieve matters either in Pittsburg or elsewhere? If nothing, what is the real good accomplished? B.

Several answers might be made to the foregoing question. It might easily be said that the purpose of the convention was not to study local conditions, but to celebrate an interesting historical event on its anniversary. It might be said that very few of the visitors to the convention had any proper training in social activities such as would have made them competent either to investigate social conditions wisely or to render any immediate service during their presence in the city. But for ourselves, we should be satisfied with neither of these answers. And we believe the questioner has struck a very important fact in connection with the disposition and habits of the Disciples. We can hardly doubt that for the most part those who were in attendance at Pittsburg were wholly unconscious either of the social condition of that great manufacturing center or of the fact that there had been recently carried through a great inquiry into its condition and a most startling presentation of the facts. There are a few of our people who have really concerned themselves with social inquiries. But the most of us have been interested with other matters, and we are not prepared to deny that many of these other things have been of trivial importance as compared with the problem of human betterment. We believe that the Disciples are awaking to a new sense of responsibility regarding the conditions of the laboring classes, the employers of labor, the housing of the poor, the saving of childhood, and the related questions which are becoming so imperious in our day. We believe that long before another centennial can be celebrated by the Disciples, they will have become keenly sensitive to the application of the Gospel to present and pressing social conditions.

In Genesis 37, where Joseph's brothers try to get rid of him, it says that a company of Midianite merchants rescued him from the pit and sold him to a company of Ishmaelites. In the same chapter it says that the Midianites sold him into Egypt to Potiphar, an Egyptian captain of the guards. This confused me when I read it. F. M. G.

The difference is easily accounted for by the recognition of the two documents which are woven together in the entire narrative. In one Joseph was placed by his brethren in a pit and was stolen away unknown to them by passing Midianites who took him to Egypt. In the other he was sold by his brothers to a company of Ishmaelites for twenty pieces of silver, and by them was brought to Egypt and sold to Potiphar. The analysis of the two documents will be found in any modern commentary on Genesis.

Why They Tire

A Discerning Reader's Analysis of the Pastor's Tragedy

By Rev. B. A. Abbott

Your recent editorial, "Does the Preacher Know?" opens several questions of primary importance, which, it seems to me, both preacher and people should ponder deeply. They are questions that lie at the base of the church's welfare.

It ought to be recognized that the state of the church is a sad one when there is a chronic feeling of dissatisfaction with the ministers if not open criticism of them, or when ministers feel cold toward their congregations or misfit in their places. If actually realized, life has no more beautiful nor useful relationship than that of pastor and people. The pastor is minister in all needed things of the heart and spirit. He breaks the bread of life to young and old. He watches as one who must give account for souls. He is friend, counsellor, advisor to people in darkness and trouble. In all the great and mystic hours of life he is present with words heavenly and sacramental. He is the representative of God in the impartation of baptism to souls entering the new life. He touches with heaven's blessings the hands clasped above the marriage altar. He helps the overburdened heart to keep the long and tender vigil over the sick. He buries those who have fallen asleep and utters about the grave words of deathless hope and eternal promises learned by him so well in many a conflict with sorrow and death. His people are to him more than friends or neighbors. His church is his home, the people his family. When criticism, dissatisfaction, or distrust breaks in upon such a relationship it is nothing less than a tragedy. For it not only tends to destroy the peace and power of th minister but it surely blights the spiritual life of the congregation. The loss of faith in ministers would destroy Christianity.

Causes of Discontent.

The causes of discontent—where it exists—are generally not on the surface and their classification is difficult. It must be partly due to the inevitable readjustments that come as the results of the growth of life. It is part of the pathos of progress. It is hard for many people who knew the church-life twenty-five years ago to realize that the church today has contact with a totally different environment and must therefore pursue her way with different tactics. To some of us the memory holds a sacred picture of the pastor of long ago. Time has softened and harmonized all lines and his face framed by the heart's workmanship looks out from the past perfect. It is the real idealized and the pastor of yesterday would have to be reconstructed if he could work well today.

Often the minister is too conservative, often—shall we say oftener?—he is too progressive. Now and then the methods of the world creep into the ways of the church and then the people grow restless because somehow everybody seems to have grown formal and cold. There is also a natural monotony which is perhaps more trying than all else. Human nature, even when touched by the redemptive power, is unable to endure it long when the music of life is attempted on one string. It is this which makes the appeal of the sensationalist so successful and leads the most self-contained to break out at certain times into actions unusual and indefensible. Monotony may cause moral hysteria as its extreme reaction. When the stress becomes too great people almost welcome a church quarrel. It is a change and the beginning of something new. The lack of some worthy and definite object of attainment robs the life of freshness, allows the church to drift, or settles upon it the paralysis of an ignoble ennui. And it must not be left out of the reckoning of such causes that individualism is ever a danger especially in democratic churches. All organization means compromise and self-limitation, and where these are denied and each one looks only upon his rights strife cannot fail to be the result. If the desire to enjoy instead of the desire to serve takes possession of the heart it becomes quarrelous, hard to satisfy, falsely critical, and ever spreads in the congregation the contagion of a deadening unrest. The church is syndicated spiritual life and there must be good dividends to each stockholder. It brings together all ages and conditions and each one has his rights. The chief problem of preaching lies here. In the same audience are the learned and the unlearned, the humble and the pedantic, the philosopher and he of untrained mental powers. All gather before one man to get a portion of the bread of life. The minister must not offend the strong and educated by giving too much milk to the babes nor starve the babes by preparing meat only for the strong. At no point should members of a congregation be more considerate of one another. The strong should bear the infirmities of the weak during the hour of the sacrament of preaching.

Freshness of Heart and Mind.

It is therefore plain that there is mucho to overcome to make things as they ought to be with churches and their ministers. What is needed to put things right is freshness of heart and mind—something like the dew upon the lilies—in pastor and people. Love can work miracles in this realm. No church which cultivates the spirit of love will have trouble with discontent. The minister's message will never fall on listless ears, and hearts will not become withered and dessicated. The church is, at least in its ideal form, organized love. And love is the great renewer—it recreates the whole race every few decades. It never cloys. It is likely that but few churches realize the degree in which they make or unmake the minister. The characteristics and ideals of the people are woven into the mental fabric of the minister. There are churches into which if a minister come it will make him great. If it is in him to grow the soil and atmosphere of such a brotherhood will make him grow. Their alertness, eager coöperation, the honor they show him, their spiritual aptitudes, their care for his intellectual life, for his heart life, and their care to give him opportunity to unlock all his powers of mind and heart speed him on to greatness and usefulness. There are other congregations into which if a minister come he is doomed to littleness as a leaf to decay. "Love makes the great and small."

The Sympathetic Mind.

The minister's attitude to new forms of truth should be hospitable and his hold upon the old genuine and sympathetic. Freshness is simply the old reappearing in new form in the new day. A minister is compelled to belong to all orders and schools of thought. He is sure to lose some one when he commits himself to one phase only of the truth or becomes a member of a coterie. Out of his heart must come forth things both new and old and the new are not mutually exclusive. the progressive and the conservative. The old reappears in the new and the new has its roots in the old. The true minister is conservative and progressive at once.

Contact with other minds is a spring of constant renewal. Some of the ways in which this comes are through reading, fellowship, travel, and hearing other men speak of their experiences out of the depth of their own lives. A church should send its minister to all important religious conventions. The gift to him of a trip to Europe every ten years will repay a thousandfold. The experience of Dr. R. S. Storrs, the famous Brooklyn preacher, is well known. Apparently his powers had spent themselves and he had come to the shady side of life, staid and dry, when he spent some time in Europe. Seeing other peoples, visiting libraries, cathedrals, museums and galleries, the fruit of the world's genius, fertilized his soul and it put forth new and undreamed of powers and made the last part of his ministry more satisfying than the first.

The Minister's Vacation.

The minister's vacation, if rightly used, is a source of freshness. "It knits up the raveled sleeve of care" and gives the tired brain, worn body and overstrained nerves the chance of recuperation. One of the chief dangers of the minister is moral overstrain. The bow remains elastic only if there are periods when it is unstrung. "St. John and the partridge" has a lesson as divine as "St. John and Cerinthus." When the minister returns with the breezes of the mountains about him, the cheer of the bird-song in his conversation, the sunniness of the open road in his disposition, or the many voices of the ocean singing through his life, people will be drawn to him and will feed their lives upon his life and words with unmixed joy.

The preaching which never wearies is of many varieties of statement, tones and passions, though there is always one idea at its base—as Beecher with his master-thought of the fatherhood of God, Brooks with his great conception of the fulness of life, and Robertson—that burning flame of almost seraphic fire—with the basic idea of sacrifice, each putting forth his message like a cut diamond with a thousand facets and each facet flashing forth truth. There are many kinds of preaching—such as the practical, the devotional, the philosophical, and the mystical—delivered in styles all along the gamut from the most quiet conversation up to the highly impassioned oratorical, and each has its own time and value. The kind of preaching that will hold people longest is the mystical. It comes from the great deep. The preacher hears voices like Joan of Arc on the hill beneath her "fairy tree," and tells others what the voices have said to his own soul. People will never tire of this. But perhaps it is not the best kind of preaching, for it will make meditative people rather than a people who charge upon the enemy, which is far more needed.

After all considerations, however, the congregation and the preacher that cloy upon each other will long be seen in the land. It is part of the story of the long endeavor after the music of human nature. But let none despair. St. Paul, the versatile and fiery, lived to have many of his own converts sicken of him and turn away; St. John, the divine, had his bitter enemies in his own churches; and Jesus, who spake as never man spake, had people to cry out against him even while he preached. Yet every one was a success.

The Ottoman Empire To-day

A Description of Social and Religious Conditions

By Edward A. Henry

The thorough-going transformation of a nation from one form of civilization to another is an event which has happened but few times in the history of the world. Perhaps the best known instance is the transformation of the age-long Japanese civilization of but thirty years ago into the civilization of the twentieth century "Yankee of the East." Few of us in America today realize that a similar transformation is now being worked out in the Ottoman Empire and, it should be said, this new reformation gives promise of having a far more important influence upon our own civilization than has the Japanese reform because the matter of religion is involved more deeply.

How Reforms Have Come in Turkey

Reforms, so-called, have been numerous and frequent in Turkey and, in every case, as insincerely attempted and as little enforced as they were numerous. Up to the summer of 1908 Abdul Hamid had ruled as absolute despot over his millions of subjects. Time and again news of some atrocious murder or some barbaric massacre reached the outer world and "the Powers" would demand a reform. This the wily Sultan always refused to grant until a black cannon muzzle threatened his palace. Then he would fall on his knees in mock humility, well knowing how to convince "the powers" that he was sincere this time, write the reform out on paper and deposit it in the waste paper basket as soon as the cannon's muzzle was turned away. Thus it happened that few if any changes ever took place in the empire except such as were the result of western enterprise or greed.

Church and State One

The Ottoman Empire has always been distinctly a religious state. Church and state were one. Mohammedanism was the state religion. This religion has never been what we would call an ethical religion. Especially is this true today. The man who would be a good Mohammedan must attend noonday prayer in the mosque on Friday, greet his fellow Mohammedan with "Salaam aleikum" (Peace be to you) and say his prayers toward Mecca at dawn and at sunset each day,—and these prayers consist of an elaborate ritual of repetitions and bowings—and, in addition to this, he must at least once in his life make the sacred pilgrimage to Mecca and his salvation is assured. He may steal, lie, and even commit murder upon any one not of his own clan, and in no way injure his reputation for piety and devotion. When we say that to be a good citizen of the Ottoman Empire was to be a good Mohammedan we see how small a place the Christian or Jew filled in this system.

The Result of a Fatalistic Belief

Under the old regime the natural attitude of mind of the native was fatalism. Religion taught that if a man conformed to the few things mentioned above he could do nothing more. All else is in the hand of Allah. So absolute was the power of the Sultan that there was no resisting it or altering it in any way. The best that a man could do was to resign himself to the inevitable. Hence all ambition was crushed out of the people. There were two classes of people in the empire, the Turk who ruled and the others who were ruled. No non-Turk could hold an office of any importance. Justice was quite unknown. The judges were Turks whose positions were purchased. The witnesses were the gold Napoleons (20 franc pieces). The granting of the constitution in the summer of 1908 was at first looked upon as another of these paper reforms, and some months after it went into force a very intelligent Arab said to the writer, "Oh, the Sultan no good. He very bad man. He give a constitution. Soon he take away constitution. We wish England or America or France or Germany or the devil himself come and rule over us instead of the Sultan."

But a New Day

But the new day had really dawned and the "Young Turk" party was present to enforce the new constitution and check the Sultan. Its power has been shown in the overthrow of Abdul Hamid and the elevation to his throne of a man who is absolutely under the control of the new party, who takes his throne under the terms of the new constitution, so making himself the servant of that document instead of its master. It is hard for us to realize how much this fact really means. The Sultan is no longer supreme. The constitution is above him and the essence of that constitution is found in the famous French motto of "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity." It is remarkable to observe how swiftly these magic words have flown to the most remote corners of the empire and reached people in the most humble walks of life, and how strange has been the meaning put into them.

Liberty, Equality, Fraternity

Liberty! It is a word to juggle with. To the Arab mind today it means relief from all restraint, legal or otherwise, in short, freedom to do absolutely as one pleases. On the railroad near Damascus last October the first strike in the Ottoman Empire was called. The men were trying out their new liberty. At Beirut last January the Jewish and Mohammedan students in the American College struck from going to classes in order to enforce their liberty from the rule making chapel attendance compulsory. The Koran forbids the drinking of alcoholic beverages. Liberty exempts one from all restraint and today tens of thousands of Mohammedans are drinking fiery liquor merely to enjoy their liberty. On every hand people are doing the most absurd things in an effort to find out if it is really true that they do have liberty. It is going to be a hard task to establish temperance in all things in the face of this sudden breaking away of all restraint, including that of religion, for liberty, say they, exempts one from all restraint. They fail utterly to perceive the distinction between liberty and license and in that they are not so far behind many in our own land either.

Equality has not yet taken on any definite meaning in their mind, but how soon it will take on some fantastic meaning remains to be seen.

Bars of Division Removed.

Fraternity! To prove it the Mohammedan is going about greeting the Jew and the Christian with "Salaam aleikum," the greeting which has always heretofore been reserved for the faithful. Everywhere the bars of division between Mohammedan and non-Mohammedan are lowered. The temple area at Jerusalem has been opened to all the world. The government at Constantinople has announced to Jews the world over that they will be given under the Turkish flag a liberty which they have never enjoyed elsewhere. Every assistance is given to colonies of Jews who will settle in Palestine or in Mesopotamia. The Jew is no longer the despised alien, but he is addressed as "brother" and treated as such. The new constitution puts Mohammedan, Jew and Christian all on the same footing before the law and guarantees to them a kind of law which we would recognize as such.

In short, the meaning of all this is that western ideas are permeating the whole nation. Mohammedanism, for centuries the chief contender against Christianity for world supremacy, loses its state backing in very large measure and how long it will be able to endure in a fair and open field remains to be seen and is fraught with tremendous importance to the western world. The whole empire with its almost unknown but certainly vast material resources is thrown open to western exploitation. Turkey is studying the west and trying with considerable promise of success to put on western civilization as its men and women are putting on western dress. The "sick nation" of Europe bids fair to become one of the great powers of the world within a generation or two.

THE LITTLE PEOPLE.

The little people are the bloom
That fills the house and crowds the room;
The little people are the sweet
That throngs the valleys and the street,
And every place, in sea and air,
The little people crowd us there,
Because we love them too and say:
"Let us go, Lord, but let them stay."

Religion and Education

The Work of the Religious Education Association

By Henry F. Cope

One might well expect that a great organization having an aim which should fire the imagination of every patriotic and religious person would immediately obtain a grip on the popular imagination. Surely when you talk about saving our colleges from godlessness, our students from irreligion, our schools from immorality and making our present splendid educational machinery effective in producing worthy manhood and womanhood you have set up a standard that ought to rally to itself every honest man and woman in the land. That would have been the case if the Religious Education Association had been content with a popular crusade. But since it has chosen rather to work, not for passing enthusiasm, but for enduring success, since it has planned for that which if done at all must be done with the greatest care as to fundamental principles, working not for an hour or a year but for many years, it makes an appeal that does not seem to quicken public enthusiasm in any large way.

Henry F. Cope

Difficult to Work for Ideal.

It is far easier to secure fifty thousand dollars to erect a building than to secure five hundred for the popularising of an ideal. The ideal may determine characters, may build the houses not made with hands, eternal; but it is the thing, concrete and perishing, that which you can see, that appeals to the man on the street. Another difficulty, only one out of many, faces the man or womanwho would labor in the realm of ideals. If your business if that of laying bricks, articulating them with mortar, you know just what you have accomplished at the end of each day, but it is quite another matter to measure accomplishments if your business is that of laying precept upon precept, raising popular standards, creating higher ideals and stimulating the public conscience. Only a short sighted materialist, who thinks only in avoirdupois will ask you to point to concrete results. By the time such results have become concrete they have passed out of immediate touch with you in the realm of ideals. At any rate the man on the street is not very likely to see the connection between Dante and United Italy for example.

Materialistic Conceit.

Not long ago a Chicago banker said, "All this talk about educational improvement is too much in the upper ether; I am busy feeding the hungry and clothing the naked". He made the prime and plausible error of thinking it more practical to paint the pump than to purify the well. The superficial endeavor patching here and painting there, always will be the most popular; but someone must get back of it and do the radical work at the sources. Someone must ask, "Why are children naked and hungry? How can we save the children of the future from such a fate? Someone must meet our social problem not only with ordinances, regulations and legislations, but with root remedies, with that which takes the disease in the system and eradicates it. So also with our churches, someone must get back to tricks and devices to stimulate a declining power and interest and back of superficial difficulties of the sloth that prevents the cooperation of the laity and the conditions that keep down the supply of men for the ministry and ask, what are the fundamental principles on which the work of the church must be conducted? what are the final causes of any decay or failure? how may we adequately meet the needs of our day? In a word someone must look far enough and deep enough to get back of the causes of social disorder and suffering and of religious inefficiency and insufficiency and to discover the ways by which men may learn the art of right living and the churches and schools may cooperate in leading to sufficiency for all the fulness of living, leading lives into their full possibilities.

Ideal and Practical.

And as fundamental principles are discovered and stated others must plan their practical application. This is the task which the Religious Education Association has before it, so to study the educational religious needs of our day as to make education religious in aim, spiritual in ultimate purpose, and to lead the agencies of religion to educational efficiency for their purposes. Now, despite what has been said of the difficulty of measuring such work, it is quite fair to ask whether this great Association, with its hundreds of educational and religious leaders—the best in the land—its many conventions, conferences, publications and other activities, has really accomplished anything, has made any definite, specific and helpful contribution to the solution of our religious-educational problems?

What the Association Has Done.

The best thing the Association had done, though many will easily lose sight of this as contrasted with some other accomplishments. The purpose of the Religious Education Association is to bring together the many persons who are interested in the questions of religious education. Through its membership and meetings it has gathered on one platform of co-operative service, the university faculties, the public educators, the Sunday school teachers, the pastors and the workers in many other religious and social agencies.

Never before had this been done. Trained experts, leaders in the great schools have come to the aid of the Sunday school; each has learned from the other. The best that everyone had, through investigation, study or experience, has been made the property of all down to the very lowliest.

It means a tremendous increment of power to associate scattered forces. Energies likely otherwise to be dissipated are here, through this organization focussed on specific phases of the great problems. One convention and conference after another turns its attention to this or the other special subject. Where so many who have long labored with the real difficulties, who toil with painstaking accuracy in investigations and experiments and who view the problems from the high ground of trained powers, where so many who are authorities, men of light and leading concentrate on such questions, light at length breaks through.

Difficulties that seemed insuperable are dissolved. Specifically some of the problems attacked, those in which the advance is a matter of general popular knowledge already, are: the gradation of Sunday schools and their curricula, the larger and more adequate training of teachers, the technical training of hygiene, social living and morality in the schools, the moral conditions of student life in the colleges.

Affected Public Opinion.

This Association has served also to stimulate public thinking by calling attention to the need of moral and religious training. Few will question the statement that but a short time ago there was danger that we would become so absorbed with the intellectual and informational ideals in popular education and with the Teutonic ideals of the laboratory and the specialist in higher education that we would lose sight altogether of the primacy of character development through these agencies. We were in danger of training keen minds, loaded with information but lacking in moral perception, in conscience, ethical judgment and ideal purposes in life. Now, after much agitation and discussion,the one absorbing, all-dominating question in education is, not can we raise the standards, or widen the curricula, but how can we make all our agencies, institutions, activities, disciples, and curricula effective for the development of worthy manhood and womanhood?

The educators are catching almost universally the religious spirit and conceiving their work as spiritual. From the public school teacher to the university president this is the great question, how can we foster, develope and conserve the religious values in educational life, keep our young people godly and deepen their piety and their religious social usefulness.

Whether we realize it or not we are now in the midst of a remarkable revival, an awakening of all our educational and religious forces to the keenest interest in the question of character and its development, and an entirely new interest exists, and we find every where the atmosphere of eager inquiry for the best methods in moral and religious training, and this is the revival for which the Religious Education Association is responsible.

Help for all Workers.

When you get below the surface tide of a great movement you meet a thousand questions of method. The tremendous purposes of religious education are to be accomplished by the use of right methods. The teacher, the preacher, the parent or whoever may be engaged in this work, will want to know as to forms of organization, text books, materials of instruction, disciplines and activities. The Religious Education Association has been steadily engaged in rendering assistance in this particular. It maintains at its office in Chicago (at 72 E. Madison Street) a Bureau of information. Here thousands of inquiries come, from all over the world, as to methods and material in every aspect of moral and religious training. The office also has a splendid Library and Exhibit; perhaps the Library is the largest in the world on its special subject, containing nearly two thousand books on religious education, including, of course many text books. From the material in this Library and Exhibit and by the aid of the officers of the Departments into which the work of the Association is divided the Secretary is able to answer inquiries, refer to literature, recommend—or otherwise—text books, suggest methods and be of practical aid to those who are meeting the real problems at first hand.

All Sunday-school workers and teachers of religion are invited to visit these rooms and avail themselves of the material and expert advice here to be had.

Our Readers' Opinions

The Baptism Question

Editors Christian Century: I notice that the old baptismal question reappears in your paper, and I see you are trying to be perfectly fair about it. Let us give out another link. Let us widen the frontage to the problem, for neither "baptism" nor the question whether Christ ever enjoined it at all, or if he did, whether he intended it to be a perpetual and personal fiat, nor yet whether there is an immersionist conscience is vital; but the more real and awful question is whether any church among so many other equal sects, has the right to remove baptism from its realm in the individual's own conscience.

Higher in importance is the attitude it requires of us toward the unimmersed with whom we meet to sing and pray and commune on equal terms of Christian fellowship, and then stand them off on the "hand of fellowship," an invention of our own, and so do violence to the Holy Spirit and show duplicity in conduct.

The still higher question is should the religious bodies unite as contemplated in these discussions would they have any new power for healing the sore spots of the world, such as slave dealing, liquor dealing, and such like, which not one of them would so much as touch with its finger. What is to be expected of broken and decaying reeds even should you unite them?

Is not this the great and real question?

Mishawaka, Ind. EMILY WRIGHT.

Editors Christian Century: I have read your editorial on "A Plea for Immersion," in your issue of January 20. It is better yet than the editorial of last week. I want to thank you from the heart for these editorials. You have said in a clear and concise way the very things I believe and have not been able to fully express. You have in your summary of last week's editorial and in this week's issue defined what should be the real attitude of every preacher among us who dares preach Christian union.

You are doing a great work in pointing out the sectarian spirit that has so largely dominated us, but thanks be to God for the "silver strand" that has ever been true to our God-given mission, and which I believe must become a silver river, sweeping away dogmatism and making us indeed a free people. You are proving yourself sincere in your attitude on baptism, and likewise showing that there is a mission for such a paper as The Christian Century. You have my hearty sympathy in your efforts.

I might add that it is not the dogmatic evangelist alone who has the evangelistic spirit that enables him to reach men for Christ. WILLIAM J. LOCKHART.

"Where Am I At?"

Editors Christian Century: Iam quite anxious to have you locate me. If I am lost and going farther and father afield, I beg to be commanded to halt. If I am headed the right way a word of encouragement would be wholesome.

The article in the Century of December 30 on "Does the Preacher Know?" has caused me to think of a few things quite a little and hence this open letter of inquiry. You will pardon the personal pronoun so frequently in this letter, but it is about myself I am writing. I shall speak frankly and ask for a like reply.

I seem to be unable to classify myself when I read your statements. This may be due to two or three things. 1. I may be a little too dull to comprehend your phraseology fully. 2. You may be a little hazy and indefinite in your definitions and terms. 3. It may be a case of "Much ado about nothing"; i. e., much talk about a thing that really does not have much value in fact. I feel that all these are possible reasons why I do not know "where I am at".

That you may answer my query it will be necessary to say two things: 1. To state what I hold as convictions. 2. What I try to do, and do accomplish to a greater or less degree in preaching.

As to the convictions: I still believe and with increased firmness in the divine sonship of the Christ. I accept him still as the only prophet, priest and king of men. I preach that there is no other name given in heaven or among men whereby we must be saved. That whosoever hath the Son hath life and whosoever hath not the Son hath not life. I am still persuaded that God knew his business when he gave us the plan of redemption as outlined in the New Testament Scriptures. I accept the statement that holy men of old spoke as they were moved by the Holy Spirit. Also that this same statement applies to the New Testament writers. I think that it still pleases God that by the foolishness of preaching men shall be saved. I really think that the scripture is not mistaken when it says that God hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained whereof he hath given assurance to all men in that he hath raised him from the dead. That we shall give an account unto God of the deeds done in the body. That men build on the rock or on the sand as they hear and do or hear and do not the things taught by the Great Teacher. But that is perhaps enough of that part of the proposition. It possibly shows my tendency.

2. In my public proclamation I emphasize the things held, as stated above. This is not done every Sunday but when occasion comes for it. I study to bring all these fundamental things of the Gospel to an application to the life we now live and to every day life. I think I have been accused of being practical in my preaching more than any other one thing. I have also been charged by some "professional men" who have sat patiently while I have preached, with doing a oetter job of bringing current events in as illustrative matter and applying the Christian phase of them than any one else they had heard preach. I have books in my case from such men as Starbuck, Coe, DuBois, James, King, Rauschenbusch, Forsythe, Sabatier, Riis et al. I have read everything I can get in magazine and book on Social and Industrial situation. I also try to keep up-to-the-minute in the missionary enterprise of the church. I read the New York Independent thoroughly every week. I read the Christian Century, and the Christian Evangelist profitably and some of our other papers for amusment. As to training, I have two college diplomas, a B. L. from Central Ohio College and A. B. from Hiram and a summers work in Harvard University. In Christian Endeavor work I have traveled from Maine to Texas and sat in conversation with such men as Francis E. Clark, Wayland Hoyt, John Henry Barrows, David J. Burrell et al. But this is enough.

Now the query. Where am I at? Am I a modern preacher? Do I have a message for this generation of which I am a part? Is my "interprteation" of the Gospel correct? I might add that my highest ambition is to be a good, religious, practical preacher. I would rather preach, when prepared, than to eat. That says much in my case.

Millersburg, Ohio. C. A. FREER.

[We are glad to set the seal of our approval upon a pastor whose convictions are as sound and whose purposes are as sane and Christian, at once apostolic and modern, as Mr. Freer's. This kind of a self-analysis will do many a man good, and if we can be of service by making Our Readers' Opinions page a sort of confessional we will gladly lend the father confessor's ear to all comers. If we had no other data except that presented in Mr. Freer's honest description of himself we would surely pronounce him a modern preacher in the good sense. But we know too well what the fruits of his ministry are, and, judged by them he is evidently carrying the essential message of Christ in a very vitalizing manner into the lives of his people.—EDITORS.]

Is God Christ-like?

I am under obligations for the stimulating statement of Prof. Ames, and for the editorial expanding the same idea. Permit a few additional reflections from a different view point.

There is an element of solidity and reality in the editorial referred to, which is lacking in some other statements. The approach is interesting and helpful, though it seems to me it does not cover the whole ground I presume it does not pretend to. There are different ways of looking at the same thing. Human views of truth are like clouds meeting and melting about unchanging mountain peaks.

Is not God first? Does not the thought of God reach deepest into the soul? Is he not the all sustaining spirit that must be before Jesus or any thing else can be? It may all be due to training, but some how I think, that the idea of God if not innate is primal in the human soul. Belief in God does not depend upon Jesus but upon itself. This faith is in the soul like life is in the seed. Man has faith in God, because God has registered Himself in man, and this faith is uncreated, unsupported and self-sufficient. It appropriates to itself what ever extends its domain and enlarges its resources. It is as natural to the soul as perfume to the flower. From a human standpoint, this faith is the source of all our sacred literature. The Old Testament flows out of this heart of faith like a river from a fountain. Whatever the source or authorship of the pentateuch, its first line declares that in the beginning God created the heavens and the earth. Not only so but then grows up an elaborate religious institution, with God as its author and object, priest offering and temple all are declared to be the doings of Jehovah. It is futher true that a spirit of expectancy prevades much of the Old Testament writings. In the light of this supreme faith the man of God speaks of a great day when the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea. The Lord of Hosts is going to do all this. Moreover Jesus looks upon himself as the expected one and speaks repeatedly of the doings of God in the ages past. He presumes the existence of God in all his teachings. God is to Him the real, present friend. It seems never to enter His mind that any one should question the exceeding goodness of God. He says God loves the world and gives his Son as a gift to save men. Of course Jesus is the revelation of God, and our most adequate view of God comes from Him. Since he is the revelation of God and works in closest intimacy with Him, there is scarce room between the Father and the Son to insert the interrogation, is God like Christ? As well ask, is the perfume like the rose, is music like harmony.

Far, far down in the human soul, grows this fair flower of faith in God, the nearest and dearest possession of the human heart. The idea of God could come from no one but God. That man totally ignorant of God, and having no conception of Him, should struggle and strive and finally find Him, is unthinkable in the light of the statement that in Him we live and move and have our being. Our faith in Him depends not even upon Jesus, but upon the fact that "God has made us for Himself and our souls shall not rest until they rest in Him."

Pardon a personal memory. In my childhood, when I would cull over the word "life," a picture was presented to my mind, of a soft, spiritual, jelly-like substance. This image came from no where but my own mind. I am as sure of that as I am that I ever was a child. When I grew up, I learned that I had in mind, the image of the life cell, the beginning of life. It seems wonderful as I think of it now. The only reason I have for telling this strange story is that it is true. The idea of God is too vast and wonderful to be taught in a day or a generation. It was born with the soul.

"Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting.
The soul that rises with us, our life's star
Hath had elsewhere its setting
And cometh from afar."

If there is no God, we cannot make one, so there is no problem there. If there is one and he is unlike Jesus, all of us and Jesus too are lost, for we certainly cannot reform God. These are idle hypotheses. The radiant reality is that God and Jesus are one, and one could not be without the other. They are eternally one, and what God hath joined to Himself by His wondrous will of love, frail man shall never put asunder.

That Jesus put God to the test is a splendid statement, and hurries me to the further word that we have no problem in the case at all but a task like unto that of Jesus. "Hereby know we that we know Him if we keep His commandments." There are no problems but a vast deal of work to do. That magic word, work will make all difficulties plain that need explaining for us and roll away every stone from the sepulchre of the unknown, if we need it so.

Speaking seriously, I am not at all worried about God. There is plenty on earth to keep me employed for some years, and I must not leave my errand unfulfilled. This, my problem, is very near at hand. This reads like a joke, but I am not responsible for the joke. It is not my task to take care of God.

The first and second pages of the Century helped me. I am not seeking to answer them, save indirectly. I think I understand them. They made me think. This no doubt was their purpose. Jesus is final. He is the end of the law, the hope of earth and the joy of heaven, but He is final, because He is one with God, makes known the will of God and illustrates that will in the life beautiful. He is the one that should come, nor look we for another. Here we rest.

An Account of the English General Election

By Leslie W. Morgan

There is still but one topic: The General Election. Two days' pollings have taken place, involving 182 seats, and it will still be ten days more before the last returns are in. Were it not for the system of plural voting which is in vogue, it is probable that the desirable change would soon be made of holding the election in all parts of the country on the same day, as the general sentiment seems to favor that method. But with the property qualification for the voter, obviously it would be impossible for many voters to exercise their full franchise if they had to vote in all constituencies where they happen to hold property, on the same day. The Conservatives have made a gain of seats in the first two days' elections, over their record of 1906, when they were so severely routed, but the Liberals have won a majority of them. Both parties profess to be drawing comfort from the "excellent results." But it is vain to prophesy, for when this is read the result will be fully known.

Tariff Reform.

Joseph Chamberlain was the first to be returned to the new parliament, as he was unopposed in Birmingham. It might be reckoned as a gracious thing not to have opposed the apostle of tariff reform, considering the state of his health, which has been shattered since his campaign of four years ago in the interest of his latest hobby, were it not that the task was well counted a hopeless one. The "man" is supreme in his home town, whatever may be thought of his principles elsewhere. Mr. Balfour has gone over, bag and baggage, to the Chamberlain ideas of things. His statements are now in striking contrast to his hesitating utterances of four years ago. He is saying as clearly as a philosopher can say anything that he is a tariff reformer. And the Unionists as a whole are explaining all their victories by acclaiming the merits of tariff reform, and explaining all their defeats on some other ground. Personally I believe that if this were the only issue, the Conservatives would win,—and the whole country live to regret the day when an increased duty was added to food, and a beginning made in the taxation of other imports. When the United States begins to place a duty on goods sent from North to South, or vice versa, or from state to state, it will then be time enough to sight America as an example of prosperity from a high tariff.

A Great Preacher in Politics.

The Rev. C. Sylvester Horne has been returned as one of the members of Parliament for Ipswich. Mr. Horne is minister of the Congregational Central Mission in London, located at Whitfield's Tabernacle, Tottenham Court Road, W. He made a great fight, and was returned by a handsome majority Mr. Horne has been for several years, together with Dr. Clifford, a leader among the Free Churches in their campaign for religious liberty. He is a good preacher, but a more striking speaker when he appears as a platform orator. I frequently have the pleasure of golfing with him and shall hope soon to interview him for the benefit of Christian Century readers. Will Crooks, the Labor representative for Woolwich, has been defeated, much to the regret of his party and the Liberals as well. But another seat will doubtless be found for him in an early by-election in some other constituency. Mr. Crooks only returned from a world-tour two days before the election came on, and doubtless this had much to do with his defeat, which was by but a small margin. The Naval Yards are at Woolwich, and lack of employment, together with the insane cry for a stronger navy had much to do with the result. May the time come when to win elections the various parties will have to at least claim to favor peace and reduction of armaments, rather than the reverse, in order to win!

"The Culprit of the Hour"?

Nearly all the invective is still leveled against Mr. Lloyd George, who is counted by the opposition as the culprit of the hour. It is clearly shown that he is the most feared man on the government side, although they cannot say enough about his infallibility and weakness. The following from the Daily Telegraph is a sample of their way of putting it: "Referring to a letter in their correspondence columns, the editor says the writer is endeavoring to drive home the same things "as we have done since the fight was forced upon the country by that combination of ignorance, ambition and class hatred which is concentrated in the political individuality of Mr. Lloyd-George. We allude to the Chancellor of the Exchequer purposely, because his colleagues are but puppets in his hands. The elector who votes radical today, or on any subsequent day, votes for the unqualified and unrestricted dictatorship of Mr. Lloyd-George. And in giving a blank cheque to the chancellor of the exchequer he is lending his assistance to class hatred of the bitterest kind; to sectarian antipathies, which have ever been the cruelest scourge of humanity; to a predatory policy which robs the rich without alleviating the proverty of the very poor, and which is bound sooner or later to scare capital out of the country; to a credulous and improvident pacificism which invites attack and invasion; to a system of finance which, wherever tried has proved fatal to security, credit and confidence."

A Tireless Worker.

I heard Mr. George a few evenings ago, when speaking at a crowded meeting held at West London Tabernacle, one of our own London churches. In spite of the fact that he has been speaking all over the country for weeks, sometimes at several meetings on the same evening, and had indeed spoken at one already that evening and had yet an over-flow meeting to adress, he spoke with great freedom and virility. However, he was evidently tired. Referring to Woman's Suffrage he said: "Don't let a few hysterical women (Suffragettes) blind your judgment." He is a staunch friend of the cause, in spite of having been worried more, except Mr. Asquith, than any other member of the government, by their persistent clatter at public meetings and elsewhere. Never was a speaker quicker at repartee than he. Speaking of the solid front presented for Liberalism by the principality of Wales, in sending up all 34 of her members to support the government in 1906, he proceeded to enumerate some of them as examples of men who would have no desire to ruin the country as was alleged by some against the Budget. A voice cried, "begin with Mr. George." The reply came like a flash: "No, don't begin with me, you will frighten the Lords at once; I am diluted by 33 others." On food taxes he said that men might do with less tobacco and less beer without absolutely ruining their health, but that no decent man could give less bread to his children. The country, he said, did not produce enough food for the consumption of the people, and that the advantage of free trade was that if there was a crop anywhere in the world, our open ports said, bring it here.

The Book World

THE PROMISE OF AMERICAN LIFE, by Herbert Croly. The author is a firm believer in American institutions. His interesting and scholarly volume is written as a criticism in the true sense of that term. It is not a faultfinding essay but a sober estimate of our worth and of our work and a judgment on what should be the trend taken at this time of national fermentation. Our institutions are found to have been built upon the ideas of individualistic democracy. Under the conditions environing the comparatively small population in a great and undeveloped country this was best, but now that we have grown great in population and development and more mature in institutions we face a new era and our individualistic democracy must be conditioned to meet it. Every system of life brings some inevitable ills but that does not wholly condemn the system. What we need to do is to consider the remedying of the ills not the destruction, iconoclastically, of the system. If that remedying requires a modification of the system of ideas and methods of life we should not shrink from the task. Such we must do to meet the new conditions of our social life. The new socialized life needs a social democracy. That social democracy will require a limitation of our old individualism, a demand that each shall live and work for the good of all, a subordination of selfish interests to social welfare. The author makes a critical study of our history and institutions and concludes that the problem centers about the accumulation and personal use of wealth. No uplift can come but by the uplifting of the citizenship. Democracy writes at the center of its creed that the citizenship can be uplifted through law and institutions but that both law and institution must be of and for the people. Thus by a steady and enlightened making of law in favor of all the people, by the abolition through law of all privilege and by the progressive education of all the people, will the promise of American life be fulfilled. (New York: Macmillan Company. 468 pages. $2.)

SOCIAL FORCES, by Dr. Edward T. Devine, Editor of the Survey, Professor of Social Economy at Columbia University, and Secretary of the New York Charity Organization Society. One of the most timely magazines of the time is The Survey. It surveys the whole social field from week to week and gives account of all the activities of social service as well as pressing those needs that have not been met. Dr. Devine is the Editor and Graham Taylor is Associate Editor. This volume is a selection of twenty-five of the most striking of Dr. Devine's leading editorials, printed each week under the title of Social Forces. They are interpretations and are among the most widely quoted and timely of all current editorial expression. They embody this social leader's working ideas of the work given us to do to right wrongs and give every man a chance. It pleads for the social prophylactic—the prevention of disease and misery as the royal road to the cure of human ills and the cleansing of social corruption by cleansing the sources from which it flows. Charity becomes a science set on fire with an enthusiasm for humanity, a religion of efficiency which begins its work of love before the seeds of distress are sown, a discipline that does not wait until the horse is stolen, but both locks the door and seeks out the things that make thieves. The "preventorium" is the new phase of institutional building and it seeks to cleanse moral as well as physical cesspools in order that all may have a chance to do right as well as to keep well. There is a religious meditation and a sermon as well in every one of these practical sociological essays. (New York: Charities Publication Committee. 226 pages. $1.25, postpaid.)

SOCIAL SERVICE, by Louis F. Post, Editor of The Public. Louis F. Post is one of the modern-day prophets. He is one of the ablest advocates of Henry George's Single Tax idea living, but quite aside from his advocacy of that particular school of economy and political science, he is a prophet of the democracy that is to be. This volume is a treatise on political economy, but it is not the "dry-as-dust" variety for Mr. Post belongs to the van-guard of those thinkers who make political economy a social science in which the main consideration is not property but men. Property is but the prop to the house but it is the prop to the house and without it the house goes down in ruins. Two friends meet daily for luncheon and one of them leads the conversation in a sort of "autocrat at the breakfast table" style and beginning at the food placed before them follows it out to its sources and through all its processes and their contingent services until the problems of social service as embodied in the customary activities of trade and commerce, production and industry are discussed in an illuminating way and their bearings on the problems of the day and those of essential living and working are shown. It is a book for close thinking but not out of range of the ordinary thinker. (New York: A. Wessels. 361 pages. $1, net.)

THE FOREIGNER, by Ralph Conner, is a book which takes its place with the best of Mr. Conner's stories. It presents the Slavic people of Canada to the reader in the most vivid and lifelike form; and though there is no attempt made to hide the strong tendencies of those people toward drinking and fighting, the better sides of Slavic life are prominently considered. Throbbing under the story are the currents of Nihilist passion and blood revenge which open to us the great problem of Russia. A Nihilist leader, escaped from Siberia, finds his children in Canada in the power of the man whose treachery has cost him freedom, family—almost his life. His revenge is hindered and thwarted by the law of the new land, and is passed on to the son, whose struggles between this duty, as it seems to him, his racial beliefs and tendencies, his Canadian influences, and those of a few good friends, form the theme of the book. The boy's fights for decency, honor, self-realization and love, against the traditions of his race are stirringly and convincingly told, and the time spent in watching that struggle could hardly be more profitably or entertainingly spent. (New York: George H. Doran Co. Pp. 384. $1.50.)

WAR ON THE WHITE SLAVE TRADE, edited by Ernest A. Bell, B. A., and containing chapters by U. S. District Attorney Edward W. Sims, Special Prosecutor Clifford G. Roe, Charles N. Crittendon, and other authorities. This is a book for adults and sober minds only. It tells the story of the most unspeakably vile and indefensible traffic of our time. The editor, Mr. Bell, is one of the most consecrated missioners that honors any field of human labor. Messrs, Sims and Roe have roused the nation with their successful prosecutions of the "slavers" and now we are to have a national law that will be severe enough, it is hoped, to put an end to the horrible dealing in the bodies of the daughters of misfortune. The capture of the Dafours, a French couple who conducted a brothel in Chicago, the revelation of the extent and the almost unbelievable reality of the traffic in white slaves, the startling proof that they actually profited to the extent of more than $100,000 per year in their revolting trade, and their jumping of their bond of $26,500 and escape to France, so shocked the courts and officials as well as that part of the public that interests itself in human problems, that action commensurate to the crime was taken and under the new Illinois law many convictions have been procured and sentences given that would seem to deter. The book tells the story graphically and with all of Mr. Bell's earnestness. If any objection were made it would be that some of the stories of the victims are too graphic for the general public, but perhaps those who need to know could be told in no other way. (Chicago: Charles C. Thompson & Company. 481 pages. $1.50.)

EDUCATION IN THE FAR EAST, by Charles F. Thwing, president Western Reserve University. Dr. Thwing voyaged for a year in the Orient. Being an educator he studied the problem which gives title to this very readable book. His judgments are matured by long observation of both the problems of education and those of the far East. He pays just and liberal tribute to the worth of the Oriental and sees before the old East a new era. In the fashioning of that new era education is playing a major part. It is difficult to comprehend how such a book could be written, recognizing as it does the place and power of all civilization forming ideals and institutions of Christianity, and yet find but a paragraph, so to speak, devoted to the part played in the education of the far East by the missionary and his schools. When Oriental leaders like Okuma, Ito, Wu, Mozoomdar and many others pay their tribute to the missionary force in the great renaissance of the Orient, why should a conspicuous Christian educator like Dr. Thwing treat it with such modest reticence and tell us of all it has done without proclaiming that it did it. Tribute is paid to all the indirect forces of civilization that are operating powerfully to effect reforms and bring the people unconsciously to a new desire for modern life and the whole book bears the mark of a large minded man who observes closely, thinks wisely, and writes interestingly. (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Company. 277 pages. $1.50, net.)

ALCOHOL; HOW IT AFFECTS THE INDIVIDUAL, THE COMMUNITY, AND THE RACE, by Henry Smith Williams, M. D., LLD. This little book is written by a scientist. It is not a homily, but a treatise, the work of an investigator rather than that of a propogandist. But here scientific revelation proves to be a striking plea. But one lone word is left to be said for alcohol and that is that it has some of the elements of a food, and even this leg of hope is pulled from under when it is demonstrated that its food qualities are small and that other qualities more than render them useless besides adding unfailing harm. Alcohol is left in the plight of a disease germ that fails to harm only because the powers of resistance in its victim are so great as to overcome its baneful effects. It is found to be a depressant instead of a real stimulant. The scalpel and misroscope join the asylum and prison in their indictment of the "drug," alcohol. It is found to injure the body and the mind, the community and the race; in fact no good thing is found in it, and nearly all bad is incited by it. Every preacher, publicist, reformer, and indeed every citizen should read this informing little book. It is closely written, informing, readable and dispassionate. (The Century Co. 151 pages.)

EARNESTNESS.

Written for Christian Century by B. S. Ferrall.

If you do not know some things,—
Look them up.
Plan to catch them on the wing—
Look them up.
Make them yours without delay,
Put them in your mind to stay,
They will serve you well some day,
Look them up.

Facts were never made to keep,
Give them out.
You must sow if you would reap,
Give them out.
Bless the world with what you know,
Make it brighter here below,
There's no surer way to grow,
Give them out.

Don't attempt things for a day,
Keep them up.
Let folks know you've come to stay,
Keep them up.
Speak the truth till error falls,
Shatter superstition's walls,
Walk by faith till Jesus calls,
Keep it up.

The Question of Hair

BY FRANCES KINGDON.

Two or three seasons ago the mother of a prominent bride-elect sent to the various young women in charge of the society columns of the daily papers a detailed description of the wedding, just as the family wished to have it published. She asked that special importance be given the fact that the beautiful curls worn by the bride had belonged to her great-grandmother. The pride in this announcement was obviously justifiable. It was the day of artificial shop-curls, so when one could display natural ringlets with a pedigree, that only had to be taken out of an old chest and have the moth balls shaken from them, the occasion must be made the most of.

A fashionable bride of the present season, however, would not wear an ancestor's curls, no matter how fond she might be of "genuine antiques," because the edict has firmly gone forth from that relentless person or institution who dictates the fashions in hair dressing, that simple, plain effects must now be adopted. Banished to an empty drawer, are our formerly prized "rats," "rolls," "pompadours," "janes," "transformations" and "Psyche knots." A long braid wound flatly around the head is all the artificial aid allowed. This means, alas, that the "crowning glory" of the modern woman will not be her hair. When we can no longer use the Chinamen's locks, the thickness of European peasants, or the cleverly manufactured products of the department store, our own hirsute deficiencies will seem more appalling than ever.

No one disputes the fact that one of the greatest trials in the modern woman's life is her hair. To begin with, she has very little, and it is never the right color or texture. It is too dull, too lifeless, too dark, too light, too oily, too dry, too stringy, too coarse or, finally, too gray. Thousands of women all over the country are making a living because other women are dissatisfied with their hair. Sometimes these self-supporting women add to their income by mixing, in their kitchen or in a down town laboratory, a wonderful tonic for going, going, gone hair. Again they travel from house to house, with a small black box under their arms, which contains an electric battery for poor, frightened top knots. Most of these "specialists" have little shops where various methods—vibratory, massage, electricity or violet rays are employed, and orris root, oil and steam shampoos applied to defenceless heads.

Anything written on hair culture nowadays is most eagerly read, and it is doubtful if the discussion over the great White Plague is of more general importance to many readers. A new book on the subject, full of practical common sense advice has just been published by Juliet Marion Lee, who is a New York authority on hair culture.

"Bald heads and gray hairs," says Miss Lee, "are no longer indications ascribed to waning vitality or old age. The rush and nervous tension which are induced by our mannner of living is rapidly producing bald heads and bringing whitened hair to the comparatively young. Almost invariably falling hair is due either to local disturbance, ill health, or some other cause not immediately connected with the hair itself. Then the first step is to trace the trouble to its source and endeavor to correct it rather than waste time and money on 'tonics,' oils and nostrums that one is not assured of. There is not a tonic compounded which can produce a growth of figmented hair when the scalp is denuded in consequence of debilitated condition caused by insufficient nourishment, lack of proper blood circulation, and decrease of scalp tissue. Manipulative movements, or massage of the scalp, when intelligently and scientifically practiced, is the only reliable method which will absolutely restore a growth of figmented hair in cases of baldness, or give new life, lustre and softness to faded, wiry hair.

"Besides the massage, ventilation of the hair is of the greatest importance. To ventilate, proceed in the following manner: Remove the hair pins and shake the hair down, letting it hang loosely; spread the fingers of each hand and pass them into the hair on each side of the head above the ears; lift the hair from the scalp near the roots of the hair, backward and forward, and then upward until the fingers meet at the crown; repeat this movement several times, being sure to shake the hair gently to insure complete ventilation, then part the hair into strands, shake sideways and stroke downward; comb thoroughly with a coarse comb and braid loosely. The brush should be used slowly and never allowed to touch the scalp; its only use is to impart gloss and make the hair smooth. An hour's sun bath will do more to revivify the scalp and cause the hair to grow, than the use of an entire bottle of any known hair tonic. Cutting or clipping is also important, for keeping the hair moderately short adds to its thickness by causing the follicle to give to the short hairs the new growth and nutrition it needs.

"Premature gray hair is caused by dyspepsia in all its forms, debilitating diseases, excessive mental application, prolonged nervous strain and violent headaches. By first massaging the nead and fully restoring the blood circulation, so that the scalp is in a normal condition, the next treatment is to remove the sick hairs. When the new ones come in they will be the natural color. Sometimes two epilations will be necessary before the color is restored. When gray hair comes naturally, as it certainly will if one's life is prolonged, it is better to make a virtue of necessity, and gracefully accept the inevitable.

"In shampooing white hair, commence with lemon juice, that is,—strain the juice of a lemon into a cup, then pour in a little more boiling water than juice. When this liquid is cool enough to use, saturate the hair with it; let it remain on fifteen minutes, so as to remove yellow tinge from the hair. Never use dark colored soap on white hair, or apply oil. That blue-white or silvery tinge can be obtained by putting a few drops of liquid indigo into an atomizer and spraying the hair when it is perfectly clean and dry.

"A woman past fifty should never grieve over gray hair. It is a sign of wisdom, and by contrast and its reflected light the eyes appear brighter and darker, the complexion clearer and smoother."

The Question of Happiness

BY FRANCES KINGDON.

Two prosperous looking women were riding on the car the other day talking merrily of the little happenings which filled their lives and that of their neighbors when one of them began to relate the misfortunes of a poor family of her aquaintance. She was trying to interest her friend in the needy children, but three times her story was interupted by the other changing the subject and finally exclaiming: "Oh, don't tell me about such miserable people. I am sorry they are poor, of course, but some one will take care of them. I don't want to hear about unhappy people, for I've made up my mind not to recognize unhappiness or any of its claims. Trouble is an error anyway, and should not exist. Hereafter I shall only think happy thoughts, see pleasant plays, read jolly stories, cultivate optimistic people and sit in the sunshine."

This outlook on life, admirable in many ways, is now being adopted by numerous people. Everywhere you hear them talking about the right mental attitude, and wonderful indeed is the change taking place in the human mind. Hopefulness, optimism, serenity and poise are the good qualities desired. Seldom do you hear the modern woman acknowledge that she has the blues. It has become the fad to utterly eliminate those wily creatures from one's acquaintance. No longer is it considered quite the thing for men to talk about being financially embarrassed, hard up, economical or in any way lacking funds for the large enjoyment of life. Troubles with servants, dressmakers, landlords and other disturbing people are not to mentioned. The ills of the flesh have ceased to be a vitally interesting topic of conversation, and a prominent physician has just predicted in the newspapers that soon no one would ever think of mentioning illness in any form. In the future then we must only discuss the pleasant things of life and prosperous people, if we are to be happy. We must banish trouble, worry and illness from our minds and they will cease to exist, Ignore what we do not like and it immediately disappears from our horizon.

Perhaps this is a beautiful attitude to maintain, but we are human beings for all that. We are bound to have sad, gloomy hours and we will know discouragement and sorrow. Our lot in life is that of the average person—trouble is sure to come. Character is not developed by smiling placid indifference to fate. It is not brave to run away from unhappiness or disappointment and deny their very existence. Carlyle says, "The tendency to persevere, to persist in spite of discouragements and impossibilities—it is this that in all things distinguishes the strong soul from the weak." How can the world be made better or happier if each one shuts his eyes to the needs of his fellow creatures? We should look at life as it is, the beautiful and the ugly, and not according to some pretty theory that we like.

Sometimes even a skeleton may come to our door, but does it disappear because we look over, beyond or around it? Have we conquered it because we have returned its own blank gaze?

Our neighbor's trouble is going to be just as hard for her to bear even if we do refuse to recognize it, and perhaps more so. Injustice, crime and wrong will not cease to exist because we have ceased to think about "such unpleasant subjects." Our own sorrow will hurt deeply even if others deny its claim. We should prepare ourselves every day of our lives for the struggle that eventually will come.

"Perhaps you've had your troubles as every body will.
And may be that your bitter cup
Gave you pretty near your fill.
But it seems to me a fellow
Instead of feeling sore,
Ought to be some thankful
That it didn't hurt no more."

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 6.

Theme for the Day.

The outreaches of the mercy of God.

Scripture.

Wherefore also he is able to save unto the uttermost them that draw near unto God by him.—Heb. 7:25.

Lines.

He taught me all the mercy, for he showed me all the sin.
Now, though my lamp was lighted late,
there's One will let me in.
—Tennyson ("The May Queen").

Prayer.

We desire, O Father, to be in Thy holy Spirit on this holy day. We thank Thee for Christ, the Lamb of God, who bears away the sin of the world. May this good day witness the removal of our sin, through Thy forgiveness and our repentance. May we hide our fears and failures behind the Cross of Christ. May we enter Thy house today with thankfulness and the will to worship. And at the end of the way bring us to the House not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. Amen.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 7.

Theme for the Day.

The blessedness of daily work.

Scripture.

Man goeth forth unto his work, and to his labor until the evening.—Psalm 104:22.

Lines.

While the ploughman, near at hand,
Whistles o'er the furrow'd land,
And the milkmaid singeth blithe,
And the mower whets his scythe,
And every shepherd tells his tale,
Under the hawthorn in the dale.
—John Milton ("L'Allegro").

Prayer.

Good Father, Thou hast set before us a goodly heritage, and the lines are fallen to us in pleasant places. We have our daily work and our nightly rest, and blessings enough to make us ever grateful. Save us, we pray Thee, from discontent, from depression of spirit and from thanklessness. Make us strong and of good courage. Suffer us not to grow weary in our task, nor to faint in our pilgrimage. So shall we be fitted for higher blessings and nobler service in a world without end. Amen.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 8.

Theme for the Day.

The call to repentance.

Scripture.

In those days cometh John the Baptist preaching in the wilderness of Judea; saying, Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.—Matt. 3:1, 2.

Lines.

There burst he forth: "All ye, whose hopes rely
On God, with me amidst these deserts mourn;
Repent, repent, and from old errors turn."
Who listened to his voice, obeyed his cry?
Only the echoes, which he made relent,
Rung from their marble caves, "Repent, repent."
—Drummond of Hawthornden ("Sonnets").

Prayer.

Our Father, we thank Thee for the fearless preacher of the desert, and his trumpet call to repentance. We acknowledge our own deep need of such a message, the summons to the holy life. We have often made the mistake of expecting blessing from a change of circumstances, when we should have sought a change of character. We have often laid the blame of our failures upon our surroundings, rather than ourselves. Thou desirest truth in the inward parts. Purge us from all hypocrisy and self-deceit. Make us truly contrite, and forgive our sins. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 9.

Theme for the Day.

Man's powerlessness to escape death.

Scripture.

The grave hath enlarged her desire, and opened her mouth without measure; and their glory, and their multitude, and their pomp, and he that rejoiceth among them, descend into it.—Isa. 5:14.

Lines.

The glories of our blood and state
Are shadows, not substantial things;
There is no armor against fate;
Death lays his icy hand on kings.
—James Shirley ("A Dirge").

Prayer.

We worship Thee, O Lord, as the Master of life and death. We are helpless in the presence of the great enemy of man. But Thou hast turned our despair into confidence, our mourning into joy, by our Savior's victory over death. In calmness we can wait till our change shall come. We thank Thee for the aged men and women who tarry in life's evening for Thy salvation. For them at eventide it has become light. May we all so trust our Lord that we may be ever ready for the last mysterious journey, knowing that in the morning we shall meet Him face to face. Amen.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 10.

Theme for the Day.

Courage for the day's work.

Scripture.

Be strong, and of a good courage; be not affrighted, neither be thou dismayed; for Jehovah thy God is with thee.—Josh. 1:9.

Lines.

Be strong!
We are not here to play, to dream, to drift,
We have hard work to do, and loads to lift.
Shun not the struggle, face it, 'tis God's gift.
Be strong!
—Maltbie D. Babcock ("Be Strong").

Prayer.

Gracious God, we confess to Thee our faintheartedness and our unbelief. We have not yet fully learned to trust Thee, nor to have confidence in ourselves. We have too often fainted before our foes. Help us to face this day's temptations and duties in Thy strength. Let not the power of the enemy cast us down. Suffer us not to grow weary or discouraged. In thy might help us to be strong. And this we plead in the name of the Savior who died for us. Amen.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 11.

Theme for the Day.

The constancy of love.

Scripture.

Love never faileth.—I Cor. 13:8.

Lines.

Ay, and when prophecy her tale hath finished,
Knowledge hath faded from the trembling tongue,
Love shall survive, and love be undiminished;
Love be imperishable, love be young.
—F. W. H. Myers ("St. Paul").

Prayer.

Hear us in Thy mercy, O Father, when we approach Thee in prayer. We believe, help Thou our unbelief. We desire to love. Take Thou the stony heart out of our flesh, and give us the new heart, aflame with affection to Thee and all Thy children. Help us to know the joy there is in love, and its power to sustain us in the stress of life. Help us to love as Christ has loved us, even unto the end. And may we abide in his unchangeable love. Amen.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 12.

Theme for the Day.

The heavenly ladder.

Scripture.

Behold, a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven; and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it. And behold the Lord stood above it.—Gen. 28:12, 13.

Lines.

Heaven is not reached in a single bound,
But we build the ladder by which we rise
From the lowly earth to the vaulted skies;
And we mount to its summit round by round.
—J. G. Holland ("Gradatim").

Prayer.

Our Father, we have sinned against Thee. We deserve as little as Jacob of old to have the heavens opened before us. It is not fitting that any ladder of light should be reared from our side to the feet of God. Yet all this Thou hast done, and for us the way is opened into the holiest. May we take the way so provided through Jesus Christ our Lord, and come home to Thee. May heaven seem near to us, and our efforts to attain it ever more successful, till we enter through the gates into the city. Amen.

AT THE CHURCH

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The Rule of Gold and the Rule of Greed*

No one can read the Sermon on the Mount without being impressed by the form in which the teachings of Jesus were conveyed. Though he stood with the prophets of the Old Testament in the spirit of his teaching, yet in the forms into which he put it he seems to have the example of the wise men, the proverb makers, before his mind. These sages of the Old Testament packed away the experience of their generation into wise, witty, brief and pungent sayings that attracted attention as much by their form as their contents. It was this attractiveness that fastened the Proverbs in the memory of those who heard them, and thus they were treasured up in such collections as our Book of Proverbs.

Jesus' Proverbs.

Many of the most significant utterances of Jesus take this same proverb form. They are brief, pointed, often startling, either in their form or substance, and sure to make an impression upon those who heard them. Admirable examples of this are seen in the first, sixth and twelfth verses of the present lesson. In the first instance it is the constant play upon the word "judge" that forms the thrust of the saying. It makes an admirable and easily remembered proverb, bearing a whole volume of experience in it.

Similar, though still more intricate, is the second instance, the one given in verse 6. It arranges itself easily in four lines after this form:

"Give not that which is holy unto the dogs;
Neither cast your pearls before swine;
Lest they trample them under their feet;
Lest they turn again and rend you."

This was not only a proverb, it was a puzzle as well, such as the proverb-makers loved to devise, as notable examples in the book of Proverbs show. This is one of the rare instances in which Jesus employed it. But any one who reflects upon the habits of the beasts alluded to in the proverb sees at a glance that the saying does not make convincing sense in its present form. Swine do not rend the passers by, nor is it the fittest figure to speak of a dog as trampling things under his feet. Quite the opposite is the fact; swine trample, and dogs rend. It was, no doubt, this departure from the facts of experience which made the first hearers of the saying wonder what it meant. That teasing of the imagination which a perplexity always brings compelled reflection. And the result of pondering upon the proverb would bring out the fact, to a Jewish mind accustomed to these riddles, that the first and the last lines of the quatrain were to be construed together; likewise the two middle lines; and thus the proverb would read:

"Give not that which is holy unto the dogs
Lest they turn and rend you."
"Neither cast your pearls before swine
Lest they trample them under their feet."

In like manner, the closing verse of the lesson, which we are accustomed to call the Golden Rule, is an almost perfect proverb, and by its beauty both of form and sentiment has fixed itself in the mind of the world.

Unjust Judgments.

The radical difference between the teaching of Jesus and that of his contemporaries already noted in previous studies, is seen in increasing manner in this one. In the first section he teaches the danger of hasty and censorious judgment regarding the motives and conduct of other people. It requires very little capital to establish one's self in the business of a critic and fault-finder, and once the habit is gained, it is very easy to develop into harshness of judgment and sharpness of words. A disposition of this kind is increasingly incapable of discerning its own faults, but is quick to note those of others and pronounce upon them caustic sentence.

This habit constitutes a fault more despicable than most of those that it censures, for there can be few qualities of human nature more ungracious and disgraceful than that of cynical fault-finding, which is so easily practiced and so likely to mar a disposition and temper that might otherwise be graceful and attractive. It is not too much to say that this fault as compared with other errors of disposition is like a beam of timber as compared with a moat of dust. And no figure of speech that Jesus ever used was more telling and humorous than that of the man whose sight was completely obscured by a beam of this kind attempting to correct the slight visual defect of a man who had a bit of dust in his eye.

Asking and Receiving.

After speaking of the uselessness of attempting to teach people who pay no regard, or even turn with anger upon the teacher, in which speech Jesus may well have referred to his indifferent or hostile Pharisaic auditors, he turns to the great truth that all things are possible to him who has faith and perseverance. It seems like a very little thing to say, "Ask, and ye shall receive," but in reality it is one of the great teachings of our Lord. Coming in a time when might seemed to make right, and requests for justice were unheard, nothing seemed less convincing than such a statement. But Jesus looked with prophetic gaze into the heart of the universe, and in this word has announced to us, not his particular view of things, but that which in the nature of the case is proved by daily experience to be true.

The man who asks, does receive. The one who seeks, finds. To him who knocks, the door is opened. These are not words that can be tested by some brief and superficial experience, but in the give and take of life they prove themselves increasingly true. It is the man who asks not fully expecting to receive who is disappointed. It is the one who seeks in the half-hearted and doubtful way who fails to find. Such men invite defeat by their very timidity and hesitance. It takes courage and persistence to secure any desirable thing. For God is more anxious that we should have the really good things of life than we are to possess them. Only we frequently make the mistake of choosing the things which are of secondary sort, imagining that they are of real importance.

The Lust of Gold.

And perhaps there is no field in which importunate demand is more likely to find response than in that of the great social reforms which become increasingly desirable and necessary. Too long has the world been ruled not by the Golden Rule but by the rule of gold, and in nothing is this more evident in the dominance of an unscrupulous and impudent business like the liquor traffic, that demands all for itself regardless of its effects upon the community. No liquor dealer could stay in the business for a day if once the Golden Rule of doing to his fellow men as he would have them do to him got into his soul. For that principle destroys the unsocial and unneighborly disposition. And nothing could be less concerned for the welfare of one's fellow men than a business that persistently degrades the individual and the community.

We are taught by our Master in this same study not to judge one another, and probably many of the men who are promoting the degrading business of drunkard-making have been accustomed to consider it a harmless and necessary traffic. We need not judge them, except in the light of their effects upon the society in which we live. But we owe it both to ourselves and to them to make it increasingly impossible for them to carry on so dangerous and deadly a traffic. And while we are insisting upon their abandonment of their evil business, we must be equally ready to strike out from our own lives and dispositions anything that has the like unhappy result.

Certainty of Results.

And if, as the Master insists, the man that asks is to receive, then there is the strongest possible motive for our insistent demand that the saloon must go. We have no right either to question the result or to cease the effort. In the nature of the case the one who goes on repeating continuously the truth that temperance and sobriety are the ornaments of a people, and that drunkenness and drunkard-making are a public disgrace and menace, will win in the end. We have reason, therefore, to be thankful that there are so many agencies calling our attention to this crying demand of our day. Not one of them can be spared. Particularly is it satisfactory that the churches should be aroused by means of boards and committees on temperance, whose function it is to press upon the attention of all their people the sin of the saloon and the call to sobriety and prohibition. In the Board of Temperance organized by the Disciples of Christ we have such an agency, whose work is already beginning to tell in our churches. That all of these instruments for temperance education and the enforcement of temperance laws may work together, and so come the more rapidly to the great and desired end for which we ever pray, must be our hope and effort.

Bible Texts that Help Me. Psa. 119:97-104

By W. D. Endres

Notice the statement of the subject, "Bible Texts that Help Me." The practical service that it renders is what makes the Bible live. It is true of the Psalmist in this lesson. It was because that which he conceived to be the commandments of God's law enabled him to outwit his enemies, to surpass his seniors and his teachers in understanding, and to refrain his "feet from every evil way" that he exclaimed, "Oh, how I love thy law!" What sensible man would not prize highly precepts that could do so much.

For a similar reason we prize the messages, prophets and the precepts of our Lord today. They have a great deal of life with which to challenge the interest and thought of serious minded men. Those who are interested in making a life—and all the young are—care little about the geneological tables in the fifth and tenth chapters of Genesis but they read the life and study the ideals of Abraham with absorbing interest. Few are vitally interested in the tedious account of the numbering of the tribes but the farewell addresses of Moses and Joshua have much upon which we can meditate with great profit and delight.

So it is when we read for the one hundredth time that the king (giving his name) "did that which was evil in the sight of Jehovah." Your headache is scarcely endurable. But when you turn to the stirring messages of Amos, Hosea, Isaiah or some other of the prophets who lashed with a righteous wrath the immorality and tyranny of his day the soul is stirred and the impulse to live right and do right comes up anew. It helps. The same is true of the Psalms—the wisdom literature in general. Indeed it is not otherwise when we come to the literature of the New Testament. The genealogy of Jesus in the first chapter of Matthew may have some charm for the legalist or the theologian but the practical every-day men and women who are face to face with the problems of life are much more interested in what Jesus says. They are struck with his bold announcement, "I am the way, the truth and the life." "I came that they might have life, and may have it abundantly." Still more are they interested in the ideal of life which he presents in the Sermon on the Mount, where he seeks first of all to make right the heart—the source of all thought and action. To follow this ideal not only must the personal life be pure but the principle of justice must be extended to man's relations to his neighbor. Hence the golden rule. Here we behold his underlying life principles—love and patience, service and forgiveness—in a word the paramount issue in life is the kingdom of God. These are not only interesting but helpful yes indispensable standards to the one who is seeking to do the right thing in life. These are the Bible texts that help us all.

Silent Messengers of God

A Plea for a Religious Paper in Every Christian Home

By J. L. Garvin

[Sermon preached at the First Christian Church, December 12, 1909, at the morning service, by Joseph L. Garvin, minister, Seattle, Wash.]

Col. 4:16-17.—"And when this epistle hath been read among you, cause that it be read also in the church of the Laodiceans. And say to Archippus—'Take heed to the ministry which thou hath received in the Lord, that thou fulfill.'"

As we think of the Apostle Paul as the consecrated disciple of his Lord Jesus Christ; or the preacher who stood before the great men and the multitudes and declared the whole counsel of God; or as an evangelist, going from city to city, holding rallies and protracted meetings, winning large numbers to the cause of our Heavenly Father; or as a powerful defender of the Faith disputing with the Jews, learned Greeks and Romans of his day, let us not forget that he had his widest influence as an editor of a religious journal, and I speak it reverently.

The letters which he wrote the churches were the only religious journals that the world had in his day. His letters were to the members of the various churches what our religious journals are to us. These letters not only contain those inspiring religious messages which we all hold dear to-day, but news of the churches, doings of the workers, discussions about the missionary interests and on all the social and economic problems of the day. For this reason our purpose is to discuss the practical side of our spiritual life.

There is a burden upon the heart of every true minister. It is the burden of education of his people into the life, activities, duty and privileges of the Christian life. It is not the burden of inspiration but of information—of knowing the Lord and all that this knowledge means.

We do not get all our knowledge of the Christian life out of the Scriptures. We learn much from the lives of those other disciples who are working for the Master by our side or far away.

The available source of information of this nature is our national and sectional religious journals. The advice of George Washington to the people of his time was to promote as an object of primary importance the institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. Our publishing houses are such institutions in our movement.

Three important but old reasons urge the placing of a religious paper in every Christian home in the Northwest.

We need enlightenment. "Mix reading in along with your life. It will keep you from breaking down." Dire consequences attend the lack of knowledge. In the period before Samuel we read "there was no vision in those days and every man did what was right in his own eyes." This is modern in its application. Many families are lost to the useful life because they know not the loyalty and devotion of their brethren.

Isaiah interpreted his age well. "My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge. My people are gone into captivity for lack of knowledge. They have no knowledge that carry the wood of their graven image and pray unto a God that cannot save." One would think he was talking about the scattered disciples or unorganized groups in the Northwest.

Edison is the recognized authority on his subject. There is a reason! In his library at Orange, N. J., are sixty thousand volumes, which includes every journal dealing with scientific research published during the last forty years. Nothing in his line of study was published but he knew about it. He kept informed about the world's activities in his department.

"Reading maketh a full man." The more we know about our churches, ministers, workers, missions and missionaries, and all our enterprises as a religious people the better are we equipped to help our local work and the more inclined are we to do it. With such information the larger the universe becomes to us and the larger do we become to the universe. The papers meet the wants of the people and to a degree shape their wants until they do gladly the kind of work that their brethren are doing.

We need encouragement. Knowledge of what others are doing in the work in which we are interested always has the effect of encouragement. Sitting in his study working upon the message for his people, the pastor receives his weekly journal and reads what the brethren are doing throughout the world for Jesus Christ. The good news of their successes and devotions fill him with new courage and he feels like exclaiming with the psalmist "create within me a new heart and renew a right spirit within me," He returns to his task with vigor.

The faithful Christian struggling for the education of his children or the protection of his family ever is strengthened in his loyalty to the life revealed by his Lord Jesus Christ when around the table at night he reads aloud of the good news and enterprizes of other Christians brought to him by the silent guest.

The church is encouraged. The members are supported in their sacrifices and zealous work. The entire work is advanced by having the facts and accomplishments of communities, churches, individuals made known to the world by means of our religious journals. Every family should by all means have at least one such messenger coming weekly into the home.

"Put on the new man that is being renewed unto knowledge after the image of him that created him" advised the Apostle Paul. Taking a religious journal is one method for accomplishing this result.

We need enthusiasm. "Be not sluggish but imitators of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises." Reading of the deeds of others we are moved to go and do likewise. Learning that one group built a new church home, others catch the spirit also and behold the new home is soon after dedicated. Finding out that a small congregation gave liberally to the missionary undertakings, the large congregations are constrained to show their real worth also. It is catching-information of what others are continually doing for Jesus Christ.

The religious journal influences us to action as a torn and tattered portion of Cotton Matthews little book—"Essays to do Good" helped Benjamin Franklin into whose hands it had fallen. He said, "If ever I have been a useful citizen the public owes all the advantage of it to this little book."

Progress accompanies intelligence. Ye are my witnesses when ye have power was the admonition of Jesus. The man who knows will go ahead. The Northwest is suffering from the lack of knowledge of what we, as a people are planning and doing in the world.

Under the inspiration of these silent messengers of God coming with their weekly gift of knowledge revealing the plans, heralding the successes and binding us all together by the tie of fellowship in work and spirit each congregation will take on new life; members will grow in grace and the Cause will be materially advanced.

The speeches were the usual "keynotes" and "tocsins" sounded in such crises, and were listened to closely by all the great gathering—except the frivolous young persons enumerated—with that avidity for political discussion which is inherent in the emotional "Hoosiers" of both sexes and of all classes. They sat on the hard benches for hours, greeting the wit and humor, racy jokes and stories required to enlighten the long harangues, with loud applause and shouts of laughter—not a fact nor a figure failed of its effect.

Brainard presided well and gave that part of the meeting committed to his supervision a distinction of its own. He sat listening attentively to the lesser personages whom he introduced, among whom, as it befell, was Horace Bannister who, spurred by the presence of his rival, acquitted himself brilliantly. As B. F. Mullens said, Brainard was "in high feather" with the farmers, and many left the larger meeting to swell his smaller audience. Eleanor was with Miss Abigail, and as Brainard could see, was intensely interested in it all, and disposed to do justice even to Bannister.

There was an interval at noon for the picnic dinners, spread upon the grass, to be disposed of, and the speeches were then resumed. Not till the farmers who had cows to milk and stock to feed, and could not be persuaded by their disappointed women folk to stay to the torch-light procession and fire-works of the evening, hurried away to harness their teams for the long ride home, did the assembly show signs of dispersing.

Billy Mullens had been drinking steadily all day He was frenzied by the spectacle of Teddy Wilkins riding in the procession where he could keep the graceful Goddess of Liberty in full view, and he had seen from a distance the jolly picnic party at the fair grounds—Susan, Alonzo and the children, with Mary Benson still wearing her coquettish liberty-cap and seated in state on a cushion improvised from Teddy's best overcoat. The jealousy of Billy was so great that, weeks before, he would have persuaded Mary to elope with him across the state line where they could have been married under the laxer laws of Illinois. But she had publicly cut him and, at last confiding her difficulties to Eleanor, wisely persisted in her refusal to make it up.

But Teddy, fully informed of the state of affairs by Susan, had not come forward with the alacrity which, perhaps, Mary expected, and she liked him none the less on this account. The little uncertainty made her value his attentions as she would not have done had he been more hasty, and, by this time he knew well that he had a powerful advocate, as well as a tried friend, in Eleanor.

Billy Mullens had followed the procession in its progress from one point to another, posting himself on the corners where it passed and hurrying thence to where it countermarched. It was a species of self-inflicted torture that did not tend to soothe his drunken rage. In the earlier stages of his frenzy he made no protest other than to vow inwardly that he would "get even with the stoker." He wandered about companionless, like a lost dog, but he, too, was pursued by a shadow as persistent and as watchful—the miserable, bedizened Mag Lewis. She had left her child at home that she might be unhampered. Careful not to be seen herself she had not lost sight of Billy for a moment, for she feared trouble. Many times since the birth of the child she had been discarded by him for some new fancy, only to re-establish her ascendency. She never upbraided him for his faithlessness, but when he chose to return received him again, though she knew he had never thought of marriage. She learned accidentally that he now intended to marry Mary Benson, if he could, and from that hour she watched him with fierce vigilance. More than once she waylaid him as he staggered home late at night for which he had repeatedly struck her, with oaths and revilings, when, for the sake of the child, she begged him to come back to her.

When the speeches were all over Alonzo gathered his party together, and proposed that they ride home in one of the hacks assembled at the fair-ground gates.

Teddy had scarcely left Mary's side for a moment and Billy Mullins, half concealed behind the trunk of a tree not far away, saw him put her cloak about her shoulders lingeringly, as if he found it a pleasing task.

The sight maddened him beyond the bounds of self-control; he staggered forward, threw himself upon Teddy raging and cursing. Susan and Alonzo were some distance in advance of them. Teddy was at once aware of Billy's condition and knowing how useless it was to parley with him, he endeavored to push him aside and pass him.

"Oh, you think you'll get off that way, do you!" he cried with frightful imprecations. "You think you've got her! So did I——" and he laughed jeeringly. "But there's many a slip—as I could tell you. But maybe you know it yourself——"

The scattering crowd halted, looked back startled, and began to collect about them. Mary, distressed and frightened, begged Teddy to come away and take no notice of him. This he endeavored to do, but Mullens followed close at his heels, uttering insults and threats. Teddy still forebore until at last Mullins lurched forward to Mary's side and addressed his abuse to her personally. Then, quick as a flash, Teddy struck him a blow in the face that sent him dizzy and bleeding to the ground. It partially sobered him, and after an instant he sprang to his feet, and drawing his knife, he plunged it into Teddy's shoulder. He withdrew the blade to strike again—Mary shrieking for help—when it was suddenly wrenched from his hand and tossed away before the gaping onlookers could realize what had happened.

Mag Lewis had intervened and she cried fiercely: "You fool—you crazy fool! Run! Run for your life!" and Mullins darted into the thick of the crowd and escaped.

CHAPTER XIII.

In Time of Trouble.

Shortly after he had finished his speech Bannister left the platform and Eleanor did not see him again during the meeting, for he made no attempt to join her. She and Miss Abigail also withdrew long before the last orator brought his remarks to a close.

When she reached home an hour later, as she instinctively feared, she found that Bannister had anticipated her arrival and was engaged in earnest conversation with her mother. Both were somewhat embarrassed when she entered the parlor; evidence that whatever they were discussing was not a subject to be continued in her hearing. She would have gone directly to her room, but she knew that they must have seen her as she came up the walk, and she could not treat even Bannister with incivility under her own roof. She also dreaded giving her mother ground for further upbraiding. Her strength and patience were already severely tried, for an unmistakable change in her mother's health gave her keen anxiety and made her even more forbearing. Mrs. Crofton had suddenly grown old and feeble and in the last few days had shown very little interest in anything. Because of a strange lassitude into which she had shrunk, she appeared to have forgotten or grown indifferent even to Bannister's interests, and Eleanor had been spared the repinings and reproaches which had half broken her heart.

Eleanor had not revealed to Bannister the aversion she felt, which, nevertheless, he suspected. Of her indifference he was fully aware and realized that it was much more difficult to overcome than open hostility.

Eleanor sat down near the window after having reluctantly shaken hands with him.

"I have just given your mother an account of the parade and speeches," he said genially.

"It is very kind of you to take so much trouble."

"It's anything but that, I assure you. In the presence of so many stars of the first magnitude I was of little consequence, so I left as soon as I could. As I have been touring the state with the Secretary, I was glad to be spared a repetition of a speech I have heard a dozen times already. The recollection of—this pleasant parlor, and a desire to ask after your mother in person, were temptations too strong to resist."

Eleanor could not say truthfully that she appreciated this attention, so she merely bowed.

"You have no idea," he went on, "how heartily sick I am of noise and oratory. I am sometimes tempted to emigrate to Russia and swear allegiance to the Czar. I think I should enjoy a pure autocracy where the whole machinery of popular election could be done away with. I should choose either this, or a dictatorship in the Cannibal Islands—some safe one, where the people have become vegetarians!"

Eleanor smiled and said indifferently:

"You could not do better!"

He winced a little and then spoke of the general political outlook in the State, intelligently and interestingly. As Eleanor studied his changed countenance, his negligent grace—the ease of the thoroughgoing man of the world—she recalled the boyish lover who had won her heart so long ago and the regret she felt was not for the man, but for the destruction of her ideals. For the moral and spiritual dissolution he had suffered, she knew there was no hope of resurrection.

When she entered the room she had foreseen that a crisis was at hand, and she prepared herself to meet it. Therefore, she was not surprised when her mother complained of fatigue, weakness that Eleanor perceived was only too plainly genuine, however once it might have been simulated had Mrs. Crofton only desired to leave them together.

When she had retired Eleanor waited for some moments in painful suspense for what she was convinced Bannister had to say. But she gave no outward evidence of her disturbed state of mind.

Bannister had always possessed a certain dashing hardihood. Once he had made up his mind to challenge defeat or try for success, he did not hesitate. He chafed under delay and must know his fate without loss of time. His eyes were downcast for an instant, but at last he looked up at her and said:

"Eleanor, I have not had the courage to speak for myself, but I know that your mother has been pleading for me!"

(To be continued.)

Church Life

Again we say, remember the first Sunday in March and the claim of the Foreign Missionary enterprise upon the interests of the preacher and the church.

These are the days that will determine what the Foreign Missionary offering of the church is to be on the first Sunday in March. Prepare carefully for that great day, and it will be impossible for the offering to be a failure.

The article by Perry J. Rice last week crowded out many other things which we wished to print, but the article was well worth the space, and deserved a careful reading by every member of The Christian Century group.

A large number of the more aggressive Sunday-schools are interesting themselves in the new graded lessons of the International system. The Christian Century takes pleasure in answering inquiries and filling orders for the helps, because it knows them to be in the line of progress toward the best work in the Sunday-school.

Very few of the letters coming to the Christian Century office are self-laudatory, but many of the men are sending in their church papers, and brief items which they think will be of general interest. The editors appreciate the real interest which so large a number of the preachers of the brotherhood are taking in the work of The Christian Century.

In making the announcement last week of the desire of our English Disciples to give an international character to their annual conference on account of the presence in Great Britain of many Disciples drawn by the World's Missionary Conference at Edinburgh, we omitted to state that the London committee is desirous of suggestions from their American brethren of what date will be most convenient for them to attend. The committee will be glad to set the date so as to accommodate the largest number of visitors. It would be a favor for all who expect to be in Great Britain to write to Leslie W. Morgan, "Wringcliff," Priory Road, Hornsey, London, stating whether June 7-9 or June 28-30 will be most convenient. Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Morrison will attend the Edinburgh Conference and hope it may be convenient to meet their Disciple brethren in London after the Conference.

R. N. Davis is temporarily caring for the Garfield Park Church, Santa Cruz, Cal.

Many people are attending the revival meetings of the church in Marion, Ind.

J. N. Lester, formerly of Denair, California, is now settled in the pastorate of the church at Worcester, Mass.

H. O. Breeden closes his work with the Denver Central, January 30, and will leave at once for San Francisco.

Prof. Alexander R. Milligan, of Lexington, Ky., has given $5,000 to Milligan College, Tenn.

The church at Alameda, Cal., gave their retiring pastor, H. J. Loken, and wife a farewell reception on a recent evening.

A. J. Garrick has resigned at Iowa Falls, Iowa, and has accepted a call to the church at Milton.

Prof. D. C. Kellems, of the Eugene Bible University, Eugene, Oregon, is to assist T. A. Boyer and the church at Oakland in a meeting in May.

Scoville and his evangelistic company are stirring things at Fort Smith, Arkansas. A local paper reports that the converts now number more than seven hundred.

H. O. Pritchard is in the midst of a successful series of meetings at the University Church at Bethany, Va. There have been forty accessions to date.

J. J. Haley, widely known as the pastor of the great Seventh Street Church, Richmond, Va., for many years, begins his work as pastor at Modesto, Cal., June 9.

J. Walter Reynolds, Lyons, Kansas, tells us that the Sunday-school has increased 100 per cent under the "merger" plan in attendance, and 150 per cent in offerings.

Dr. W. E. Macklin and family, of Nankin, China, will sail for America about the middle of March. Their stay here will be very short, only six months.

R. E. Rosenstein, C. W. B. M. evangelist, is holding a meeting with the church at Foraker, Oklahoma. There were fourteen additions the first two weeks of the meeting.

Perry J. Rice reports nine additions to the El Paso, Texas, church in the month of January. The opportunity afforded by his new field grows in significance as his acquaintance deepens.

The church at Austin, Minn., where Howard L. Johnson ministers, will begin a meeting February 6. W. A. Haynes will do the preaching and Charles E. McVay will be song leader and soloist.

J. H. Bicknell, Secretary for Minnesota, is working with the church at Duluth as temporary pastor until the arrival of Roy Hunt, of Cotner University, who begins his pastorate about the middle of February.

The South Lawrence Church, Wichita, Kansas, gave a banquet and reception in welcome to their new pastor, C. C. Sinclair, who recently went to this field from the pastorate of the Stuart Street Church, Springfield, Ill.

R. W. Stevenson, of Toronto, Canada, closed a short meeting for the Central Church, Syracuse, N. Y., with sixteen accessions. Mr. Stevenson was minister in Syracuse from 1889 to 1895 and did a fine work in the church. His recent meeting was the means of enlisting the church in service.

The Central Christian Church of Detroit, Mich., plans to establish two new churches, one on the east and the other on the west side of the city. This announcement was made at the annual business meeting of the church.

The Brotherhood of the Franklin Circle Church, Cleveland, Ohio, desiring to do some practical work, have organized an employment bureau under the Industrial Department. Mr. J. Stollenmeyer is at the head of this new undertaking.

As a New Year's gift to their pastor, the congregation at Roswell, New Mexico, increased the salary of their pastor from $1,500 to $2,000. Every department of the work of the church is in the best condition. There have been six accessions to the church in the last few weeks.

O. W. Winter, Dixon, Ill., preached for the church at Sterling, Ill., January 23. He says that the pastor of the church at Sterling, Ira Parvin, is doing excellent work. The Sunday-school is flourishing, with the pastor's class in the lead. Good audiences are in attendance at the services of the church.

W. H. Allen, pastor of the Jackson Street Church, Muncie, Ind., has been in the sanitarium at Martinsville, Ind., for the past few weeks, but will soon be able to return to his work with the church. During the absence of the pastor the pulpit has been supplied by J. T. Reynolds.

The First Christian Church of Marion, Ind., has presented the Marion Public Library with thirteen new volumes of religious works, by modern writers. The church has been holding its meetings in the library hall while the new church was being erected, and presented the books as a token of their appreciation.

Encouraging reports of the work at Auburn, Nebraska, have come to our notice. The attendance of the Sunday-school is running above two hundred. There are sixty-two names on the cradle roll, and sixty-nine in the Home Department. The C. W. B. M. raised $44.20 C. W. B. M. day. The membership of the auxiliary is now 105.

Robert E. Hieronymus, who resigned the presidency of Eureka College last summer, has just received at the hands of Governor Deneen the appointment to the position of Secretary of the Educational commission for the state. This is a high office, an honor to the Disciples, and carries with it a salary which sounds good to the ears of most preachers.

Alva W. Taylor lectured January 26 at Petersburg, Ill., and at Eureka, January 27 on "The Church and the Social Question." Mr. Taylor is rapidly becoming one of the busiest men of the Brotherhood. In addition to his pastoral work, he writes many inimitable paragraphs for The Christian Century, has been out helping to raise money for the Bible College, Columbia, Mo., and is frequently called upon to deliver lectures throughout Illinois and adjoining states.

An interesting meeting has just been held by the church at Cortland, Ohio, where James Egbert is pastor. The first week the preaching was by the pastor. The last two weeks, Rev. Cyrus Kellogg Stockwell, Congregational minister at Bloomington, Ill., did the preaching. Of this preaching, Mr. Egbert says: "Mr. Stockwell's sermons were interesting, biblical, and came home to all hearts with great power." The meeting was an uplift to the church. There were eighteen accessions to the church. They will at once begin the remodeling of their church building.

The new building at Pendleton, Ore., is nearing completion, and it is hoped may be dedicated in February. It occupies the best site in that city, on the north bank of the Umatilla, overlooking the entire city. The basement is specially adapted to the needs of modern Bible school work. The main auditorium will seat 700. The building is Romanesque in design and will cost $30,000. A. Mackenzie Meldrum is the pastor, and to him great credit is due for this magnificent work.

The church at Mishawaka, Ind., under the leadership of J. D. DeWitt Hull, has accomplished a good work during the past year. The Ladies' Aid Society raised $409.00; the Christian Endeavor Society added twenty to its membership, and now has an enrollment of fifty-seven; they raised $148.00, the larger part of which was paid for a new piano. The Sunday-school enrollment is 443, with an average weekly attendance of 191. The church raised during the year $2,514.00. The total amount raised by all the organizations of the church was $2,915.60.

The following is a summary of the annual report of the Third Christian Church, Indianapolis, Indiana, Harry G. Hill, minister: Money raised during the year: current expenses, $5,133.15; building fund, $8,189.66; Home Missions, $126.97; Foreign Missions, $663.21; State Missions, $96.25; Sunday-school, $563.52; total amount raised from all sources, $17,867.24. There were ninety-three additions during the year, making the present membership 1,204. The church hopes to be in its new building July 1. All departments are well organized and unitedly facing a bright future, full of hope for increased service and blessing.

The Englewood Christian Church of Indianapolis, Ind., just closed a two weeks' meeting with home forces, resulting in forty confessions and eight by statement. At the annual business meeting of the congregation it appeared that the church had enjoyed the best year of its history. In addition to paying off a considerable indebtedness of a general nature, $1,000 was paid on the old church debt. The pastor's salary was raised $100 per year. E. E. Moorman is pastor.

The annual meeting of the Christian church, at Canon City, Colo., was held Thursday evening. Supper was served in the basement, after which the meeting was held in the auditorium. Reports of the officers were given. The report of the clerk of the church shows a gain of twenty-one during the year, making a church membership of 245. The treasurer reported the receipts for the year to have been $2,654.56, and total disbursements $2,628.81, of which $1,684.01 was spent for church maintenance and $944.80 for payment on building debt and permanent improvements.

William J. Wright and Howard S. Saxton have just closed an eighteen-day engagement with the Broadway Church, Louisville, Ky. The pastor, W. N. Briney, unhesitatingly commends the work of both preacher and singer. He says that large audiences were attracted to hear Mr. Wright, not by the announcement of sensational sermons, or by sensational advertising of any kind, but by his original and forceful way of presenting the gospel truth. He describes Mr. Saxton as "earnest, consecrated, and capable." This church is in fine condition for aggressive work. They have just enlarged and beautified their building at a cost of $1,500.00, and the church is free from all indebtedness.

In the annual report of the church at Orange, California, we note: The present membership of the church is 283, a gain of twenty-nine during the past year. Contributors to church 239. Church raised for current expenses, $1,650. Offering to missions, $506.00; with the aid of the auxiliaries this was increased to $922.00. C. C. Bentley is pastor of the church. In every respect the work of this church during the past year shows a marked increase over that of the previous year.

The Louisville Herald gives an account of the annual banquet just given by E. L. Powell to the men of his church and the city. This annual banquet is a novel feature of the work of Mr. Powell, and has come to be recognized as one of the events of the year in the life of the city. The speakers and subjects this year were: "The Same Old Speech," the Rev. Dr. E. L. Powell; "A Luminous Date," Helm Bruce; "The Good Old Days," Charles W. Bell; "Birds and Beasts and Other Strange Animals," Edw. A. Jonas; "The Mettle of the Pasture," Young E. Allison.

R. Z. McCoy, Allerton, Iowa, has just given $6,000 to Drake University. The fund is to be used to sustain six ministerial scholarships. Mr. McCoy has been for a long time a member of the board of trustees of the university, and this is not his first large gift to the school. A few years ago he gave $5,000, telling the board to use it at their discretion. The hospital to be used in connection with the medical college of the university is one of the greatest needs of the school at the present time. The university management will at once set to work to raise an additional $30,000 to equip the hospital, and hope to have the work complete and the hospital ready for use by the opening of the fall term of the university.

Prof. H. T. Sutton, formerly teacher of elocution in Cotner University, just completed a series of biblical readings in the Presbyterian Church of Auburn, Neb. His subjects were: "John the Baptist," "Paul on Mars Hill and Before Agrippa," and "Ben Hur." After briefly explaining surroundings and conditions, Mr. Sutton recites the scriptures verbatim with powerful, interesting and telling effect, and only words of highest commendation are spoken by everybody. The large church was filled to overflowing. This is something new, and every church among us should have Mr. Sutton deliver this series of sacred readings.

The report of the church at Gibson City, Ill., L. O. Lehman, pastor: Sixty-two were added during the year, of whom thirty-three were by confession and baptism, the others by statement and letter. The withdrawals were thirty, leaving a net gain of thirty-two. The present membership is 438, of whom eighty-four are non-resident. The total amount of money raised was $5,576.48, of which $1,066.36 was for missions and benevolences. For the first time in many years the church closed the year without an overdraft. Every department showed a balance on hand. The average attendance at the Bible-school was 199. The church faces the new year hopefully. So far in the new year

The Churches Classified

In approaching the March Offering it will be well to keep in mind the following classifications of the church:

1. The One Day Churches. We are asking churches to assume the support of the whole work of the Foreign Society for at least one day. This requires about $1,000. This includes the support of 170 American missionaries and their children, 634 native helpers, 18 hospitals and dispensaries treating 131,770 patients, 62 schools and colleges with an attendance of 4,270, the support of some 400 orphans, 4 printing presses producing millions of pages of literature, etc. What a vast work it is! It is conducted in twelve different countries, in many different languages and dialects. Last year six churches reached this high rank by giving $1,000 or more. A number are planning for this larger life.

2. Living-link Churches. More than 100 churches belong to this class. The number will be increased this year. Some have already decided to take this advanced step. Others will follow. Many of our churches have maintained the Living-link with admirable loyalty. They rejoice in their high privilege. The Living-link includes, it will be remembered, the gifts from the church as a church, the Sunday-school and the Endeavor Society.

3. Every Member Churches. This is a new class. It embraces those churches that secure a March Offering gift from every member of the congregation. This does not require wealth. The church need not be strong in numbers. Only one test of fellowship for this class, and that is that every member, young and old, rich and poor, give something, however small the amount. E. L. Frazier, Morristown, Ind., enjoyed the distinction of preaching for such a church in 1908. Let us have scores of such churches this the first offering of our Second Century.

4. Roll of Honor Churches. The churches that reach their Apportionment constitute the Roll of Honor for the current missionary year. Last year 962 churches composed this class. It will be larger this year. Every reasonable effort should be made to be on the Roll of Honor. It is a matter of great importance. The Apportionment will be sent our February 1. Let it be remembered there is nothing mandatory or compulsory about the Apportionment, of course. It is only a fraternal suggestion and is purely advisory.

5. Contributing Churches. We seek to increase the number of churches coöperating. This fellowship helps the church as well as the great missionary cause. The churches, as a rule, with the larger interest in Missions, are the most prosperous, and happiest, and purest in life, and most Apostolic in spirit and in teaching. May we not urge every church to enroll for the March Offering? Do not permit any trivial matter to stand between your church and its imperative duty to preach the gospel to the whole creation.

the attendance at Bible-school has exceeded that of last year by an average of twenty.

The annual report of the First Church, San Francisco, Frank S. Ford, pastor, shows substantial progress for the year. There were twenty-one additions by letter, twenty-five by statement, twenty-eight by letter, three reclaimed, making a total of seventy-seven for the year. The membership is now 270. The financial report is exceptionally good, considering the conditions of the country. The church gave $3,747.49, Bible-school $567.63, C. W. B. M. $202.37, Ladies' Aid $885.39, Young Ladies' Club $50.25, Young Men's Club $28.30, Y. P. S. C. E. $138.30, Junior C. E. $42.75, Building Fund $1,161; total, $6,823.48. During the year the church gave a total of $978.82 for missions. Brother Ford is now in his fourteenth year as pastor of that church, and this promises to be the best in the history of the work.

The annual report of the church at Akron, Ohio, where George Darsie ministers, shows most encouraging conditions. The Sunday-school enrollment is 1,660 with an average attendance for the year of 762. During the year there were 150 additions to the church from the Sunday-school. The school raised for missions $510.00. The offering for missions from the church was very gratifying to the pastor and leaders in the work. The church itself gave $1,492.96, the C. W. B. M. $1,134.00, other organizations $320.50, making a grand total including what was given by the Sunday-school of $4,057.56. The church raised for current expenses $6,497.00, and the Sunday-school $756.00, making a grand total raised for all purposes $12,084.00. The present membership of the church is 1,475. There were 284 additions last year. The church started upon the new year out of debt and with a balance in the treasury.

We have at hand an attractively printed report of the Seventh Street Church, Richmond, Va., where H. D. C. Machlachlan is the minister. The number of members January 1, 1909, 648; present membership, 728. Raised for current expenses during the year, $5,316.91. Gave for missions, $1,309.50. In addition to this, more than $11,000 has been raised on new property purchased for use in the work of the Sunday-school. The relief committee of the church raised and expended during the year more than $700.00. The Ladies' Aid Society collected during the year $600.00. C. W. B. M. membership, 104; raised during year, $359.00. Raised by Young Men's Missionary Society, $292.00. The total Sunday-school collections were $1,538.40. Total enrollment of the Sunday-school, 494; gain during year, 88. The money contributed to benevolences and missions was $5.50 per capita, and to all purposes, $36.50 per resident member.

The First Church, St. Paul, Minn., A. D. Harmon, pastor, held its annual dinner and business meeting on the evening of January 5. The reports show seventy-eight additions for the year, fifty-two by confession and a little over $6,000 raised for all purposes. It is the custom of this church to make the annual meeting a family evening around the dinner table. A very frank conference is held upon the various lines of work. A definite program is always framed for the new year and officers selected with a view to their ability to carry it out. The following Sunday a service of dignity and solemnity for the installation of the officers and for pledging the congregation to the officers and to the year's program, is held. It is the experience of this church that by such a program the church has before it a definite goal and the office bearer is impressed with the dignity and purpose of his trust. Bro. Harmon is now in the middle of his thirteenth year as pastor.

On of the great churches of the Disciples in Illinois is the First at Springfield, where F. W. Burnham is the minister. Their report for the year 1909 shows a good normal gain. Additions to the membership during the year, 371, loss by death and removal forty-seven, net gain 324. Average Sunday-school attendance 286, a gain of sixty-one over the previous year. The financial report shows the following amounts raised and expended by the various organizations of the church: The church itself, $5,014.00; missions, church fund, $1,465.50; missions, Women's Society, $343.56; missions, young ladies, $455.63; King's Daughters Circle, $455.61; the Bible School, $766.49; Sewing Society, $157.87; Lambs of Good Shepherd, $43.73; Soc. of Ind. Society, $39.00; the Brotherhood, $166.85; Christian Endeavor, $32.00; Charity Fund, $108.91; the White Fund, $261.35; Anti-Saloon League, State, $91.00; Eureka College Endowment Campaign sustainers, $100.00; Piano specials, $100.00; Illinois Education Ass'n, $46.00; grand total, $9,648.40.

W. D. Deweese, Office Secretary.
Bloomington.

A call at Lewistown found the church pleased with the new minister, B. H. Cleaver, and a good training class at work under the instruction of Prof. M. N. Beeman of the city schools. The church now has a good building up.

Near Aldeo is a good country church, Ohio Grove, equipped with a good modern building and in a good neighborhood. The brethren are planning to have a minister settle with them. Many other country churches, not so strong, could do as well. It is a matter of faith.

The first annual rally of the church at Martinton, Prof. Clyde Lyon minister, was a great occasion. It was made a matter of neighborhood interest and the church and neighbors came out to all the day sessions, with good meals interspersed. Ellmore Sinclair, Watseka, and some of his good people came and he delivered an address of much interest on "Elijah's Roll-Call." There was special music by Prof. Lyon and others. Bro. Lyon is in the university but he gives time and study to his field and the good results are very apparent.

A Sunday was spent with the great church at Watseka and her good minister, Ellmore Sinclair. This church is a child of the state society also and it is a pleasure to note its power at home and abroad. Bro. Sinclair has a splendid place in the hearts of the people, he is honored by the city and the good spirit is present in all the work. He is a contribution from Canada and the Canadians all make good in our state.

A night call was made on Rossville and D. D. Dick, recently settled there from Canada, and we are glad he came. The streets were coated with ice but a good audience was out to hear the story of progress in Illinois. Bro. Dick is a strong preacher and the church is pleased that it has him. The state society organized this church also.

Our little church at Oakwood made me welcome while I helped them for a few days. The brethren are working toward calling a minister for full time. There are two churches in the village but it can give a proper supoprt to only one. In all such fields our church should make a vigorous christian campaign for unity of all our Lord's disciples in the community. A well directed effort of that character would result in having one New Testament church in the village. We ought to make good in this line in many places.

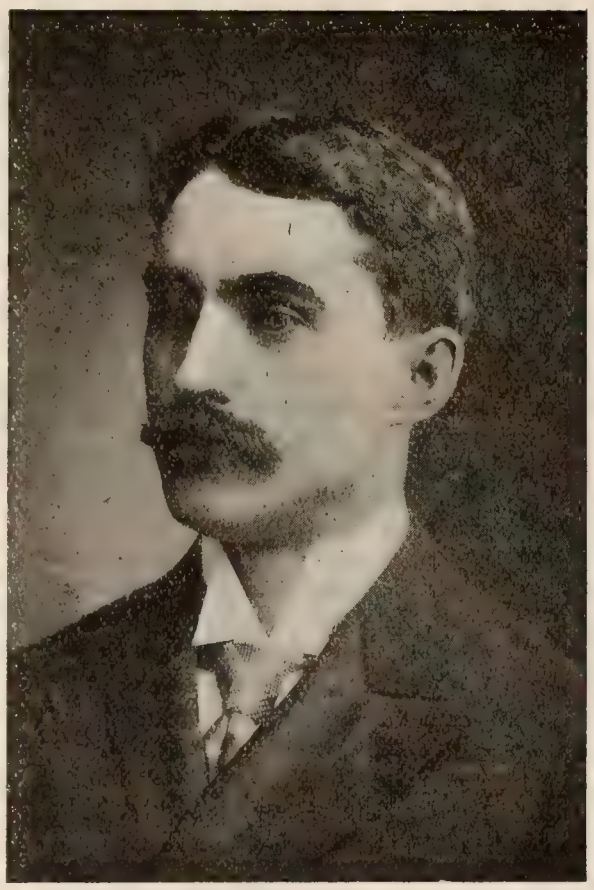
I am now at Ridge Farm helping a little church that has a good building and is out of debt. There has been no regular ministry for a year or more. There are three other churches in the village but there is great need of intelligent and consecrated christian service. A minister located here who would make a long and sensible campaign for a united church would have something to show for it within five years.

Dollars are human life crystalized. He who supports State Missions with his dollars is pouring his christian life into other lives that need it. Our Lord poured his divine life into the veins of this old anemic world and it is reviving and becoming healthy. He calls upon us to follow his example. Send us the crystals, brethren.

Victory Against Heavy Odds

Typical Chicago Success at Austin

The company of Disciples in Austin, a suburb of Chicago, is already reckoned in heaven among those who have come up through great tribulation. Their history has been one of struggle against grave odds from the first. Organized as a mission some ten years ago, they assumed perhaps prematurely the responsibility of self-support in a community of large, well established and rich churches. Gradually they collected funds with which to buy a cast-off meeting house of the Baptists in which they worshipped until a year and a half ago when it was burned to the ground leaving the congregation homeless. Their predicament was all the more pathetic in view of the defection, a few months previous, of about forty of the members, including some of the most capable ones financially. This group gained the support of certain newspapers of the brotherhood in its misrepresentation of the teaching of the pastor, George A. Campbell.



Weakened by this defection, the young church and its faithful pastor set about bravely to solve their problem. For a year they worshipped in the Congregational church, the two pastors sharing jointly the pulpit leadership. Funds were collected with which to buy a new lot and sufficient to warrant the undertaking of a new house.

The utter consecration with which Mr. Campbell has stood by the church through all the ten years of its history is almost proverbial among Chicago Disciples. Throughout their recent misfortunes their pastor has shown just such loyalty and conscience as would a true father to his family. No vindictive word toward the trouble-makers of the church has been heard from his lips even in private conversation. He has gone about the bearing of his burden and the solving of his church's problem in the spirit of Christ. As a result the factional church set up has been dissolved, some of its members removing from the community, others returning to the mother church. We are glad to give our readers the account of the church's history and victory.

The location of the new church is not only in the center of the community, but is also the most central location possible for the members of the church. Upon the west side of this lot has been erected a bungalow church at the cost of $8,000. This will not be the final worshiping place of the church, but will be the permanent social building, or the work shop of the church. The corner of the lot is left vacant for the final enlarged church which will be built in the not distant future. The present building is 74 by 34 feet, including a basement and upper story. In all, there are eight separate rooms that can be used for Sunday-school classes. The auditorium will seat 300. Every one who has seen the auditorium pronounces it tasteful and pleasing.

The dedication of the building occurred on January 30. The day was a most beautiful clear Lord's day and every one felt comforted. The services of the day opened with the Sunday-school at 9:45, at which two former superintendents spoke, namely, H. K. Misenhimer and George G. Walker. The felicitations of these former superintendents were greatly appreciated by the entire school. Following Dr. P. L. Prentis was installed as our new superintendent. He made some very impressive remarks and all predict for the school a very successful future under his leadership. At 11 o'clock, the hour of the morning worship, the church was full of expectant members and friends and all felt the note of enthusiasm of victory. Dr. I. N. McCash, the newly installed secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society, was present to lead our forces on to the final consummation of the efforts of years. He preached a very short, but inspiring sermon on the church as a growing force in the social life of today. He did not see the church as a waning, but as a growing influence in the complex life of our time. He made all present feel that sacrificing for the upbuilding of the church was worth while. After this brief and inspiring address he set to the task of asking the friends present to subscribe $5,500, the amount needed to pay the obligations outstanding for the building of the new church. The responses were prompt and in a very few moments the sum of $4,900 was realized in pledges.

Somebody has said that the essentials in a money raiser are good nature and persistency. Dr. McCash has an abundance of both of these excellent qualities. He also has a third quality which some ministers do not have, reverence and dignity that pleases even the most sensitive and cultured people. Dr. McCash has a very frank and sincere soul that makes the audience quickly en rapport with him. These qualities are a great asset to him in his work upon the platform, and make him most efficient. Just here we might say that we see great possibilities for the American Christian Missionary Society in having such a man as Dr. McCash, so adept at dedication, give considerable of his time to this work of consummation. We are sure that our church will be much closer to the work of the American Christian Missionary Society after having come to know intimately this splendid leader.

Rev. George A. Campbell.

In the afternoon, on account of being at the quarterly assembly in the city it was not possible for Dr. McCash to be present at the fellowship service. This was regretted, but it could not be helped. A dozen of our local ministers were present to bring the felicitations of their churches. The following were the speakers: Rev. Judson L. Thomas, Pastor First Baptist Church; Dr. John J. Martin, Pastor First Congregational Church; Dr. Robert H. Beattie, Pastor First Presbyterian Church, and Rev. J. R. E. Hunt, Pastor English Lutheran Church. Rev. Wilson E. Donaldson, Pastor of the Fifty-second Ave. Presbyterian Church presided. The last speaker was J. W. Rowe, superintendent of Chicago Methodist Missions. Mr. Rowe, in his very happy manner, asked for offerings from friends present. Between five and six hundred dollars was readily given. The First Methodist Church of Austin gave $100. When it is known that this church recently burned and suffered great loss, and that it occupies the same territory as our own church, being only a block away this gift becomes unique and a splendid illustration of the growing spirit of fraternity. Representatives of other churches also showed their appreciation by liberal giving.

Perhaps there has never been held in Austin a more fraternal and cordial meeting of all the churches in the community than this afternoon meeting on the day of the dedication of our church. At the evening service, the house was again full. Dr. McCash gave a very warm, hearty address on the text, "No man liveth unto himself, and no man dieth unto himself."

There were some people with us who had not been present at the other services and these gave us some $250.00, which completed our money-raising efforts for the day. After the dedicatory prayer by Dr. McCash, the Lord's Supper was celebrated, Dr. E. S. Ames making a tender and strong address preceding the communion. Mr. P. L. Prentis presided at the table with him. All our people in the morning were heartened by the presence of O. F. Jordan, pastor of the church at Evanston. Mr. Jordan offered the morning prayer and brought a pledge from all our sister churches in the city which gladdened all our hearts.

In connecttion with the dedication week, there will be two meetings. On Wednesday, Feb. 2, the church banquet will be given; toast master, Mr. A. R. Brown; speakers, W. W. Mills, Dr. P. L. Prentis and others. We expect two hundred to sit down together. On Friday, Feb. 4, there will be a meeting in the church at 8 p. m., at which several of our Chicago ministers will speak, including A. W. Taylor, Austin Hunter, W. F. Shaw, C. C. Morrison and others.

The building committee, for whom too much can not be said, was composed of the following men: W. O. Cline, Andrew Christensen, E. T. Linsley, H. A. Vandercook, George C. Sikes.

A number of the ministers and members of the Pittsburg and surrounding churches met Saturday, January 26, and agreed that Weston, Pa., should double the amount of last year for foreign missions. This is one of the hundreds of the fine results of the Laymen's Missionary Movement Convention now in this city. 1,500 men sat down to a dollar-a-plate dinner and were stirred mightily by the nation's best speakers. From 700 to 1,000 busy men are attending the sessions morning and afternoon. It is restoration in earnest.

All readers of The Christian Century will be interested in the announcement that William J. Lockhart, evangelist, has accepted the temporary pastorate of the Union Avenue Church, St. Louis, Mo. He will begin his work immediately upon the close of Dr. Philputt's pastorate, February 1. Mr. Lockhart does not mean to give up the evangelistic work, nor to accept the permanent pastorate of this church, but to undertake a sort of pastoral evangelism. He, with the church, desires to see what can be done by a constant and continuous effort through the ordinary agencies of the church, in such a field as that presented by the Union Ave. Church. Mr. Lockhart is ready to make engagements for the regular evangelistic work during the coming year.

As We Go to Press

Flora, Ill., Jan. 22.—Having good meeting. Go from here to Lanark, Ill., Feb. 1.—Ben F. Hill.

Cincinnati, Ohio: Jan. 29.—Eleven hundred men at opening banquet of Laymen's Missionary Convention. Great enthusiasm. Our greater Cincinnati churches resolve by every member canvass to try and raise foreign offering from $4,000 to $10,000 this year,—Stephen J. Corey.

Princeton, Ill., Jan. 24.—Three added last night, one by confession, one by letter, and one by statement. Growing interest in all departments and in audiences.—Cecil C. Carpenter.

Rock Island, Ill., Jan. 23.—Closed meeting of three weeks with the Highland Church, Denver, last Thursday night. Nineteen were added and the church was most glad in the permanent results. J. E. Pickett has served this church for nearly nine years. He and his estimable wife are splendidly equipped and well balanced workers, having the high esteem of all the church and community. It was a benediction to be with them in their home, and in their work, with that fine, warm-hearted, appreciative congregation. It is hoped the auditorium of their church will be built during the year.—Evangelist W. B. Clemmer.

Ft. Smith, Ark., Jan. 24.—One hundred and twenty-two added to date. Grand Opera House crowded with men last Sunday. Yesterday afternoon the church full at session for ladies only. Ladies gave a free will offering of $43.00. We are rejoicing to know that Ft. Smith is really being aroused by the gospel. Our corps of personal workers are giving faithful service. We continue.—Brooks, Lewis and Tapp.

Little Rock, Ark., Jan. 23.—One hundred and thirty last week, fifty-five more today, 777 to date; two immense audiences assembled tonight, 1,600 in auditorium below and seven hundred in great overflow prayer service for members upstairs. Little Rock and whole state of Arkansas have been stirred as never before by this, the greatest meeting of the south, and considering the conservatism of the south, the greatest revival held by the churches of Christ in America. The converts are from all classes of people, among them have been four lawyers, the city attorney, doctors, state educators, merchants, bankers, boilermakers, carpenters, barbers, blacksmiths, railroad engineers, firemen, brakemen and others. The spiritual life of all the churches has been deepened. We feel that Scoville and his workers have crowded into a few short weeks the work of twenty-five years. We will leave the churches stronger and better prepared to do effective work, and every Christian loving the Lord more and possessed with a determination to do things in the future. All desire to go on record as stating that Charles Reign Scoville and his helpers can, with any church co-operating, build up a great revival and leave a church and pastor stronger in every way, and he will do it by the power of the gospel and by an absolute loyal faith in the whole Bible as the very word of God.—Arthur K. Brooks.

Vincennes, Ind., Jan. 30.—Meeting two weeks old. Two hundred and twenty-seven added; forty-four today; city stirred. Wilhite preaching the "Old Jerusalem Gospel" with great power. Tuckerman leading great choirs and singing gospel in sweet solos. Mrs. Tuckerman's Bible drill and personal work effective; church rejoicing—William Oescheger.

Newman, Ill., Jan. 31.—Just closed splendid twelve days campaign with Edward McKinney singing, ably supported by large chorus choir; largest crowds in attendance since the Scoville meeting of four years ago. House packed tonight from pulpit to gallery; 305 in Bible school; 281 in men's class, 10 added; Methodist dismissed to join us; something exceptional for Newman; compelled to close tonight; McKinney fine helper. He goes with James Small next.—I Raymond Lines.

Martinsville, Ind., Jan. 30.—Sellers and St. John in wonderful meeting here. One hundred and eight added to date; $600 for current expenses from new members raised today.—C. W. Cauble.

A Big, Generous Offer

The same mails that have brought us an unexpectedly large list of orders for THE BETHANY GRADED SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS have also brought us letters from many pastors and Sunday school workers regretting that their supplies had been ordered before they saw the announcement of our new series. They assure us that they intend to place their order for THE BETHANY SERIES with us for the spring quarter.

We wish as many schools to get under way as soon as possible with the graded lessons. In order to enlist the schools which had purchased their supplies before they realized the incomparable superiority of THE BETHANY SERIES, we have decided to make the following big and generous offer:

If you will send us your order for THE BETHANY GRADED LESSONS (for the elementary grades only) we will credit your account with the amount you have paid or agreed to pay for the Winter Quarter supplies which THE BETHANY GRADED LESSONS will displace. We will ask you to send us the publisher's bill or an itemized statement signed by the pastor of your church, showing what materials are being displaced by THE BETHANY LESSONS.

This is a big and generous offer. It means that a limited number of schools will secure the new series FREE, for THE BETHANY LESSONS are no more expensive than the ordinary uniform materials. At most THE BETHANY LESSONS will cost your school but a trifle if you take advantage of this proposition.

The reason we can afford to make this almost gratuitous offer is very simple: We KNOW that ninety-nine out of every one hundred schools that once use THE BETHANY LESSONS will continue them right along.

NOTE CAREFULLY that this offer is limited to the stock of supplies we have on hand. When our present stock is exhausted we shall not hold ourselves obligated to fill orders on these terms. Therefore it is to your advantage to get your order in at once for the main bulk of our supplies for this quarter has already been consumed by our regular orders.

You can make out your order on the basis of our advertisement on page 24. Or if that is not clear write us at once for our regular order blank.

Christian Endeavor Day, February 6

A Word from the National Superintendent in Reference to Its Observation.

The birthday of Christian Endeavor is to be celebrated all over the world on February 6. This movement is now world-wide and societies in all lands will join in commemorating its inception. It has been a mighty power in extending the kingdom of Jesus Christ among men, and its power and usefulness is steadily increasing. Endeavor societies among the Disciples are requested to join in this celebration. The movement is twenty-nine years old, and there are now over 71,493 societies. Over one-tenth of the total number are in our own churches. We have 7,200 Young People's, Intermediate and Junior Societies. Last year was one of the very best for Christian Endeavor among us. We organized nearly 400 new societies and our Endeavorers gave $36,000 for missions. The United Society is working for 10,000 new societies by 1911, and the Disciples have accepted 2,000 or one-fifth of the number asked for, as our part. It will be in keeping with the day if our ministers will call attention to this movement in their sermons, and encourage the young people in their work.

Frances E. Clark is now making one of his long journeys in behalf of Christian Endeavor, having lately attended the world's convention in Agra, India. Pray for the movement, that it may be wisely guided, and pray for Mr. Clark that he may be long spared to the young people and the kingdom. Christian Endeavor Day should be a time of re-construction to the high ideals of Christian Endeavor—a united church and an evangelized world.

The Hub of the Empire State

Sunday, January 23, was a great day for the Disciples of Christ in Syracuse. A fine new house of worship and workshop for our second congregation was dedicated. Members of a half dozen neighboring churches sent their delegates to help make this a memorable session. F. M. Rains of Cincinnati, was on hand to keep things moving. A debt of $8,000 remained to test the loyalty and liberality of the audiences, but when the last service was over not only was this provided for, but the treasurer found that they had gone $200 beyond the mark.

The building, a unique structure of reinforced concrete, two stories high, the lower floor equipped for Sunday-school work, while the auditorium has a seating capacity of 300. It is the front portion of a building, which, when complete will care for a congregation of 700 or 800. The entire plant has

HARD TO DROP
But Many Drop It.

A young Calif. wife talks about coffee:

"It was hard to drop Mocha and Java and give Postum a trial, but my nerves were so shattered that I was a nervous wreck and of course that means all kinds of ails.

"At first I thought bicycle riding caused it and I gave it up, but my condition remained unchanged. I did not want to acknowledge coffee caused the trouble for I was very fond of it. At that time a friend came to live with us, and I noticed that after he had been with us a week he would not drink his coffee any more. I asked him the reason. He replied, 'I have not had a headache since I left off drinking coffee, some months ago, till last week, when I began again, here at your table. I don't see how anyone can like coffee, anyway, after drinking Postum!'

"I said nothing, but at once ordered a package of Postum. That was five months ago, and we have drank no coffee since, except on two occasions when we had company, and the result each time was that my husband could not sleep, but lay awake and tossed and talked half the night. We were convinced that coffee caused his suffering, so he returned to Postum, convinced that coffee was an enemy, instead of a friend, and he is troubled no more by insomnia.

"I, myself, have gained 8 pounds in weight, and my nerves have ceased to quiver. It seems so easy now to quit coffee that caused our aches and ails and take up Postum."

Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

cost to date $1,500. The plans were drawn by Mr. Fred G. Hertzog, son of O. G. Hertzog, of Hiram. Mr. Hertzog is a member of the church and took great pride in giving of his time and talent freely, in superintending the construction of the building.

Too much credit cannot be given to C. R. Stauffer, the enthusiastic and tireless minister of the church. In less than three years he has led the small flock until their increasing numbers made the old building inadequate. For five years they have occupied an old frame church on Rowland street. The new structure is near it, but on a more prominent street, well located. Since he has been here the church has bought and paid for the lot and paid out $2,000 on the new building, so that on dedication day only a portion of the entire cost remained to raise.

With Miss Una Dell Berry as singer, and Prest Arthur Amden as evangelist for part of the meeting, he is now engaged in an evangelistic effort which promises to greatly strengthen the church.

The state board of the New York Christian Missionary Convention held a meeting in the church January 22. Reports of the mission churches showed that progress was being made in many fields. Elmira, under the leadership of C. M. Kreidler, is coming out from under the cloud of adversity which rested upon it. Second Rochester, C. C. Crawford minister, will be assisted in a meeting later. Robert Stewart of Rochester, Frst, is now holding a meeting for the Watertown church. Short meetings are also in progress at Fredania, Richland and Tulley.

R. W. Stevenson of Toronto, Canada, held a good meeting in Central Church, Syracuse. It was like a home coming for him, for he labored as pastor of the church from 1889-1895 and made many warm friends in this city. Despite severe weather the interest and attendance was good and as an immediate result seventeen were added to the church.

The annual foreign rally was held here January 19, and was in many respects one of the best yet held. A. M. Lewis, Roy Eldred and M. D. Adams and many preachers of this vicinity made it seem like unto a ministers' national convention.

JOSEPH A. SERENA.

A New Combination

The first movement of the new management of The American Christian Missionary Society was to unify the National Bible-school with The American Christian Missionary Society. The National Bible-school Board appointed Brethren Moninger, Hopkins, and Green as advisory committee with the full functions of that board. Marion Stevenson, the superintendent, will continue his work from the office of The American Christian Missionary Society at Cincinnati, Ohio, instead of St. Louis, Mo. This will save $1,000 per year for office expenses. Bible-school work, which legitimately falls within the lines of the Home Society, will be pushed with the same vigor, but without confusion of interests. Such merging is in harmony with a widespread desire to reduce the number of boards and have fewer calls upon the churches for financial support. Combining the two will greatly strengthen the work of the Home Society, and open a door for effectual evangelism through the Bible-school. If we are to evangelize America in this generation, we must begin with the boys and girls, early after coming to years of accountability, to Christ. The brightest prospect for attaining this end is through this agency. Here is a demonstration of practical union and business economy.

It is gratifying to note what our Sunday-school superintendents of the states say:

"If you did nothing more in your first year of service than this one thing, you could count it most successful. I believe the plan a master stroke. The definite thing to which the Bible-schools can give, can easily be furnished now."

California. Louise Jones Taft.

"I am sure the missionary teaching and spirit of the Bible-schools could be greatly increased, and better results obtained thereby."

Connecticut. Frank H. Bailey.

"The work can be carried on much better and much more satisfactorily by letting the National Bible-school work become a part of the A. C. M. S. It certainly would reduce expenses and save overlapping. Our people have only begun in Bible-school work. Here as a big field of opportunity. Now it looks to me as if the A. C. M. S. cannot do better than to have a man who will give all his time to the Bible-school end. If we want to evangelize America, we want to get into the Bible-schools with the proposition. I assure you that I am much interested, and will do everything in my power to make things go. It is the right thing to do, therefore it must go." Gary L. Cook.

Indiana.

"The plan has my full endorsement. I pledge you my continued support, and will do all in my power to make this move prove exactly the right thing for all interested. You can count on the Illinois Bible-schools doing their part." Clarence L. DePew.

Illinois.

"I believe the new arrangement is the best that could be made, and I want to assure you of my coöperation in every possible way." W. H. McLain.

St. Louis, Mo.

"I wish to most heartily congratulate you upon securing the unanimous vote of the board by which the Bible-school work becomes a part of the A. C. M. S. I am convinced that the American Board has never done anything which will add to its popularity and power as this advance movement for the evangelism of our beloved country."

Missouri. J. H. Bryan.

"Personally I think the merging of the interests already so closely related to the best for both parties concerned. The larger support will work great good to the kingdom of God." J. Walter Carpenter Pennsylvania.

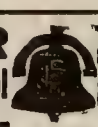
"I am very much pleased. Such an arrangement means greater influence for the A. C. M. S. in a field from which it will have more liberal support, and which it will surely benefit. It means a wider field for the opportunity of the missionary spirit, and will give our Bible-school people the best ground for urging that greater gifts to the A. C. M. S. be made. We will make Children's Day for Home Missions a day worth while, and the offering something like it should be." J. A. Scott.



Washington, D. C.

"Turn our Bible-school work over to the A. C. M. S. This is where it properly belongs. I believe the plan will solve our National Bible-school problems."

Texas. W. T. Hilton.

We hale with gladness this unanimity of opinion among the brethren.

THE DISCIPLES' CONSISTENCY, By Frank E. Boren—With Editorial Comment

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Volume XXVII. February 10, 1910. Number 6

Laymen's Missionary Conference

THE phenomenal demonstration of enthusiasm in the series of city conventions of the Laymen's missionary movement was repeated in St. Louis last Friday. Chicago is on an edge of expectancy, awaiting her turn for the climacteric demonstration in May. Dr. Hugh T. Morrison, Jr., who with other citizens of Springfield, Ill., attended the St. Louis meeting, sends us the following message:

Wonderful banquet tonight, 1,600 men present. Great speeches. Missions talked on high plane. Not side issue, but real business of Christian people and the church. Evangelization (not salvation) of world in our generation shown so clearly possible as to be thrilling. Speeches masterful, by men who know missions and the dignity of fulfilling Jesus' commission. No sensational oratory or attempt to sweep crowd off its feet. Enthusiasm of men over propositions demanding great faith was inspiring. No swagger, nor affectation of mannishness, nor effort to adapt the subject or method of presentation to men! Just the clear, earnest presentation of facts by men of vision and faith aroused intense enthusiasm. The absence of even the semblance of sectarianism made every one's heart glad. The littleness of the things which divide was felt by all in face of such a tremendous enterprise as evangelizing the world. Speakers uttered ringing words for Christian union and these were cheered to the echo. No Disciple could attend such a gathering without seeing the magnificent opportunity of practicing our plea by co-operation with this devoted host of laymen in the apostolic propaganda to which they are committed. Think of 1,600 men paying $2 a piece for a banquet to hear missions discussed, and many coming more than 100 miles beside!

The American Christian Missionary Society is seeking to arouse the churches to the necessity of occupying this land for Christ by lifting home missions to the plane of respectful consideration. "A Square Deal for American Missions" is our slogan. The great disparity between home and foreign missions in our great brotherhood is not to be remedied by relaxing our zeal for foreign missions. Perish the thought! But this ought you to have done and not leave the other undone. Lifting her standard for foreign missions ever higher let the church emphasize her home missionary work as equally important, and by strengthening her stakes at home she will be more able to lengthen her cords abroad. The new Easter Cantata entitled was prepared by

and is in some respects the best concert exercise she has ever written. It is designed to be used by the young people of the Churches of Christ in behalf of Orphanage work in Mission fields.

We have some very attractive helps to aid the young people in raising their Easter offering. These are an "Easter Egg" and "Easter Egg Envelope," to be used together for the smaller children, and the envelope alone for the older ones.

Order as many of all these supplies as you will need. They will be sent, prepaid, free of charge. Address

Men As Trees Walking

A Study of the Healing Touch of Christ

One of the interesting features of Jesus' work of healing the sick is found in his occasional use of methods apparently taken from the therapeutical practice of his time. While it is true that great numbers of his cures were wrought without the use of any medium of operation or any significant action such as would suggest medical customs, still the latter have enough place in his ministry to make some consideration of their presence and their value worth while.

The most familiar and frequent of these was his touch. In many instances he laid his hand upon the sufferer and accomplished a cure. When the leper besought him to give him cleansing, saying, "Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean," Jesus responded, "I will; be thou made clean." Then he touched him, and he was restored to health. Peter's mother-in-law, sick of a fever in a house at Capernaum, was visited by the Master on that first great Sabbath of his ministry in Galilee. And when he saw her prostrate with the fever, he touched her first and then raised her up to health. Several blind men Jesus healed by the application of his hand. The man who was deaf and afflicted with stammering was brought back to health by the touch of Jesus.

In this last, and other cases as well, a still more elaborate program of action was used by the Master. In the one instance he put his fingers in the ears of the deaf man, touched his tongue, apparently with spittle, and pronounced the word "ephphatha," i. e. "be opened." In the case of another blind man he took him by the hand and led him out of the town. Then he put spittle upon his eyes and demanded whether or not he could see. When the blind man answered that he could see partially, but that men appeared like trees walking, Jesus further laid his hands on him and completed the cure. In still another instance he anointed the eyes of a blind man with clay made with spittle, and sent him to the pool of Siloan to wash. These are not the only instances in which Jesus used some remedial process or manipulation, but they are the chief cases and they invite consideration.

What was the value of such conduct on the part of Jesus? Did these actions actually have any remedial value? Why did Jesus choose this particular set of actions rather than others? What significance did he attach to the use of such methods? And do they imply some element of gradualness in the cures wrought by Jesus?

The most common of all Jesus' actions in healing was that of touching or laying hands upon the sick. In fact, so common was this method with the Lord that we read again and again that those who brought to him the sick for treatment asked that he might lay his hands upon them, apparently associating that action with his healing power. The healing touch has been practiced in all ages. Even primitive nations seem to attach to the touch of a king, a chieftain, or a holy man some healing powers. This tradition persisted until comparatively recent times. The touch of the king was believed to be a specific for one common form of disease. And undoubtedly it was effective to the extent that many believed themselves healed by such application of the royal hand. Otherwise, it is difficult to understand why the belief should have persisted. Among the Greeks and Romans the touch of one who was running in the sacred games was believed to cure women of barrenness. And the significance of the touch of the priest for purposes both of blessing and of healing is almost a commonplace of religious literature.

The use of spittle as a therapeutic agent is more difficult to trace, and yet is sufficiently familiar to students of antiquity to warrant us in believing that it was familiar in the days of Jesus. The practice of touching diseased parts with saliva is mentioned by Jewish as well as heathen authorities. Maimonides refers to the use of the spittle of a fasting person as an application to sore eyes likely to be effective as a cure, but forbids its use on the Sabbath day. Jesus' employment of this curious form of medical practice appears to have been in harmony with a fairly general opinion of its efficacy in his day.

The application of moisture, whether of moistened earth or of water, has probably been widely practiced among all eastern people, especially as a cure for diseases of the eye. The common occurrence of opthalmia through all levantine countries is one of the distressing features of the half-enlightened life of such nations. Perhaps blindness, partial or total, is the most common affliction of the hither Orient, and its chief causes are to be found in the hot climate and the absence of cleanliness. Christian missionaries find in their medical practice that many of these cases can be speedily cured by the simple process of washing the eyes. In other instances the value of cooling and moistened applications has been proved.

Was there any value, then, from the standpoint of medical practice in the use which Jesus made of these means? In the case of the application of the hand to the diseased part, it is difficult to see that there was any actual value in such contact. Similar and perhaps more positive would be one's judgment in connection with the use of spittle, common as the tradition regarding its efficacy appears to have been. The washings and anointings would have some value, undoubtedly. But probably Jesus' use of them was not suggested by their remedial character.

It seems clear that the employment by Jesus of such methods of dealing with the sick was for a totally different purpose. As we have seen in another study, there were some victims of weakness or other disorders whom Jesus restored to health by the arousal of their wills to coöperate with his own. An instance of this is to be seen in the man in the porch at Bethesda. Another is the man with the withered hand. Perhaps the one who was palsied and whom Jesus commanded to rise, take up his bed and depart to his house is another instance of the same sort.

It seems perfectly clear that if these works of healing were the direct forth-putting of that unique power which Jesus manifested on other occasions, he would never have resorted to the use of such inadequate and ineffective means of accomplishing his purpose. The fact that he did employ these practices in the particular instances cited, seems proof positive that they were not miracles in the sense in which the term may be used of other and more astonishing works of Jesus. It is impossible to connect the employment of any kind of apparatus or manipulations with a direct forth-putting of that marvelous power which we usually associate with miraculous cures.

Another question closely relates itself to these inquiries. The man whom Jesus restored to sight passed through a gradual process of recovery. He did not see clearly at first, but saw men as trees walking. Does this suggest a class of healings which were accomplished by gradual steps? This is the only clear instance of the kind, but our record of miracles must be understood to be partial and representative. Perhaps in other instances the impression of an instantaneous cure is gathered from the rapid portrayal of the scene, and actually includes a longer space of time than the narrative hints. Perhaps, also, Jesus employed the selective process in this as in other types of healing, and chose those whose quick recovery would be the best type of illustration of his recall of the soul from its diseased estate.

Such inquiries as have been raised in this study may easily seem useless to that type of mind that finds its chief satisfaction in marvel and portent. But those who are anxious to penetrate as deeply as possible into the mind of the Lord and to understand as fully as they may his ways of working with diseased and weakened human life, will spare no inquiry that seems to lead to a better comprehension of the unique many-sidedness of the Saviour's ministry. He evidently took men where he found them and made them go with him as far as they could by their own strength. Many of them he found could go all the way under his guidance. Others he had to assist by those powers concerning which we are yet to make inquiry.

With that type of mind which declines such studies on the ground that everything Jesus did was miracle, we have no controversy and little sympathy. The reality of Jesus' experience as an example for his brethren and disciples is made increasingly impressive by the careful scrutiny of all those gracious acts in virtue of which he became like unto his brethren, and among these there seems to be found a considerable place for the use of those values of suggestion and stimulation that are clearly implied in the Gospel records.

The Fight on Tuberculosis

The world has never seen so heartening a spectacle as that presented by the fight on tuberculosis. Great cataclysms of disaster have brought aid by the millions, but it has required the shock and sudden arousal of sympathy to open the hearts of generosity in such measure. Flood, famine, fire, earthquake, or massacre have electrified Christendom and it has poured out its bounties lavishly and often had an aftermath of complaint over misused funds and millions spent without adequate returns in human help. Today philanthropy is turning to preventive measures, and while great disasters will never cease to happen, perhaps, yet great organization, like the Red Cross, will be permanently organized and as ready for the emergency as is an ambulance corps or a fire department. Tomorrow, organizations like the Red Cross will not only be permanently organized, but they will have large memberships, like the Red Cross of Japan, with its more than a million, and they will also have endowments, doubtless, and will by these means be able to prevent great disaster to a degree unthought of today, and to deal with it effectively when it comes.

The fight on tuberculosis illustrates the tendency of the times toward prevention. It is no longer a matter for church charity, but one of universal public interest, and for state and municipal enactment and appropriation. Last year more than $8,000,000 was expended, and for this year the states and municipal appropriation alone amount to as large a sum. To this will be added a sum almost as great, doubtless, through sanatoriums, dispensaries and associations. Last year 117,312 cases were treated in institutions or by associations that were so organized that reprots were obtainable. Next year promises care for twice as many. Last year 10,000,000 separate pieces of literature were given out as part of a great public propaganda against the deadly tubercle. This year a much vaster volume will go out, for every newspaper and magazine in the land will publish the warnings and suggestions that experts prepare. The number of public exhibitions will doubtless increase also, and the multitudes that visit them will add millions to the number who are being educated, on how to avoid the disease. A wealthy gentleman has created a fund of $100,000 as a prize for the man who will discover an anti-toxin for the plague. With all direct measures taken is to be added the wave of education on behalf of and enthusiasm for the "fresh air" manner of life. The great battle on the deadly tenement and unsanitary factory is but begun, but it, too, must wax strong soon, and the foul breeding places of this, as well as all manner of disease be banished.

This is the most heartening spectacle the world has seen because it enlists the greater number of people in a definite humanitarian cause in the least spectacular way, and by the most deliberate methods the world has ever seen, and thus tells of how deeply the streams of true philanthropy are now flowing.

The Crusade for the Children

Another of the great crusades of our time that marks it an epoch in civilization, is the crusade for the children of the slums and the shops. This crusade has had much to do with the agitation for uniformity in state laws on things that concern all alike. This agitation will prove, as by fire, our double system of state and federal government. So long as the problem was political, the traditions held fast, but now that it grows increasingly social it changes base and there will be a new alignment. In the crusade for laws forbidding child labor for all under a certain age, and regulating it for all over that age, it was found that the state that made strictest provision for the welfare of the children was placed under the ban by the employers of child labor, and thus was handicapped in the competition for industrial development. If the laws were uniform in those states having the same problems, it would make enforcement easier and the knowledge that it was to be uniform would make enactment easier.

In the city of New York there are 11,000 tenements where licenses are given to do work at home. This license insures some sort of sanitary regulation, but has nothing to do with wage conditions. The children work cheaply for the reason that whatever they earn adds so much to the family income, and anything is better than nothing. In the factories they are satisfactory, not only because of low wages, but because they do not organize and protest or strike. It is now being discovered, however, that the youth of sixteen is more profitable than the younger children. He demands more wage, but he earns more for his dollar because of dependability, accuracy, and a plane of action more near absolute efficiency.

The back-wood people—the "poor white trash"—that crowd from the mountains of the Carolinas and Georgia into the cotton factory towns, doubtless live in better homes and live better than before, but their little children should not pay the price of this readjustment to better things. The families of the Irish and Italians in our tenements are larger than in the cabins and fields of the old countries, doubtless due to the increase in family income, but the children should not pay the price by becoming the chief factors for the earning of this increased income. The mortality in the tenements among children of six to the family is two and one-half times as great as among those of four.

Back to the Farm

There is much "back to the farm" agitation. The crowding into the cities brings distress to many, but it is the inevitable result of a readjustment in living conditions. There will be little gained in the effort to get people to go back to the country if that effort is confined to an attempt to breast the tide of the times cityword. When it begins to deal with the suburban home it will acquire some promise, perhaps. There are multitudes that would be individually benefitted by an opportunity to get into the country, but the increasing call of life is cityward. This is made inevitable by the growing complexity of commercial and industrial life. The more industry is specialized, and thus many brought together to complete the making of an article, and the more commerce is universalized, and thus our daily wants supplied from the ends of the earth, the more the processes of making and distributing our common goods will draw masses into closer habitations and the city population must increase over that of the country.

There is even doubt as to the efficiency of the agencies organized to put the man out of a job into the country. It does not seem to suit him. It deprives him largely of the customary crowds and excitements and seems to him so solitary that he would rather risk starvation than court plenty at that cost. The bureau organized by the New York Charity Organization Society reports that of 465 men sent out to country positions, three weeks was the average time they remained on their jobs. Only forty-one remained with their employers a year. Better positions were found by thirty-one, and twenty-six completed their jobs. It was worth while for the sake of these alone, but it illustrates the fact that not all who need help and will even accept it will be permanently helped. The average modern man does not hear the "call of the wild" so much as the call of the crowd.

Did the Liberals Win?

The net results of the British election are under debate. The question that interests the British public is, "Did the Liberals really win?" Of course there is no doubt about it in the mind of the ardent Liberal. The Liberal and Labor seats are in a considerable majority, and when the Irish are added, there is a large majority over the Unionists, as the Tories prefer to call themselves. But as to how far the Labor party will work with the Liberals, is regarded as problematical. To one so far removed from a close knowledge of those details that even earnest folk so often put before the essentials, it would appear that the Laborites must stand by the Government on every critical issue and keep them in power, because their only alternative is the Opposition, and that means the destruction of their cause. That they will lend all their power to compel the Ministry to grant radical legislation is to be expected, but for them to ruin the main chance of a favorable majority for the hazard of another election would seem partizan to a degree hardly to be expected. On the other hand, there are conservative Liberals who will have to be kept in line, and there will doubtless be trouble between them and the Laborites, for each will stand on the point of his advantage and chance the loss of all in the effort to claim what they think their hold as the balance of power ought to demand.

A greater problem is presented in the case of the Irish Nationalists. They are not necessarily Liberal any more than Tory on the main English issues, and, indeed, are strongly against some sections of the budget. But they know that the very name Unionist was coined to unite all those British elements that opposed Home Rule, and that for them to cause a dissolution would simply be to trade an offer of a large measure of Home Rule by the present majority for certain failure to obtain it if the Opposition gained in another election. Then the Irish know they will never obtain Home Rule until the veto power of the lords is removed. Thus their very cause demands that they make the coalition strong for the sake of removing the barrier of the lord's veto.

Thus it would seem that the Liberals did win, even though they have no more seats than the Tories, for their cause was that of both the Labor and Irish parties and the coalition is strongly in the majority. The lords can protest that it is not a real mandate from the people that they shall be mended, and refuse to bow and thus force the matter before the king with the alternative of having enough new peers appointed to give the Liberals a majority in that House or another election in which the issue will be more clearly that single issue alone, and an unmistakable mandate from the people. In the case the matter is sent to the king, it will be interesting to see whether he or the Ministry is really king, for he is reported as being disposed against radical measures.

Before the attempt to mend the lords must come the acceptance or defeat of the budget in parliament. To get to the issue of mending the lords the Irish must support the budget. Thus it would look like there was a close coalition of the three parties on the two main issues—those of the lords and the budget—and that both would be brought to a successful issue. Minor issues will not find so sure a union of strength. But it is to be hoped the main issues will be given right of way until they are settled once and forever.

A Modern St. Francis

There has been held in Chicago and Kansas City recently conventions of the unemployed. The daily press has derided them as "conventions of the hobos." Doubtless a very large number of the attendants were hobos, but many were not. There is always a considerable number of unemployed men in the cities. The times may be very prosperous and there may be even a demand for workers in this place and that and yet be many industrious men who are out of work. The problem is to get the man and the job together. England provides a system of employment bureaus and will so coördinate them as to send the man to the job. Germany is doing the same thing. These conventions ask for some such arrangement in this country. They also seek to discover means for getting the man out of a job a chance to get on a piece of undeveloped land somewhere.

The organizer of these conventions is James Eads Howe. He is a sort of modern St. Francis D'Asissi—a little brother to the "down-and out." He is the grandson of the famous Engineer Eads who built the Eads bridge at St. Louis, in its time the greatest in the world, and the famous Eads jetties in the lower Mississippi channel, that permit steady navigation of ocean steamers up to New Orleans. He was an earnest worker in slum missions, and came to the conclusion that the only way to give most effective help to the man on the lower margin was to become one with him, and thus know how to sympathize with him and to help himself. So when his inheritance —reported to have been some millions—came to him, he refused to accept it, and had a committee of welfare workers appointed to administer it for the good of humanity in those ways that most commended itself to their discretion, while he went on living his life of Tolstoian renunciation, carrying his dinner pail and seeking to help the needy by being one of them. He is a man of culture and good address and very modest in his deportment, ready to talk about the problem, but not about himself. He earns his bread and clothing by the sweat of his brow, living and dressing as a common laborer, and devotes himself to the study of the problem, the help of individuals in need, the agitating among them of means of self-help, and the attempt just now to organize the unemployed and establish employment bureaus under the projected organization that will enable the jobless man to get to the manless job.

There is nothing erratic about Mr. Howe's manner. He is not a crank nor an eccentric individual. He is an idealist who daringly tries to live out his ideal. If everybody did it, heaven would come down to earth, but when so few do it and it so ineffectively hitches up to the realities of the times, one wonders whether or not even Mr. Howe would not be more effective in his help of the man that is down and out if he used his fortune, its prestige, the example such a use of it would give, and utilized the machinery of our present day philanthropy in the task. As it is, he loses much power in loosing the sympathy of the powers acting for the better, and in such a case it may be that the best is the enemy of the better. Were he a man of such commanding genius and eminence as Tolstoi, his renunciation would so overtop the conventions of the time that his very protest would most effectively bring good. Yet it is good to have such idealists and to once in a generation find a man who takes his ideals so extremely and so seriously. He becomes a sort of iron tonic of self-sacrifice to supply a needed element in the social body which, in its very goodness, is liable to be smug and satisfied.

Temperance Notes

Ohio has convicted a drummer for even soliciting orders for whisky in prohibition territory. Get a state 90 per cent "dry" as Ohio is, and law can be enforced.

Governor Hay of Oregon sent a telegram of congratulation to his home town when it voted out the saloons. There is one official who does not think it necessary to pander the liquor interests to be a success in politics.

Since the peaceful strike in Sweden 20,000 strikers have met in mass-meeting and demanded nation-wide prohibition.

Mayor Love of Lincoln, Neb., says it was easier to close the saloons at 7 p. m. than at 11:30. He also says there is less illegal selling of liquor since the city went "dry" than there was under license.

Five leading Catholic societies, with an aggregate membership of 500,000, debar all engaged in the liquor trade from their membership.

The report of the U. S. Commissioner of Education on crime states that it is undeniable that 80 per cent of criminality is acknowledged by its perpetrators to be traceable to drinking.

A Classic Illustration

Our recent editorial studies of the Disciples' need of a truly representative convention will recall to the minds of many readers the classic illustration of our impotence to express our co-operation in a movement that represented the very genius of our history. We refer, of course, to the matter of church federation—a cause notable for its promotion of the principles for which the Disciples have stood and which gradually made its way into the good will and acceptance of nearly all religious bodies of America. The Disciples, when they understood themselves and their mission in the world, were heartily in favor of the federation movement. Yet they had no way of giving effective expression to their sentiments. Whenever it was proposed to consider the question in our conventions, those who were opposed to federation raised the cry that the matter was outside the jurisdiction of the conventions. They insisted that since these conventions were voluntary gatherings called by the different missionary boards for specific missionary ends, it was impossible to consider any extraneous theme.

We are waiving now the whole question of the disingenuousness of this plea, as a mere pretext to prevent the brotherhood from giving endorsement to a movement which some of our brethren conceive to be a dangerous recognition of other religious bodies. What we wish to point out is the fact that upon the same basis our present organization would limit us forever from the expression of opinion upon any question not directly related to missions. Much more truly would it prevent us from ever taking official action such as the acceptance of a great gift or the registering of an important conviction by the brotherhood would require.

For these reasons and others that grow impressive upon consideration it seems necessary that the Disciples should hasten their adoption of a plan of delegate and representative national conventions.

The Daily Altar in Real Life

The editors of The Christian Century have frequent occasion to smile at certain of their wise friends who profess to be able to assign the articles on our editorial pages to the proper author. The junior editor gets not a little flattery from some of these "higher criticisms" and he fears his colleague must be frequently embarrassed by our readers' errors. While as a rule we prefer our utterances to be the voice of the Christian Century, and not of an individual, there is one department whose authorship the junior editor's conscience must not allow any reader to credit to him. We refer to that rich and suggestive page "The Daily Altar." This is altogether the work of Professor Willett. If there are any hands that have part in its preparation beside his they are the hands of members of his own family. This rich collection of poem and prayer and Scripture is not made with an author's fiat but has been growing through the years in the actual experience of daily family worship in the household of Dr. and Mrs. Willett. Their three splendid boys, all of them directing their purposes toward the Christian ministry, are the best argument we can make for maintaining an altar to God in the family circle. We are glad to receive from our readers so many assurances that this new department fills with them a long-felt want. C. C. M.

As To Our Consistency

The editorials in The Christian Century on baptism and Christian union have called out a phenomenal response from our readers and many interesting comments from the religious press. Throughout the brotherhood of the Disciples there is an ill-concealed impatience with the dogmatic presentation of immersion. Nowhere are our ministers suggesting a change in the practice of immersion only, but many of them do chafe under the necessity of giving a dogmatic, a sectarian, reason for the practice.

That we should give space to the thoughtful article by Mr. Boren, pastor at Vacaville, California, will, no doubt, call down criticism upon the heads of the editors from those who insist upon having only one side of a question stated in the columns of their paper. The policy of The Christian Century is to hear all sides of any question that seems to us vital enough to discuss.

Mr. Boren has had the temerity to address himself to the most vexing question with which the Disciples have had to contend during their entire history. It is our perennial question. Our religious neighbors never cease taunting us with it, and from our own ranks there are continually arising vigorous voices calling us to see this inconsistency.

The fact that the Disciples as a body move right on in the practice of immersion only, is at once a reflection on their logical sense and a clue to their deeper, though, perhaps, less conscious conception of their mission. For the fact is that if our practice of immersion only, rests upon the dogma usually offered in support of it, the Disciples, protesting against any human creed as a test of fellowship, are made to appear in an inconsistency so obvious as to render their "plea" a mere irritation of other Christian people. In this Mr. Boren is right.

But the contention of The Christian Century is that the Disciples, as such, have nothing to do with the baptismal dogma as an article of a creed. The Baptists will take care of that. They were making it their business before we came upon the scene. They are still keen for the controversy. They say, We understand the Bible to teach immersion and nothing but immersion, and we refuse fellowship to anybody who is not immersed.

But the Disciples are not Baptists. The Baptists justify denominationalism—tolerate it at any rate. But the Disciples abhor denominationalism. They believe it is wrong that the church should be divided over the baptism question, or any other question. They believe that love should have found a way to prevent such a division. They believe, moreover, that love can find a way to reunite the broken church just so soon as the ear of the church once fairly catches the words of her Lord, praying "that they all may be one."

In sheer love the Disciples of Christ have been seeking a way to unite Baptists on the one hand, and Congregationalists, Presbyterians and the rest on the other hand. Our proposal to practice immersion only is not made simply because we believe the Scriptures demand that and nothing else. That would be dogmatism. It would be making a creed of our understanding of the Scriptures. It is the blunder every sect has made for centuries.

The Disciples are not dogmatists. They are statesmen in the business of Christian unity. We are not proposing a creed—our understanding of what the Scriptures teach. With the presupposition of Christian love, we are proposing a platform—our understanding of what will bring unity out of division.

There will be many to whom this platform for the unity of all believers is also a personal creed. There will be others among the Disciples, like the honored veteran, A. B. Jones, whose communication appears on another page, who preach and practice immersion only, not because they believe it is especially pleasing to God, but because any other practice is divisive of God's people.

That a far larger number of ministers and laymen among the Disciples than is commonly supposed think of the subject in this way is revealed in our recent correspondence. And against those who thus sanction the practice of immersion only, for the sake of unity, whether such practice coincide with their personal creed or not, we say that the charge of inconsistency cannot stand.

The Sterner Side of Discipleship

Does the sterner side of discipleship fail to receive the emphasis it deserves in the preaching of the church? Does the impression ever get abroad that it does not mean much to make the good confession? Are we saying that in the days when men were persecuted and put to death for the faith it was a serious matter to be a member of the church, but that in these days of peace, membership in a church involves no hardship? If these questions be answered in the affirmative, we must say that the church needs to study anew the call of its Master to discipleship. We are invited to become disciples of Jesus that we may do his work. That work can never be done by lovers of ease and pleasure. Moral heroism is as much needed today as it ever was, and the church that does not expect it of its members is not worthy to wear the Master's name. It has no vision and it cannot be a force for righteousness.

That Jesus discouraged an enthusiast by reminding him of the hardships involved in discipleship, is a fact that is easily overlooked by the zealous preacher. We allow ourselves to fall into the habit of minimizing the duties of a Christian in order to increase the list of members and add to the financial strength of the church. We talk to men about their own souls when we ought to lay upon their hearts the needs of the world. We fondle and coddle the weak when we ought to show them Christian love by putting them to the hardest kind of work. There are too many disciples that long for the big church and little work rather than for the place of the most fruitful service. They go to the town where the big church is, that their children may have all possible advantages, but they miss the opportunity of giving their children the greatest gift, an example of heroism. The church with a large membership is to be chosen if it increases our power for good; if the small church can give us the largest exercise of our faith and courage and promises the richest returns, then duty calls it. Not comfort but service is the aim of a disciple.

The disciple does the unusual. In the time of Jesus there was no need to exhort the people to bury their dead. Everybody knew what was due to the body of a relative. And there were many other requirements of the moral law that had found embodiment in firmly established customs. It was the business of the disciples to emphasize aspects of truth that had not found embodiment in customs. To advocate new ways of thinking and acting was to invite persecution. Men do not like to be disturbed. They identify the truth with what is customary. The "gospel" is that which they have always heard. They do not like to admit that they have heard only part of the Lord's message. They make it uncomfortable for the preacher who dares to introduce a new idea. But this is just what the true preacher will do. He is not called to flatter the vanity and prejudice of his hearers. His cross is prepared by men who have decided that no man shall preach to them an idea which they never heard before. As citizens and as Christians we have many good customs which we must preserve in order to save the nation and the church from ruin, but it is folly to suppose that we are using in our conduct all available truth. New ways of thinking and acting must be introduced and it will cost something to introduce them.

The ties of friendship and of kinship may furnish the occasion for heroism. The disciple who wished to bid farewell to those at his house was in danger of being held back by home ties from following Jesus. The time may come when we must choose between our own convictions of duty and those of father and mother. Much as the disciple honors his father and mother, he cannot do what he thinks is wrong because they ask him to do it, and he cannot reject the call of Jesus for the sake of their opinions. To find fault with Jesus' call to forsake father and mother is to find fault with the moral sense of man. Morality is a matter of choice and no one can choose for another. As long as there is progress, there will be differences of opinion in families. These differences may be serious. If all the members possess the spirit of Jesus, the ties of affection will not be broken. But blindness and self-will have not disappeared from the earth, and these may yet compel the disciple to forsake home and kindred for the sake of living out his convictions. But more often it is the kindness of kindred and friends that leads to surrender of convictions. Their friendliness causes us to forget that they have no moral earnestness and unconsciously we fall into their easy ways of living.

The Laying On Of Hands

By David Smith, D. D.

I have been asked, "Is it possible that the Holy Spirit was transmitted to people through the laying on of the hands of Peter and John? Acts 8:17." The key to the significance of the passage and others like it is the fondness of the emotional Orientals for symbolic action. "The Arab," writes Mr. P. G. Baldensperger (P. E. F.

Quarterly Statement, July, 1906, pp. 190 f.), "at times so sober in words, and at times overflowing with voluble language, whether for praise or (more especially) for insult, indulges in much mimicry, and employs a language of signs with his hands, feet, and face. . . . Denial can be expressed by an action, viz., by shaking the index-finger of the right hand from left to right several times. 'No!' would be slightly throwing the head backwards. 'Yes!' throwing the head forward, or shutting the eyes a few times in quick succession. . . . Beckoning with the hand palm downwards, is 'come'; throwing the fingers forwards in the same position is 'go.' Holding the beard and gazing steadfastly means, 'I swear by my beard.' . . . When Nehemiah made the rulers of Jerusalem promise to restore the unjust money which they had exacted from their brethren, he says, 'I shook my lap and said, "So may God shake out every man from His house, and from His labor, that performeth not this promise"' (Neh. 5:13)." This Oriental manner appears frequently on the pages of Holy Scripture, both the Old Testament and the New. When Ezekiel would intimate the impending destruction of Jerusalem, he took a tile and portrayed upon it a city and all the enginery of a vigorous siege—towers, mound, camp, and battering-rams (Ezek. 4:1-3). And when Agabus would warn St. Paul of the doom which awaited him at Jerusalem, he took the Apostle's girdle and bound therewith his own hands and feet, announcing: "Thus saith the Holy Ghost, So shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man that owneth this girdle." And Jesus, ever anxious to reach men's hearts, employed the manner of His contemporaries even as He spoke their language. One instance is His smearing of the blind man's eyes in Jerusalem (John 9:6-7). It was a parable of the blindness which had happened unto Israel, and a satire upon her teachers, those blind guides of the blind. Other instances are the triumphal entry and the feet-washing in the Upper Room, and again His breathing on the Apostles when He said, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost" (John 20:22). You see, then, the meaning of the apostolic imposition of hands. It is a symbolic action, characteristically Oriental. It is customary, at all events in Presbyterian churches, for the minister to dismiss the congregation with a benediction, raising his hand over them as he pronounces it. And the blessing comes, not by the formula or the symbol, but in response to the faith of the worshippers. The practice of "the laying on of hands" is a mere survival of Orientalism, and the idea that there is spiritual efficacy in it is nothing short of comical. It is a flagrant example of mistaking accident for essence. You want more than a camel's skin and a leathern girdle to make you a John the Baptist, and more than unkempt locks to make you a Tennyson. If imitation be the sincerest form of flattery, it is at the same time a cruel penalty of greatness; for the imitator is an unconscious caricaturist, missing the essential qualities and reproducing the superficial eccentricities. One of the saintliest of the Scottish preachers of last generation, whose memory is still fragrant in the land, had a weak voice, and his delivery was a sort of intonation. His saintliness, however, lent a charm to his defect, and it was with him as with Hotspur:—

"Speaking thick, which Nature made his blemish, Became the accents of the valiant."

He had a crowd of imitators, who, destitute of his spirituality, copied his speech and caught his "whine," mistaking drivelling unctuousness for heavenly unction. The human mind is obstinately prone to miss the living and eternal spirit and see only its transient and accidental embodiment. This is the blunder of ritualism. Regarding John 20:23: Observe that the promise is preceded by the command: "Receive the Holy Spirit." So long and so far as they are enlightened and guided by His Spirit, believers are the earthly representatives and vicegerents of their Risen Lord. I once was introduced to a stranger whose face wore a hard look, a sort of sullen scowl; but I found presently that he was suffering from facial paralysis. His look was no index of his mind. He had in truth a gentle soul, and his kindly thoughts would naturally have irradiated his face; but the line of communication had been broken. And so we must keep in vital contact with Christ, and then our lives will throb responsive to His touch.

Biblical Problems

By Professor Willett

Why are the wells, mentioned in the story of the patriarchs (Genesis 26), made so important in the narratives?

G. M.

The Hebrews were a shepherd people. In Palestine and especially in the arid regions to the South, where Abraham and Isaac resided during most of their lives, water is not abundant and the flocks were dependent upon wells for water. Every well was, therefore, a precious possession as much to be coveted as a gold mine in our western country or a diamond mine in South Africa. Such property was an object of constant watchfulness, and the cause of frequent jealousies and recriminations on the part of the desert dwellers. No one who has journeyed in those lands can fail to understand how inestimable is the value of such a well. Mohamet's wise saying will be recalled: "If you wish a monument that posterity will not forget, dig a well"

Why, in Exodus 32 and 333 does the Lord say to Moses "I will send an angel before thee and drive out the Canaanites", etc? Were the children of Israel really God's favored nation, or was it only this interpretation which the Hebrews put upon their national experience? F. M. G.

From the standpoint of human history the Hebrews were one of those races which at various times have overrun and possessed themselves of Palestine. Long before their time other races had done the same thing; and at the period when the Hebrews entered Canaan they found it occupied by such a mixtures of populations as gave rise to that sevenfold enumeration of foreign peoples which occurs so often in the Old Testament and which the narrators of Hebrew victories must have repeated with delight. From the standpoint of human history the Hebrews had exactly the same rights to Palestine that the Goths and Vandals had to Italy, or the Normans to England, or the Spanish, French, English and Dutch to America. No more; no less. It was the right of superior power, not of any moral claim. But out of that history there came such notable disclosures of the divine purpose owing to the ability of the Hebrew prophets to interpret the will of God to their people, that all the world has been blessed by the results; and in the long arbitrament of history we may believe that God's will was, in a measure, accomplished in the record of Israel's life. God has no favorite nations. More than one prophet tried to persuade the incredulous Hebrews that the Egyptians, Babylonians and Philistines were as dear to God as they were, and this is the great truth which the New Testament makes emphatic. The Hebrews were, however, the one people who were sufficiently sensitive to the call of the divine in that early age to be able to utter through the discipline of the centuries the message which the world needed to hear. They were the best nation that could be chosen for the purpose of giving the divine word to the world, just as the apostles were the best men Jesus could find to perform the work of messengers.

Why did Aaron make the image of a golden calf for the people of Israel to worship when Moses was on the Mount?

Chicago. A. G. H.

Our information is comparatively scanty regarding the events prior to the entrance of the Hebrews into Canaan. But the reasons for the particular form of deity which Aaron is said to have prepared may lie in the fact that the Egyptians were worshipers of the sacred bull, great numbers of which have been found embalmed in subterranean tombs of elaborate construction. Another reason has been found in the fact that the cognizance or emblem of the tribe of Ephraim, the strongest of the clans of Israel, was a bull or ox. Jeroboam, the first king of the northern tribes, set up images of Jehovah in the form of golden bulls at Bethel and Dan, and the favorite term for northern Israel in the language of more than one of the prophets is "bullock" or "heifer." These facts may or may not have had a bearing upon the form of the image in the Wilderness.

You were asked a short time ago if there were any contemporary references to Jesus apart from the Gospels. Permit me to refer to one or two which you overlooked. The "Christians" are referred to in Lucian in his "Alexander" or "False Prophet," sections 25 and 38. In the latter they are classed with atheists. The best passage, however, is in "The Death of Peregrinus," sections 11 and 13. In section 11 Lucian says that Peregrinus "learned the wonderful wisdom of the Christians by associating with their priests in Palestine, and they (the Christians) still worship that great man who was crucified in Palestine, because he introduced into life a new religious rite."

In section 13, however, Lucian says that the Christians "have persuaded themselves that they will be immortal and live for all time," and "this first law-giver persuaded them that they were brothers of one another"—further that "they hold everything in common." These are merely some suggestive phrases from interesting and valuable passages.

Our One Inconsistency

A Disciple Pastor Writes Thoughtful Inquiries on Baptism

By Frank E. Boren

It is becoming increasingly apparent to many thoughtful minds among us, that if our historic position on baptism were re-examined in the light of modern scholarship, we could not be as "dead sure" as we once were that we are right. The Bible is sacred literature, not statutory law. Jesus is a life-giver, not a law-giver. Our whole viewpoint and method have changed, and with the change comes the doubt as to whether our historic contention can be defended. If the Christian world is to take our plea for union seriously, we must either remove inconsistency, or show more clearly than we have done before that none exists.

It was the unanimous testimony at Pittsburg that "for this one purpose were we born" that we might plead for Christian union. The basis of union was just as unanimously declared to be, "personal faith in and loyalty to the person, Jesus Christ." This is a decided advance, by way of an ampler interpretation in the light of a better scholarship of what is implicit in the old. From the religion of a book we have passed to the religion of a person. Thomas Campbell did, indeed, plead for loyalty to Christ, but his viewpoint was different. Then, Christ was valued because he gave us an authoritative book; today we value the Bible because it gives us an authoritative Christ. It is no longer, "Where the Bible speaks," but "Where Christ speaks." Above all, it is what Christ was and is that is important.

The Supremacy of Christ.

The modern emphasis upon the supremacy of Christ is indeed implicit in the Declaration and Address, is in true accord with the spirit of Mr. Campbell, and with the true logic of his plea; but can we say that Dr. Fairbairn, in his "Place of Christ in Modern Theology," only echoed what we have always taught? Pittsburg of 1909 had learned much from Fairbairn, and others of his kind; but Fairbairn learned very much from Pittsburg of 1909. Thomas Campbell would have appreciated, as few of us do, the significance of the advance that has been made. And, how he would have rejoiced in it!

In the Declaration and Address there is a fundamental truth, and a fundamental error. The truth is this, that we are, "to think and act for ourselves; to see with our own eyes, and to take all our measures directly and immediately from the Divine Standard," and "as no man can be judged for his brother, so no man can judge for his brother." Every man to interpret the Bible for himself, as best he can, no man judging his brother if he interpret differently, or making his own interpretations a test of fellowship, this is certainly a broad basis of union. If we make Christ the "Divine Standard," and let every man interpret Christ for himself, we are indeed standing on catholic ground. This is the true logic of Pittsburg, both of 1809 and of 1909.

The error is this, that "human opinions," as expressed in creeds, are purely "inventions of men," and intended as substitutes for the Bible, and that one who accepts a creed thereby rejects the Bible. We say, somewhat gratuitously, that we have no creed—we go by the Bible. In our insistence on immersion, we are only sticking to "the plain statements of God's word," while sprinkling and pouring are "inventions of men." At least, this is the application that has been made of Mr. Campbell's principle. The question of baptism was not in his mind when the principle first found expression.

But what is the fact? The Bible must be interpreted. We must inquire what it means. Creeds are simply interpretations of the Bible. Whether correct or incorrect, they are attempts to set forth concisely what the Bible teaches. If they are not tests of fellowship, they are just as valuable as Errett's "Our Position," or Alexander Campbell's" Christian System." Isaac Errett, by the way, raised a storm when he wrote "Our Position." A zealous editor wrote: "There is not a sound man in our ranks who has not felt scandalized by it. I wish we possessed even one decent apology for its appearance. It is a deep offense against the brotherhood—an offense tossed into the teeth of a people who, for forty years, have been working against the divisive and evil tendency of creeds—the brethren may call their work in classic phrase a 'synopsis,' or gently a 'declaration,' but we still cry a creed, a creed—a creed without the appropriate label, a genuine snake in the grass, wearing a honeyed name." The storm gradually subsided when Mr. Errett explained that his creed was not to be made a test of fellowship, but was intended, like the writings of his zealous accuser, to set forth concisely what our position is.

Creeds Not "Inventions of Men."

That creeds, even unwritten ones, may be so used as to make void the word of God, there can be little doubt; but they are not "inventions of men." They are simply attempts to make the Bible mean more to men.

They are "human interpretations"; but pray, what kind of an interpretation can that be which is not a human one? Shall we trust to some "divine inner light" to infallibly interpret Scripture for us? We may believe with Mr. Errett, that "the Spirit that indited the word can best bring home to the heart the significance of its truths," but this does not excuse us from using our faculties, and from examining the Scriptures in the light of the best scholarship. Whatever canons of interpretation we may apply, or however correct may be our conclusions, the result is a human interpretation.

It would seem, then, that our conclusion that immersion alone is baptism, is a human interpretation, which we are making a test of fellowship in our churches, and by some a test of federation. When we set ourselves up as judges, and say that one who has been sprinkled has "violated the express letter of the law," are we not ourselves guilty, to quote Mr. Campbell again, "of an express violation of the law of Christ, a daring usurpation of his throne, and gross intrusion upon the rights and liberties of his subjects?" Should we not "beware of such things—keep at the utmost distance from everything of this nature; and, knowing the judgment of God against them that commit such things, neither do the same ourselves, nor have pleasure in them that do them?" This is our one inconsistency which is hard to explain to the Christian world.

Change of Views Today.

After all, is our interpretation free from criticism, when examined in the light of the modern view of the Bible? We do not speak so much today of the "law of pardon," or the "terms" of salvation. It seems far less probable than ever before that Jesus could have been as much concerned about the form of baptism as we once supposed. Such a conception is out of place. It does not fit in well with our general view of Christ. It seems far more probable that the question of the form of baptism never entered his mind, or had any part in his plans.

Only twice does he mention baptism, except in figures of speech. The passage in Mark is of doubtful manuscriptal authority, and the passage in Matthew is not unquestioned, as giving us the exact words of Jesus. But granting the genuineness of both, is not the essential meaning, "He that believeth and dedicates his life to me shall be saved"? Jesus adopted baptism just as he adopted the language of the people, and this was its current valuation. "Born of water" may refer to baptism; but is it not the spiritual valuation of the act that Jesus has in mind? Can we suppose that Jesus meant baptism, much less any particular form, to be a sine qua non of salvation? His use of the word was very much like ours when we say, "Let's shake hands, and be friends." It is the spiritual valuation of the word in current usage that we have in mind. It is what it stands for that is important. True, we do not naturally omit the formal act of grasping the hand, without good reason; but no one thinks of this act as in any sense a "law of pardon." In other countries where hand shaking is not a custom, we might have the same spiritual value in another form. Even in this country we sometimes "kiss and make up."

Meaning of Baptism.

The contention of such books as Campbell's and Briney's, that immersion alone is baptism, hinges very largely on the meaning of baptizo. It means immerse, they say, and cannot be translated sprinkle or pour. But this is fighting a straw man. It cannot be translated immerse. Few would defend Mr. Campbell's translation today. If the transliteration of the word is "the greatest dishonesty that ever cursed the world," then the same charge must be brought against the revisers of 1881-84 and 1900, among whom were several Baptists. Mr. Aylesworth has reminded us that baptism is essentially a spiritual act. The greek word means far more than immerse. Indeed, this more had become of such importance, and was so suggested by the word in the usage of Christ's day, that the idea of form had almost passed from it. To translate it immerse is to empty it of its spiritual value, and emphasize a form. This, Jesus certainly did not intend, but seems rather to have sought to avoid, even by his use of this particular word. Very much of the elaborate and learned discussion as to the meaning of baptizo would be eliminated from the problem today, as having no bearing on it.

When we invite a friend to become our guest, informing him that we have an extra bed and plate, he understands the word plate in its representative capacity. If we really paid a dollar for the plate, at the banquet, we should pay dearly, for the plate could be purchased for ten cents. It is what the plate stands for that is important. We are not really thinking of the plate at all. No more may we suppose that Jesus was thinking of immersion, or sprinkling, or pouring, when he spoke of baptism. It was because of its representative value that it is nearly always mentioned in Acts, even when faith is not mentioned. To suppose that Paul took as much pains to explain the significance and importance of baptism, wherever he went, as some modern evangelists do, is to attribute our thinking to the apostolic age, in a manner which out-does what the critics tell us some of the Bible writers do, in attributing their thinking to the patriarchs.

When Paul speaks of "one baptism," are we to suppose that he had in mind a controversy over the form, even by way of remote anticipation? More likely Paul meant that as there was only one Lord, there could be but one baptism—the sweetly solemn dedication of our lives to him. Some were not baptized into Paul, others into Apollos, and others into Cephas; all were baptized into the "one Lord and faith."

Again, in the incidental reference of Paul to a burial, are we to suppose that baptism was instituted for the express purpose of symbolizing the burial of Christ? Was this its primary and intended symbolism? Or did the customary practice merely furnish Paul with a convenient illustration of the truth which was in his mind? Certainly, it is not the question of baptism that he is discussing, but union with Christ. Its mention is purely incidental.

Jesus and the Eunuch.

That Jesus and the Eunuch were immersed seems to admit of little doubt, and that by his act Jesus gave his approval to the prevailing custom, which was probably immersion, need not be questioned; still it was for the spiritual value of the act that he observed it, and there may be an implicit approval of other ways of expressing the same spiritual purposes. That his act indicates a fixed practice for that time, or was intended to set a fixed practice for all times and circumstances, is open to some doubt.

These arguments, which are not presented dogmatically, are not intended to discredit immersion, but to raise the question as to whether "our interpretation" rests upon a secure enough foundation to justify us in making immersion a requirement for membership in our churches. Is not our emphasis upon the form out of harmony with the whole spirit of Christianity? It is said that all could agree on immersion. Well, some honest men, do not believe that immersion is the best form for all circumstances, and for a general practice. To adopt it exclusively would seem to them like laying undue emphasis upon a form, would seem somewhat in the nature of compromise, and a surrender of their liberty in Christ. We have not done full justice to those who hold that the form of baptism is a matter of liberty.

The question is, are we consistent, or right, in making our views of baptism a test of fellowship? If "personal faith in and loyalty to the person, Jesus Christ," be the real basis of union, shall we, or shall we not unite, in the fullest way, with those who are as loyal as we are, and who in sincerity of purpose dedicate their lives to Christ, regardless of the way in which that life purpose is formally expressed? Is it the spiritual fact and life, or the way in which the fact is formally expressed, that is to be the basis of fellowship?

Christ's Supremacy Acknowledged.

As several speakers at Pittsburg pointed out, the supremacy of Christ, as the basis of fellowship, is practically the position of nearly all denominations of Christians today. Few churches make their creeds a basis of fellowship. At least this is true in theory. The Presbyterian church holds the Westminster Confession as a provisional statement of its faith, but does not make more than "personal faith in and loyalty to the person, Jesus Christ," a requirement for membership. This is where Mr. Campbell stood one hundred years ago, and where he pleaded for the Presbyterian church to stand. He was a Calvinist to the day of his death, but would not make his creed a basis of fellowship.

Strange irony of fate! Mr. Campbell would be received by the Presbyterians today, upon the basis of the Declaration and Address; but he would not be received by us! When he wrote the famous document, he had never been immersed, did not think it made any difference, and when he was immersed, some four years later, it was purely a voluntary act on his part which he had no thought of requiring of others. If Thomas Campbell had been at Pittsburg in 1909, holding the same views on baptism which he held in 1809, he would not have been one of us! Had he attended the great communion service, near the very spot where, a hundred years ago, he so generously invited those of other communions to partake of the Lord's Supper with him, he would have "neither been invited, nor debarred." He would have partaken, if at all, as an outsider!

In justice, be it said that Mr. Campbell would have felt very much at home in Pittsburg in 1909, for no people have so fully partaken of his spirit; but still, would he not have looked upon our position on baptism, in the light of the present time, as being now our one inconsistency?

Alexander Campbell said that he could not be a party man, "because no party will receive into communion all whom God would receive into heaven." Have we the party spirit?

Loyalty to Christ.

Loyalty to Christ demands that his will be done. I should be the last to advocate any practice not in harmony with his will. We must do his will in regard to baptism. But his will is not expressed in statutory law. He did not legislate concerning the organization of a church, not even as to the condition of membership, beyond "personal faith in and loyalty to Himself." His will is expressed in the spirit of his life; in the great principles of brotherly love; in his earnest protests against Pharisaism; in his supreme emphasis upon spiritual values; in his all-embracing love; in his recognition of good everywhere, even in a heretical Samaritan; in his prayer for union, of which his own unity of purpose, thought, and desire with his Father was a type; in the Lord's prayer, so universal and sublime. Let his will be done. But, let us raise the question, "are we doing it in making immersion a test of fellowship?" Let the question not be decided hastily. Let it be answered on our knees. It may be that our very faith in Christ is on trial as we begin our second century. Let his will be done.

Frank E. Boren, Pastor, Vacaville, California.

What Can Be Done?

What can be done, if the position of this article is not rank heresy? I am no program-maker. Christian union will come by education and growth. If we have been wrong here, it will require much patient education to set us right. Still, we must face the question. We cannot force union. Hasty action may cause disruption in our ranks. It does seem to me, however, that this at least might be done speedily, that we refrain from spending money in establishing churches in over-churched communities, and that our scattered members in such communities be urged to join other churches. Much of our home missionary money might well be spent on the foreign field, or in a different way at home. Perhaps, too, small societies of Congregationalists and Disciples might be united in some places. What more can be done time and education can decide.

Brethren, I have spoken my heart—a heart, may I say that thrills with love for the great people represented at Pittsburg, and beating in responsive sympathy with their great aims. The work of Thomas Campbell I regard with emotion too sacred to be called denominational pride. I may be wrong. If so, as I have very lovingly spoken my heart; will you not just as lovingly set me right?

The Program of Missions

Our Lord not only gave the church its "Marching Orders," He also dictated the Line of March, when He said: "And Ye Shall be My Witnesses both in Jerusalem, and in All Judea and in Samaria and unto the Uttermost Part of the Earth." According to these orders the church is not to begin "on the run" and work "toward the hub" but "beginning at Jerusalem" the home center she is to work toward the circumference until the gospel is "preached among all nations."

Austin Phelps exclaims: "If I were a missionary in Canton, China, my first prayer every morning would be for the success of American home missions for the sake of Canton, China." Twenty years ago Dr. R. S. Storrs wrote from Italy: "The future of the world is pivoted on the question whether the Protestant churches of America can hold, lighten, purify the people born or gathered into its great compass."

Ex-President Harrison in his classic address on Missions spoke this significant sentence: "The greatest need of the foreign field is a revised, reconsecrated, unified home church." This should appeal as a vital fact to a people whose plea is "The union of the Church of God in order to the Christian Conquest of the World."

Hard Reading

A Day of Light Reading.

REV. SMITH BAKER, D. D.

The intellectual weakness of the present time seems to be "light reading." Not simply reading upon trifling and unimportant subjects, but easy and superficial reading upon important and profound questions. With all the blessings which newspapers and cheap magazines have brought to society in the spread of intelligence among the people—and no one can measure their power in popular education—still they have a tendency to substitute light for hard reading.

He who reads only the newspapers and magazines will never be a learned or profound thinker. It takes hard reading to develop the mind and develop thought in any department of mental life. It is not simply reception, but exercise that develops the mind. Reading which does not make one think may be interesting and may impart some information, but it will not strengthen the mental powers. A superficial education is not necessarily one that is narrow, but one that is shallow. A great many weak-minded men are very intelligent in a superficial sense; while many men of far less general information are strong-brained and profound thinkers because they have traveled less and thought more. The great value of a college education is not in the amount one learns, but in the mental discipline which comes from hard study. Every young woman knows that it is not easy music that brings out her possibilities and develops her skill, but that which is hard to master. The difficult music makes the artist.

More Intelligence but Less Solidity.

There is doubtless much more general intelligence than there used to be, but we question whether there is as much clear and solid thinking among the people, and the superficial character of the popular reading explains it.

We recently visited a well-to-do and intelligent family, where there is a daughter of seventeen and a son of fifteen. There was evidence of culture and refinement, and there was a good sized library of between three and four hundred volumes. In looking over the books we found that four-fifths of them were fiction, and the most of them of the popular, cheap kind. There were very few standard or classical works of merit, save a dictionary and encyclopedia. Upon such mental food are those children fed—like bringing up their bodies on ice cream and angel cake. Unless they change their mental diet their minds will be no stronger when they are forty than they are now, for the mind must think, and must be compelled to think hard in order to grow.

As Applied to Ministers.

This long introduction is only for a short sermon to ministers. We frequently enter a minister's study and find that most of his books upon religious subjects are commonplace books, interesting to read and more or less instructive, but written by ordinary men upon ordinary topics, and easy reading, requiring no more effort than the reading of a common story. There are pleasant chapters by pleasant writers; good books for laymen; but not the mental food that makes strong preachers. Four-fifths of the good books upon religious questions are poor food for a preacher to live on. A minister who must constantly produce something for the people to hear needs above all other men to read that which is hard to read, that which makes his brain tired. The preacher who reads only common religious books will preach only commonplace sermons. A man never rises in thought higher than his best reading. A minister more than any one else needs to read what will wake up his mind and stretch his thinking.

What it Will do for the Preacher.

By "hard reading" we mean that which frequently compels a second reading. We do not mean that which is obscure, but that which is profound; a little hard metaphysics, or severe logic, or studied philosophy. It may not pertain at all to the subject one is to speak upon, but it will so make one think that the mind will work quicker and deeper upon the chosen topic. Most ministers have times in the preparation of a sermon when the thoughts come slowly and the mind almost refuses to work. When such a time comes do not try to think, but take some hard reading that almost makes the head ache, and it will lift the mind into action and thoughts will begin to flow. As has been said, such reading may have nothing to do with the chosen subject, but it stirs the mind out of its sluggish mood. At such a time read a chapter from Jonathan Edwards on "The Nature of Virtue," and whether you agree with him or not it will so stretch your brain to follow his argument that it will be easy to think out your sermon. Or read a chapter from Samuel Harris' "Self-revealing God," and when you have finished it the wheels of the brain will be so in motion that thinking will be easy.

It is hard reading which makes not only easy thinking but deeper thinking, and it is thus that the mind grows. Of course, so far as is consistent, keep up with the times in the popular religious works; but do not be content to float in that stream, but go out into the ocean depths of some old thinker where it will try your brain to follow him, and you will reap the result in the facility and strength of your own thinking. The business of the preacher is to make people think, and in order to make people think he must read that which makes him think.

The Need of Trained Teachers

By Garry L. Cook

The Bible school is the motive power of the church. Just as it requires water in the boiler, and coal in the firebox to make the engine go, so in the church the Bible school is the water and the coal, it is the power that drives the whole church along. Where are you going to get the recruits for the church of the future? Where are you getting the majority of them at the present time? There is but one answer to both of these questions—from the Bible school. We are told by those who are in a position to know, that at least 90 per cent of all the additions to the churches are from the Bible school. How can it be, then, anything but the great motive power of the church? We are, also, told that but 65 per cent of those who attend the Bible school ever come into the church. The first statement sounds good, and makes the Bible school important, and dignified, but the second does not sound so well, and shows that there must be some weaknesses in the Bible school work. Many of the best thinkers and workers of today are deploring this condition, and say, that it certainly is not normal, and so unnecessary. The very fact that the Bible school is the motive power of the church, and that most of the recruits must come from it, shows us that the stakes must be strengthened, and the cords tightened. We must find out why this waste. The question must be asked, 'Who is to blame? and what is the remedy?' Many elements may enter into the matter, but the chief lack is the proper instruction given to the pupil, and the chief reason why the pupil does not get that which belongs to him is because of a lack of knowledge on the part of the instructor or teacher. Much of this condition in the past was brought about by a lack of valuation of the real place, aim, and purpose of the Bible school. It too many times was thought of as a place to go, or as a place to herd children, and have them entertained for a little while on Sunday.

The real Bible school of today is the church sitting at the feet of the Master studying the Word. The man who calls the Bible school the nursery, or the Kindergarten of the church should be relegated to the back room, or at least asked to go way back and sit down. There may be both nursery and kindergarten departments in the school, and should be, but the school itself is not a baby institution. I say that the true Bible school is the whole church, and as many more, sitting down humbly at the feet of the great Lord and Master becoming learners and pupils of him—his life, his truths, his deeds. It is in truth a great Bible school.

The Bible school is the one department of the church that is actually studying the word of God. The demands of the pulpit today are such that it is impossible for a minister to give much instruction in Bible knowledge from the pulpit. What work is done in this direction is so fragmentary and unconnected that the pew gets very little that is coherent. The pew may be well schooled in the ethical and moral necessities of the day, maybe well acquainted with elaborate and eloquent illustrations of popular texts, but when it comes to a coherent, and connected study of the Bible itself, there is a lamentable lack. I am not criticizing the minister of today, nor am I going to discuss a remedy for this lack. I am simply stating a fact. This deficiency is being greatly overcome by the up to date Bible school. I repeat that the Bible school is the only department of the church that is making a real study of the Bible itself. So then, we are in a position to realize the importance of the Bible school work. It is the greatest religious educational institution in existence. If all this is true, can you not see the one conclusion to which we must come, the importance, the necessity, of the proper preparation on the part of those who are at the head of this institution? The necessity for the proper training on the part of the pastor, superintendent, and other officers is outside of my subject. This is important. Each should have his proper training. It is the Lord's work that they are doing. However, I can not discuss their qualifications here. I will now speak definitely regarding the special training and equipment of the teacher.

Some day a great many of the larger schools will have paid superintendents, and perhaps paid teachers in some special departments—like the primary, junior, or normal. These will be experts in their lines, but of course, there will always be many schools that will never be able to pay salaries. But whether a teacher is paid or not, there is no longer any excuse for the untrained. It is always wrong to demand a certain thing of one, and not provide a way for him to get that thing. The materials for the training of teachers, instruction, books, and diplomas are all here. So there is little excuse for the teacher not to have this training. The day is coming when all good schools will demand that their teachers shall become graduates of some teacher training course. In fact there are quite a few which are already making this demand. I was told not long ago that there are four schools in Cincinnati that require their teachers to be graduates of prescribed teacher training courses, and that they must hold International diplomas. We have heard of others that are requiring the same thing. Why not? If the Bible school is the greatest religious institution studying the Bible itself, and the way to that more abundant life is found in the Bible, why should not those who are chosen to teach the pupil the way to that more abundant life be required to know the way—to know the text book?

Teacher-training is preparation on the part of the teacher for the purpose of teaching. Teaching is not altogether a process of imparting information. This element enters into good teaching, but there are other essential elements. Professor Coe in his book, "Education in Religion and Morals" gives this definition for education which will apply well here: "Education is an effort to assist immature persons to realize themselves and their destiny as persons." This is the very purpose of teaching. It is not simply to stuff some information into the pupil, not to plaster something on the outside of him, not transferring material from the teacher to the student, nor amusing him or simply entertaining him, but helping the pupil in his self adjustment to his environment. Helping the pupil to find himself is the function of good teaching. True education is an active not passive progress on the part of the student.

Our public schools long ago awakened to these laws of teaching. Nothing is too good for the day school, and no teacher can be too well prepared for the teaching profession. All parents object to a teacher in the day school who is not thoroughly prepared for the work, yet, in that school which is the greatest of all schools, the school in which we learn the way to that more abundant Life, the chief qualification necessary, and the only one required many times, is that the teacher will take the class. Sometimes he is not even required to be a professed Christian, a follower of the Christ. If there is any teacher that needs to have thorough knowledge and preparation, that teacher is the Bible school teacher. If there is any teaching institution under the shining sun that should have the best of equipment and advantages it is the Bible school. Why? Because the child is born into this world with a religious instinct the same as any other, and unless that religious instinct is developed the same as others you not only have an unreligious being, but he is abnormal, dwarfed, and stunted. Religion is a part of the being. Man was made in the image of God, a little lower than God himself. One frequently hears an expression as if religion were something the individual could take on any time in his life, if he so desired. Just as if it were a foreign substance and could be swallowed or plastered on the outside any time before one passes from this life. That pupil in the Bible school is naturally a religious being. What he wants is some one to direct him in his adjustment to this old world—to life. He needs a teacher to help him find himself. The greatest privilege allotted to man is the privilege of being this teacher. If the world is ever saved it will be through human agency. O! the dignity, power, and place of the Bible school. She has been very slow to recognize this, and thereby has lost much ground in the past, but we are now coming out of the darkness into the light.

I believe we now see the importance of Teacher-training, or the trained teacher. There is no time for delay. May God speed the day, when all Bible schools will require that all teachers shall hold diplomas showing that they are qualified to teach the word of God. Then in that day we will not be compelled to say that only 65 per cent of those who attend Bible school ever become Christians, but rather will we say that 90 per cent of all the boys and girls that come into the Bible school will pass on naturally and normally into the church. Then will God be honored, Jesus Christ exalted, the Bible school and the teaching of the Bible be dignified, and the teaching profession be sought after by men and women who have been washed in the redeeming blood of the lamb.

Our Church Men

By John Ray Ewers

"System"

On the tables of many business men I often see a magazine called "System." Men seem proud to have it appear in their offices because it seems to say to all comers, "Behold a systematic man." Men glory in the fact that they are orderly, scientific, economical, efficient. Not only that, but men never tire of twitting the women upon the slip-shod, unparliamentary, disorderly, haphazard way in which women do business. Now all this must stop, for when we stop to think of it, the women of our "Brotherhood" have distanced the men in their system and efficient business methods.

The System of the C. W. B. M.

The most systematic missionary group among us is the C. W. B. M. With their strong, national organization, their hustling state organizers, their efficient local auxiliaries, their regular dues of fifteen cents per month, they have given us the most splendid example of system ever seen. Notice the aggregate amount of money raised and the vast amount of work done.

It is as simple as a great plan should be. National, state, local organization. Direct responsibility throughout. A national paper, "The Tidings," well printed and dignified, a clear cut and intelligent program for each month, both for seniors and juniors, and best of all, concise reports of the actual work accomplished in foreign fields, Bible chairs, mountain missions, negro work, home missions and evangelistic work. There it all is, simple, clear, intelligent, dignified, solid. I tell you they afford a great example to the men.

The System of the Men.

The Brotherhood movement is but just begun and therefore must not be criticised. It is not my purpose to find any fault at all, for I am in fullest sympathy with the Brotherhood movement. My only contention is that we may well learn from our sisters in system. The men have to report, an office in Kansas City, two good men as secretaries, thousands of miles traveled, a long string of banquets, a lot of enthusiasm that as yet has not arrived anywhere, a magazine without a program and with no results to report, for nothing has been attempted except banquets and enthusiasm. Now the first year's work is great if only our men have been aroused. They are aroused now. The time has come when there must be something more definite than more miles, more banquets, more subscriptions to "Christian Men," more undirected enthusiasm. The time has come for us to have a program and to do something which we can report, for men want results, they want to see the actual work done. Mark what I say, I am not criticising at all. The first year's work has been necessary. It has been splendidly done. But now we cannot keep on doing that same thing. Now we must have a definite program and we must begin to send out missionaries, to clean up towns, to fight for temperance, to win men to Jesus, to teach the Bible, or to do some other worthy thing, whatever it may be, that will challenge men.

The Present Chaotic Condition of the Men.

All the various groups of men in our churches must be massed into one vast and well disciplined host. Here is a great Bible class of men. They are studying the Bible, they are looking after their sick and unemployed, they are fighting for good citizenship. They have no connection with our Brotherhood. When the Secretary visited the city they attended the banquet, applauded, and some of them subscribed for the magazine. Here is a Men's Club. They have social meetings once a month, listen to brilliant speakers, eat the beef and pie and go home and think they have done something. It was something to get together socially—but not much. Here is a fine group of intelligent men who get together once a quarter to study missions. They give to missions and they have a local organization just like the C. W. B. M. auxiliary. But they have no connection with the national Brotherhood and see no reason why they should have. Now all these various groups must be gotten together into the Brotherhood. The C. W. B. M. has demonstrated how various interests can all be cared for under one management. Thus negro work, foreign and home missions, Bible chairs, mountain missions and evangelistic work are all administered under the one efficient board. Some of our men want foreign missions as carried on by the Layman's Missionary Movement, made the supreme thing, other good men want to see the evangelistic enterprise made supreme, other excellent men, among whom I find a congenial place, long for civic betterment as the leading purpose, other noble men want to fight the temperance battle to the finish, all of these may be lined up by one central organization.

The Definite Plan Outlined

The time is at hand for such organization. The clock has struck twelve. The precise moment of opportunity is here. Now let us get at it immediately. We have our national headquarters at Kansas City. We have our Macfarlane and our Elliott. Now let us have our state organizations and local auxiliaries. I would not use the same names as those employed by the C. W. B. M., but the plan cannot be bettered. Let our magazine, "Christian Men," outline a program for us that shall be bright, brainy, and solid. Let us have our regular dues that shall go into real work. Let so much of such amounts be devoted to running expenses and the balance to definite work. Let us build our own colleges in foreign lands and send out our own teachers and missionaries. Let us endow adequately our colleges at home. Let us employ our expert worker among working men. Let us put Arthur Holmes into this work and make him our Stelzle. Let us encourage social work in all our cities and rural communities. Let us fight whisky, child labor and overwork for women. Let us plan courses of Bible study fitted for men. Oh, there are twenty-five great big jobs for us, as men, to do. Jobs so great and big that every man would be challenged. Do it now!

A STORY OF THE TRUSTS

BY JANE RICHARDSON

CHAPTER XIII (Continued).

He said this with all the sweetness and persuasion she had remembered for so long. She could not answer him, and she made a compelling gesture as if to stop him. She longed to tell him what she thought of his cowardly tactics which had been shown in his appeals to the foibles and weaknesses of her mother's nature.

"You know what I have to say——"

"I do not wish to know—I refuse to hear!" she interrupted him sternly.

"You know why I am here—why I've come——"

"Not by my invitation! Never from my asking!"

"How can you be so hard? Why will you not hear me?" he pleaded.

"Because I would spare us both what can only be painful humiliation."

"Oh, Eleanor, think of the old times—the old days!"

"Can you ask it?" she looked at him with scorn and contempt. "Rather, ask me to forget them! They are past and I would not have them return. If I could work a miracle that would restore you to me this moment—I would not do it. Once I may have loved you—not now!" Her voice was low and calm. It thrilled him with an almost irrestistible passion. Her very strength roused within him the brute that seeks to master.

He rose and went quickly to her with hand outstretched, but she cried out vehemently with a gesture of repulsion:

"Do not come near me! Do not put your hand on me! You must go!"

He pleaded and protested, asking her over and over again to forgive him, saying that he had repented a thousand times.

"Forgive you? I have nothing to forgive. You have my gratitude. You spared me the still greater misery of a marriage that could have had but one ending!"

"You mean this?"

"I have lived to realize it with thankfulness, and since I have—it is impossible for me to resume the old relations. Even you could not expect that!"

Bannister hung his head, suffering the mortification of her contempt. He could make no reply, but her terrible words neither angered nor convinced him. They filled his soul with a dogged resolution to have her at any cost! Even though he might speedily repent of it and curse himself for a fool.

Eleanor maintained an outward composure, and said coldly:

"This is my mother's house and I cannot close the doors against those whom she chooses to receive, but if you have a spark of manliness, should you come here again—as I should think you would not—spare me the effort of seeing you!"

Bannister did not reply, but he thought it prudent to bring the interview to an end. He walked into the hall, not without dignity, and left the house.

Eleanor sank into a chair by the hearth, covered her eyes with her hand, and fell into a retrospection of the unhappy past. When Bannister had sought her with his first professions of love, his faithlessness, the sorry use he had made of his life, her father's death, their poverty, her mother's gradual decline—all were remembered.

The fire crackled softly on the hearth, the wind shook the branches of the rosebush outside the window, which tapped against the panes like ghostly fingers. The chill twilight of Autumn was falling.

Her reflections gradually emerged from their dark depression. She thought of the young girls in whose lives she had become so absorbingly interested, of her mother so dependent on her for care and comfort, and who, she prayed, might be spared for many years no matter how querulous and exacting she might become. A sudden glow came into her eyes—she saw before her another face, heard the tones of another voice and she realized that by some undefinable process another love had grown and strengthened in her heart. She had divined Brainard's secret when she was not sure of herself. Now doubts were cleared away by means of the painful experience of the past hour.

She was aroused from her reverie by the rattle of wheels and she looked out to see a carriage halt before the gate. She realized that something had happened, and fearing to frighten her mother she went swiftly to the door and opened it noiselessly. Teddy Wilkins, pale and fainting, sat beside Susan Johnson, who supported him on one side, and a doctor upon the other. Susan would not consent to have him taken to the hospital—he must be brought home where she could nurse him herself. The doctor agreed with her, saying that, while the wound was ugly and painful, it was not likely to result seriously, but the patient would require careful nursing. He was carried into the house and Ned, Eldora, and Alonzo, with the half-distracted Mary, arrived a few moments later.

Eleanor begged that she might keep the children, and dispatched Ann to Susan's assistance. In a short time Teddy was in his comfortable bed, his wound dressed and he had fallen asleep, while Mary sat in an adjoining room.

There is a mysterious law governing the approach of misfortune. The wave, once set in motion, swells and advances along the course marked out for it and falls at last with overwhelming force, breaking and scattering its wreckage far and wide, subsiding only when there is nothing left in its path to destroy.

Ned and Eldora cried bitterly with fright and pity over Teddy's hurt. At last the boy curled up contentedly with his head against Eleanor's knee and fell asleep, and Eldora sat beside her idly turning over the leaves of a book in the firelight.

Mrs. Crofton had made no sound since she had gone upstairs. Once Eleanor thought that she heard her moving about her room and she listened with strange dread. At last she became so anxious that she felt she must go to her. Motioning Eldora to take her place she shifted the head of the sleeping boy to her lap and stole from the room. The upper hall was quite dark and hesitating an instant, she softly opened her mother's door. The fire had almost died out, there was no light except from the glowing embers. She paused upon the threshold with a loudly beating heart; half-blinded by the light which she carried, she perceived the indistinct outlines of her mother's figure stretched upon the sofa, the soft folds of her black gown falling smoothly to her feet, her beautiful hands slightly folded.

"Mother," she called, but there was no response. "Mother!" she cried again in tones so strange and wild that Ann, in the room below, heard her and came running up the stairs. She caught the lamp which Eleanor's trembling hands could scarcely hold, and they looked into each other's faces—the faithful daughter and the faithful servant—drawn together by a common impulse of fear, then bent over the woman who would never again require their devotion.

She had slipped easily from life while she slept, as she might have chosen to die. There had been no hideous and wasting sickness, no loss of reason, which she had covertly dreaded. The room was in exquisite order, even to the fresh roses upon the table. The proprieties, for which she had such veneration, were all respected. Throughout all her life she had had her will, and even in death she had prevailed.

"Go—tell Susan," cried Eleanor, after a time. "Keep it from Teddy—he must not know—it would harm him——" she said, even in the midst of her grief, considerate of another.

Susan came at once greatly shocked, but not unprepared, for she had foreseen the approaching end which was now fulfilled.

"Oh, you poor thing!" she cried, with streaming tears, taking Eleanor in her arms as if she were a child. "You must go away now, and leave everything to Ann and me!"

Eleanor looked once more at the silent figure on the sofa and said to Susan:

"I will go since you wish it, but, can't I—"

Susan gently shook her head, and she went away to her own room in unresisting obedience. She threw herself upon her bed and overworn by the events of the day which crowded and confused her brain, she fell into a deathlike sleep, from which she briefly roused once to hear voices murmuring tender words at her bedside, and lapsed again into a stupor.

She awoke suddenly and it was broad day. Beside her sat Miss Abigail. She did not attempt to offer words of condolence, but leaned over her and said:

"Robert is in the parlor, dear, but you need not see him till you are quite ready!"

"Not now! Not now!"

"Very well, dear, he will come again."

Eleanor turned away as if she could not endure the thought of that dreaded conference over the last offices for the dead. Presently she said: "I leave it all to him—and to you. You know best——"

Not till the next morning did she look again on her mother. As she bent above her, smoothing the soft hair, caressing the waxen hands, she was suddenly stricken and terrified by her own utter desolation and, turning slowly away, she went back to her room.

In the course of the afternoon Brainard came. His heart ached with pity as he thought of her loneliness. He strongly endeavored to summon up the self-control he knew he would sorely need in her presence. This was no time to betray his own hopes and desires; dignity, honor, manhood forbade it!

As he entered the parlor she stood before the fire, her head bowed, her hands clasped listlessly. She turned toward him a face so wan, so miserable, so changed, that his heart was wrung. He made some slight exclamation and hurried to her, with outstretched hand. He could scarcely keep back the words he had determined not to utter. Sympathy and tenderness he did not conceal, as he clasped and held her cold fingers. They broke down her rigid self control and, without volition, her head sank upon his shoulder, and she broke into bitter sobbing. His hand trembled as he dared to stroke her ruffled hair, and his heart swelled to bursting with the urgings of his love. But his honor held his emotions in check. Her childlike abandonment to grief upon his breast must not be presumed upon. What other refuge had she? If she were rudely startled she would leave him—perhaps condemn him when her grief subsided. He was constrained to silence by the very force of his feelings. She was not thinking of love, but of death!

Presently she withdrew to the little sofa and sat down upon it. He stood before her and said gently:

"Tell me, if you can, if everything is done that you wished."

"I leave it all to you. You must decide—I cannot!"

He took his leave quietly, but there was a living hope in his heart. In the hour of her extreme need he was there; she had trusted him as no other. It was prophetic of that time to which hope pointed when she would trust him all in all.

Our Readers' Opinions

Commends Colonel Church

Editors Christian Century: I read with much satisfaction the address of Col. Church. It is a remarkable document. I find myself in full accord with much that he says, particularly with his plea for breadth of fellowship. I rejoice that he had the courage to stand up before that vast host and give utterance to what he believed was needed, in spite of the fact that he knew his message would be rejected by many. I'm heartily glad he did not conceive of his subject as the Christian Century outlines it for him. How his address glows with the fire of firm conviction! No surrender there! He has driven a stake that stands high, but the church will have to level up to it—or retire! What a striking coincidence is the speech of President Faunce of Brown before the Baptist Congress.

Commend Christian Century

Dear Bro. Morrison: I am sending you a brief report of a year's work and you can use it or not as you see fit. I am very much interested in your editorials. Your work is a constant surprise to me, and I am in hearty sympathy with most all of your writing. I am especialy delighted with the general spirit of the paper and its fearless utterances on all subjects. May the dear Lord bless you in your work. GEORGE F. DEVOL.

Editors Christian Century: I want to tell you in a practical way how helpful our Christian Century is. Two weeks ago I was busy trying to launch a men's class. I had several talks with men of different business and professional interests and with one of our leading doctors, in particular, all of whom brought before me many problems that were hard to solve. Then I had just finished reading "The Calling of Dan Matthews," when The Christian Century came filled with articles and editorials (such as "What Shall We Preach") that just helped me at the very point I needed help.

Last week I was in deep difficulty in a sermon on the question of the adjustment the church would need to make to meet the demands of the new decade when The Christian Century again came having that most excellent address given by Brother Todd, and many other vital things that seem to fit into my every-day-needs and help me at all points of difficulty. And what shall I say of those uplifting Sunday-school lessons that help one teach a men's class in a man's way? Time fails me. The Century is practical enough to assist me in my work-a-day needs, and ideal enough to place high before me inspiring standards. Helping me thus, it will help our people. Therefore, send me about one hundred sample copies (one for each family) of your next issue. I will be delighted to interest all I can in this helpful paper. Yours sincerely,

Massillon, Ohio. H. E. STAFFORD.

The Altar

I wish to thank you for the altar department. There is much need for that kind of urging and teaching.

Comparatively few families even give thanks at their table, fewer still have a time for Scripture reading and prayer.

A suggestion concerning the prayers you are printing, I have found Christ in a very few of them. These years I have taught the people that every prayer should be in his name.

You ask for our practice. My wife and I set up a family altar the second day after our marriage, seven months before we had a home. While our children were with us we sang a verse or two and knelt in prayer just before retiring at night. Before breakfast we read each one from his own Bible, beginning with the oldest person present a verse to the end of the lesson, then knelt in prayer Though alone now we keep it up. Almost forty-nine years this altar has been standing. It has not been a task to find time.

Thresh It Out!

Editors Christian Century: Since the issue of immersionist vs. optionist is now fairly joined in the baptismal case it is well to thresh it out "to a frazzle." The following queries are therefore presented:

1. "The baptism of John, is it from heaven or of men?" If from heaven, whence and when came John's commission to baptize? If of men, how did baptism become a part of righteousness which Jesus could fulfil only by being baptized?

2. Does not the scholarship of the world agree that dip or its equivalent is the primary meaning of the word baptize? Or is there any other meaning given which expresses what a man can do of which another man is the subject?

3. Is there any lexical authority approved by scholarship that gives sprinkling or pouring among the meanings of baptizo? If so, name such authority.

4. Have Matt. 3:13-17 and 28:18-20 a rightful place in Matthew's Gospel? If not, why not? W. L. HAYDEN.

Another View of Baptism

Editors Christian Century: Your leading editorial in Christian Century of January 20, was read with interest. There is nothing new in it. We have been preaching that from the beginning. But you have such a fresh way of saying things, of putting a new suit of clothes on old ideas as to make even an old man like myself feel that you are really saying something new.

You argue that immersion is common ground; all concede it, therefore we should no longer debate the question but plead, exhort, for its practice by everybody for the sake of Christian union. Is it at all probable that this exhortation can ever be made adequately effective? The large majority of the Christian world has come to see this subject differently. Immersionists are in the minority, decidedly so. The Christian people who have accepted sprinkling for their baptism have not been thoughtless. They have reasoned all around, all over, and all through this subject. Let us consider some facts.

Baptism was originally not a divine but a human institution. God accepted baptism at the hands of men. He appropriated a human idea. What was the original meaning of baptism? Water is the universal element for cleansing, hence the symbol of purity. As Alexander Campbell says, "Water is the universal symbol of moral purification." But will not a pint of water symbolize this idea as well as a river? It is not the quantity but the quality of the thing. In the earlier and cruder ages men immersed the body in water as a sign of moral purity. God accommodated himself to their ideas. Hence John the Baptist and the apostles immersed people to symbolize the remission of sins or moral purification. But immersion in many instances is an inconvenient, uncomfortable and impracticable thing. And as civilization extended men, seing that a small quantity of water could set for the original idea of purification, adopted sprinkling. If God accommodated himself originally to men's ideas and customs, will he not be as accommodating now? It is the moral purification that he is seeking rather than the symbol of it—the substance rather than the shadow. But you say sprinkling does not meet the scriptural expressions, "buried," "risen," "planted," etc. Very true. But these are after-thoughts. The death, burial and resurrection of Christ were not originally in the form of baptism as practiced by men before the day of Christ. That is simply the literary adjustment of thought in after writers just as these same writers adjust Jewish ideas and customs to Christian thought when they speak of "altar," "laver," "incense," "sacrifice," etc.

Mr. Editor, I do not doubt that immersion was the original form of Christian baptism, but I do doubt whether it is essential to the validity of baptism today in the eye of God. Where is the weakness of my reasoning?

The Savior washed the disciples' feet and thus taught them the lesson of serving. "I have given you an example," He said, "that you also should do as I have done to you."

Now some people cling to the form of this service and make feet-washing a church ordinance. Did the Savior mean that? Of course not. He only used this custom at the time to set before them the lesson of humility and service. "If I, the Lord and the Master, have washed your feet, ye ought also to wash one another's feet" Again He says, "I am among you as one that serveth." Serving others is the substance of the thought. This is essential and permanent. Washing the feet was a present, incidental and temporary form or custom.

The idea of moral purification is essential and permanent. It was originally symbolized by immersion in water. Is this form essential and permanent, or incidental and transient? Personally I have never preached or practiced anything but immersion. In doing this I have no doubt of its acceptance with God; but I do doubt whether this is essential to the validity of the ordinance in the view of God.

"Salute one another with a holy kiss." Some people observe this today with religious scrupulosity. The idea of saluting one another with Christian affection is essential; its form of kissing, a common social custom of that day, is accidental. The one is permanent the other is transient. This illustrates my idea. But analogies, I know, prove nothing, though they may give good grounds for reasonable presumptions.

What Is Life to You?

To the preacher life's a sermon,
To the joker life's a jest,
To the miser life is money,
To the loafer life is rest.
To the lawyer life's a trial,
To the poet life's a song;
To the doctor life's a patient,
That needs treatment right along.
To the soldier life's a battle,
To the teacher life's a school;
Life's a good thing to the grafter,
It's a failure to the fool.
To the man upon the engine,
Life's a long and heavy grade;
It's a gamble to the gambler,
To the merchant life is trade.
Life's a picture to the artist,
To the rascal life's a fraud;
Life perhaps is but a burden
To the man beneath the hod.
Life is lovely to the lover,
To the player life's a play;
Life may be a load of trouble
To the man upon the dray.
Life is but a long vacation
To the man who loves his work:
Life's an everlasting effort
To shun duty, to the shirk.
To the earnest Christian worker
Life's a story ever new;
Life is what we try to make it—
Brother, what is life to you?

Six Feet Two

By Grace Wood Castle.

"Zi" Woodson was standing under one of the rafters in the low chamber of the horse-barn at the farm, and it would have puzzled an on-looker, if such there had been, to decide just what he was doing. This room was used to store odds and ends of tools, harness, and the like and had evidently been built for the accommodation of persons shorter than he, for the rafters were set so low that he could barely stand upright under them.

As he moved his head back and forth and from side to side, he knew by the way the rough unplaned wood pressed and rumpled his curly hair, that in the two months that had elapsed since he last stood there he had grown perceptibly taller, and the gloomy expression that overspread his face when he became convinced that this was true, added to his ludicrous appearance. He sat down on a nail-keg and audibly condoled with himself.

"I wish't I was dead. Seventeen years old and over six feet tall and still a-growin' . . . Don't believe I'm ever goin' to stop. . . . Joe and John and Charley—little runts, all of them, and me stretching up like Jack's bean-stalk. . . . Arms like a windmill and legs like a derrick," he groaned, eying the offending members disparagingly.

"An' as if that wasn't enough, I must be nearsighted—can't tell my own brothers across the road without spectacles; an' they make my head ache and make me look like a foolish old owl, besides. . . . Of course my hair had to be red, too—the only red hair in the family. . . . O I'm a freak all right," he went on bitterly. "I sha'n't dare to go to the circus next spring; they'll want me for a side-show. I wish—"

"Amaziah," came his mother's voice from the stable below him and as he descended the ladder, she said impatiently: "I called you a dozen times. Are you getting deaf?" At the last words the boy winced. "Probably that'll be the next thing," he muttered to himself. "What is it mother?"

"Mr. Jones just stopped on his way from town and brought a letter from the post-office," she answered. "It's from your uncle Amaziah's widow and she writes that she is going to make us a short visit and that she'll get to Fairleigh at five o'clock this afternoon and wants us to meet her. Your father won't be back with the team until night, you know, and the boys are away. You'll have to take old Nell and the buggy and get started as soon as you possibly can." Zi looked his dismay.

"How'll I know her? I never saw her an' I'd rather be thrashed than go, anyway. I'm a pretty looking specimen to meet a stranger," he said bitterly, "and from the city, too."

"You'd look a sight better if you didn't think so much about yourself," said his usually sympathetic but now worried mother. "And as far as knowing her is concerned, none of us know her from Adam. She ought to know you though; you're the living image of your uncle Amaziah."

"Well, she can't be any great shakes then or she wouldn't have had him," and comforted by this conclusion, which made the guest seem less formidable, he hastened to hitch old Nell to the top-buggy and in ten minutes he drove up to the porch door, ready to start. His mother brought the robe and whip and looked wistfully at his shabby clothes—the only ones he possessed that were not hopelessly outgrown.

"You've got to have a new suit somehow," she said, but if we have to pay Amaziah's claim I don't know what—" Zi didn't hear the rest, but he had planty of time before the three miles of rough, rutty roads were covered to think the matter over for the thousandth time. Ever since he could remember he had heard this claim mentioned between his father and mother and always with apprehension, and had come to understand as he grew older that the payment of it was impossible without selling the farm, the income from which left no margin of profit after supporting the family.

Zi's grandfather had left the farm to his two sons, Alexander and Amaziah, the latter but a lad at the time of his father's death and the former already married and the father of a baby son. The brothers were utterly unlike in temperament, and disagreed continually as to the management of their joint property.

This went on for two years, then one day the younger brother packed his belongings, hugged the curly-haired three-year-old who was named for him and with hardly a good-by set out to seek his fortune, and they never saw him afterward.

From the few short letters received from him during the next fifteen years they knew that he had gone to a distant city, learned the trade of a carpenter, afterward becoming a contractor, had married well and had prospered. He had never in those letters mentioned his interest in the farm and this visit of his widow a few weeks after his death by accident, was—Zi knew—a momentous event to the family.

Old Nell was a poor traveler and the day a cloudy one in early November, so it was nearly dark when the boy drew up to the little station, sprang out and tied his horse to a ring in the platform. The train had come and gone and he could see through the nearby window that the only occupant of the little waiting-room was a lady dressed in black with two suitcases beside her.

It took all the courage he could muster, this shy lad with the stature of a giant, to open the waiting-room door. That achieved, he was unable to advance or retreat or to say a word. The lady—startled, as she afterward told him, by his resemblance to her late husband—gazed at him without speaking. After what seemed to Zi a long time but was really but a few seconds, she rose and came toward him with outstretched hand.

"I am sure you are Mr. Woodson, my husband's nephew," she said with a voice and manner that captured the lad's fancy at once, though the "Mr. Woodson" so flustered him that he could only ejaculate, "Yes, ma'am," in a strained voice.

He felt relieved when they were safely started, with the kindly darkness hiding his shabbiness and awkwardness. He had dreaded the ride home, but long before it was over he found himself talking to this stranger, who insisted on his calling her Aunt Mary, almost as freely as to one of his own family. On her part she made the most of this opportunity to become acquainted with the one who, unknown to him, had furnished the principal motive for her visit.

At the sound of wheels Mr. and Mrs. Woodson had gone out to the porch and were much surprised to hear Zi's voice, sounding not at all embarrassed, call out cheerfully as the light from the open door revealed them: "Here we are Aunt Mary. That's father and mother." Unconsciously, the father recognized the new note in his son's voice and called a younger boy to "put out" the horse; an unprecedented proceeding that left Zi free to follow the others into the house.

Pleading fatigue, the guest retired early but not before placing in the hands of her brother-in-law the paper which—executed years before—gave him full ownership of the farm.

In the week she spent with them, all learned to like greatly this kinswoman, and to understand that the passionate, arbitrary boy who had left his home so unceremoniously had grown into a capable, honest and successful man whom she had loved sincerely. Toward the end of her stay there was a long talk one night between the three elders and the next morning Zi's mother took him aside and told him that his aunt wished him to go home with her for a time.

"Do you want to go?" she asked with a choke in her voice, and as he did not answer she went on: "I know you do, and I want you to; she can do so much for you that we can't. She says that your eyes must be examined and your glasses changed; that you must go to a dentist and that there should be physical training to correct your habit of stooping. She says that it will be much better for you to be among strangers awhile; 'till you've caught up with your body,' was the way she expressed it. Seems as if I can't let—" here she broke down entirely.

Zi was much distressed to see his undemonstrative little mother give way. "I won't go if it's going to make you feel bad, mother," he managed to say, though every nerve thrilled with joy at the thought of going."

That evening—they were to start the next morning—Aunt Mary asked Zi to take the second suitcase, which had stood in the entry unopened since her arrival, up to his room and see if the things in it fitted him. After he had been upstairs half an hour or so they heard a knock at the front door, which was seldom used, and Jo rushed to open it. There was a short silence and then they heard Jo's voice asking in a hesitating, awed tone: "Won't you come in sir?" He had ushered in a tall figure wearing a soft hat pulled well down over the forehead, and a long fur-lined overcoat which was unbuttoned revealing a gray suit. They all rose except Aunt Mary, who gave a little gasp and sat still.

Charlie, a lad of ten, was apparently the first to grasp the situation. "It's Zi," he shouted.

"Can't you ask a fellow to sit down and stay awhile?" said a voice with a little tremble in it, from under the wide hat. Then slipping off the overcoat he stood before them in a neat sack suit which fitted him well; collar, tie, gloves, shoes,—nothing had been forgotten. A careful hand had selected from his uncle's wardrobe only articles which were suitable for a young man. He seemed to have shed much of his awkwardness with his shabby, inadequate clothing and they saw before them a not unattractive young man.

Then they all began to talk at once and the burden of their remarks was: "Who'd ever have believed that clothes would make such a difference?"

To this country boy who had never before been on board a train, that next day and night were a revelation. As he lay in his berth, after a day whose every minute had brought new sights and sensations, it seemed too strange to be true. He only a week before had thought most of the time of his arms and legs and red hair and glasses, had hardly thought once of himself all day. He remembered that his mother had often warned him to think less of himself and his looks—his wise little mother!—and thinking of her he went to sleep, lulled by the clickety-click-clack of the wheels that were so swiftly bearing him to new scenes.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 13.

Theme for the Day.

God's presence in his House.

Scripture.

The Lord is in his holy temple; let all the earth keep silence before him.—Heb. 2:20.

Lines.

Dear Lord and Father of mankind
Forgive our feverish ways.
Reclothe us in our rightful mind;
In purer lives thy service find;
In deeper reverence, praise.
—J. G. Whittier ("Longing for Peace.")

Prayer.

O Lord, we thank Thee for the day or rest. May it be to us a foretaste of that rest which remains for the people of God. May we revere the House of God, and enter it with joy, bringing our offerings of thankfulness and praise. Bless the preaching of Thy Word today, and may its blessed results abide in many lives, and most of all in our own. Keep us from sin this day. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 14.

Theme for the Day.

The world-wide sway for Christ.

Scripture.

He shall have dominion also from sea to sea and from the river unto the ends of the earth.—Psa. 72:8.

Lines.

For him shall endless prayer be made
And endless praises crown his head;
His name like sweet perfume shall rise
With every morning sacrifice.
—Isaac Watts ("The Messiah.")

Prayer.

Our Father, we thank Thee that Thou hast called us to so notable a task as the evangelization of the world. Christ must reign over all the nations and Thou hast honored us with the enterprise of bringing this to pass. Our thoughts expand in the presence of such a glorious service. No longer are we satisfied with trivial things. Assist us to be worthy of our high calling. May we plan generous things for Thy kingdom. And may our Master approve our service. Amen.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 15.

Theme for the Day.

The blessing of night and its rest.

Scripture.

When thou liest down, thou shalt not be afraid; yea, thou shalt lie down and thy sleep shall be sweet.—Prov. 3:24.

Lines.

O, holy night! from thee I learn to bear
What man has borne before!
Thou layest thy finger on the lips of care,
And they complain no more.
—Longfellow ("Hymn to the Night.")

Prayer.

Holy Father, we bless Thee for the day with its work, and for the night which brings its rest. Into Thy loving care we resign ourselves when night closes about us, for it is Thy gift, and Thou doest all things well. May each night bring us its renewal of strength, and when we rise may it be with the thought that we are still with Thee. We ask in Jesus' name. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 16.

Theme for the Day.

Job's example of suffering and patience.

Scripture.

We call them blessed which endured: ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord, how that the Lord is full of pity and merciful.—James 5:11.

Lines.

I mention still
Him, whom thy wrongs, with saintly patience borne,
Made famous in a land and times obscure;
Who names not now with honor patient Job?
—John Milton ("Paradise Regained" III.)

Prayer.

Hear us in Thy mercy, gracious Lord, when we draw near with our imperfect supplication. Grant us the patience that overcomes all difficulties through faith in God. We thank Thee for the lives that illustrate the great virtues which beautify character. May we not think the days of heroism past forever, but rather the more earnestly seek for ourselves the graces that endure. In our Master we have the supreme example. Help us to follow him. Amen.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 17.

Theme for the Day.

The reality and preciousness of the life of Christ.

Scripture.

That which was from the beginning, that which we have heard, that which we have seen with our eyes, that which we beheld, and our hands handled, concerning the Word of life . . . declare we unto you.—I. John 1:1-3.

Lines.

That story, aye, that life and death
Of which I wrote, "It was," to me it is;
Is here and now, I apprehend naught else.
—Robert Browning ("A Death in the Desert.")

Prayer.

Great and merciful art Thou, O Lord. Marvelous are Thy gifts to us. Thy praise is on our lips when we think of Thy goodness. Most of all has the life of Christ made real to us the character of God. Save us, we pray Thee, from the mistake of putting him out of our lives by the intrusion of other interests. May he come into our hearts and drive out every hostile thing, even as he drove the traders from the house of God. And may he abide with us forever. Amen.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 18.

Theme for the Day.

The wonder of love.

Scripture.

Many waters cannot quench love; neither can the floods drown it; if a man would give all the substance of his house for love, it would be utterly condemned.—Song of Songs 8:7.

Lines.

The night has a thousand eyes,
And the day but one;
Yet the light of the bright world dies
With the dying sun.

The mind has a thousand eyes,
And the heart but one;
Yet the light of a whole life dies
When love is done.
—Bourdillon ("The Night Has a Thousand Eyes.")

Prayer.

Our Father, Thou hast revealed Thy love to us, even while we were yet sinners. Make plain to us, we beseech Thee, the way of our duty, and the happiness that comes from loving Thee and our fellowmen. Let there be no complaining of Thy providence, no wrong or evil thought. Preserve those who are in high position from pride of success, and those who are obscure from bitterness. And may the love that thinketh uo evil abide in our hearts. Amen.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 19.

Theme for the Day.

The light of the world.

Scripture.

Jesus spake unto them saying, I am the light of the world; he that followeth me shall not walk in the darkness, but shall have the the light of life.—John 8:12.

Lines.

O Light, that followest all my way,
I yield my flickering torch to thee;
My heart restores its borrowed ray,
That in thy sunshine's blaze its day
May brighter, fairer be.
—George Matheson ("The Cross.")

Prayer.

Thou who didst command light to shine out of darkness, shine in our hearts, we pray Thee, and help us to rejoice in the knowledge of Jesus Christ. As Thou hast opened for us the prospect of glory and immortality, may we have courage and good hope in following it. By ways that we know not, lead us to the heights on which Thy sunshine rests forever. By the narrow path of obedience bring all seekers to the clear light of Thy will and liberaty. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

AT THE CHURCH

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

Ruling Ideas*

The Sermon on the Mount is not a logical treatment of a single topic, but a cluster of suggestive sayings regarding the contrasts between the ruling ideas of the age in which Jesus lived and those on which he would have his disciples fix their attention. This surprising antithesis makes up a large part of these sayings of our Lord. Few men could have thought in that day that what seemed such impracticable directions for the conduct of life could ever come to be taken seriously and actually be organized into a working program of daily conduct. And yet that is precisely what Christianity has compelled men to do. To be sure these ideals have not yet won their way in more than a small degree, but they are daily finding new adherents and bid fair to become the controlling principles of the age to come

The Worship of Money.

Perhaps there has never been a generation so hard to persuade that the acquisition of wealth is not the chief end of life as our own. Other generations have, through the very narrowness of the margin of life, recognized the value of other things, like heroism, self-denial, patience, frugality, humility and reverence. But our generation dislikes very much to hear about these things, and believes that there is one and only one chief end of life, the acquisition of money and the enjoyment of the things which money will bring.

Jesus set himself squarely against this view of life, that was also one of the ruling ideas of his generation. The spread of Roman power had brought great wealth to some, and the spectacle of indolent and luxurious life was set before the people by the conduct of the emperors and the ruling classes generally. The same spirit spread into the colonies, and it was difficult to persuade the people that any other interpretation of life was worth while. The words of Jesus in opposition to this theory must have seemed futile indeed. What was the use of living if men did not become wealthy and indulged themselves in all the luxuries which wealth could gather?

The Contrast.

But Jesus knew that such a view of life was wholly false. Nothing can be regarded as wholesome and sound as a theory of living that does not apply to all classes. Yet it is perfectly manifest that only the very smallest percentage of humanity can gain any considerable degree of wealth. If, then, happiness depends upon this, it is certain that the vast majority are foredoomed to disappointment and failure. Even a large proportion of those who gain some reasonable share of wealth lose it again, and upon such a throne, are rendered by that experience incapable of enjoying life or being serviceable to their fellow men.

It must be possible, then, to find another way to happiness and usefulness. This Jesus insists is by putting one's treasure where it is not likely to be lost by bad investment, theft, nor wastage. Of course, "laying up treasures in heaven" means the accumulation of those qualities and virtues which are assets in the life of the kingdom of heaven, of which Jesus was constantly speaking. It is the estate of being "rich toward God" of which mention is often made elsewhere. Such wealth as this cannot be wasted or lost, and it is the only kind of property that remains in possession through every crisis.

The Single Eye.

The Master then commented on the impossibility of keeping an eye on the prospect of getting rich and at the same time concerning one's self profoundly with the effort to secure the riches of character, the only ones that can be recognized in the kingdom of God. The distraction of attention by dividing interest between two such contrasted objects is like seeing with an eye that is blurred. If one looks with single-hearted purpose at the great enterprise of interpreting God's will to the world and of revealing it in one's own life, then his whole being is flooded with the light that comes in through the clear window of the soul. His eye is single because he has only one supreme interest. But if with wavering attention he goes from this to that, and looks only with clouded vision upon the fair ideals of character and of truth, he misses the true light, and falls into that darkness of wasted effort and failure at last; and how great is that darkness!

The Cult of Mammon.

There was an old heathen divinity of the name Mammon. In the thought of the Jews of Jesus' day it stood for the love of money. Jesus said it was impossible to have that god as the object of worship, and at the same time to love and worship the Father in heaven. The two masters would always be in conflict with each other. One cannot serve God and Mammon.

But he recognized that a certain care for the future was proper and necessary for all his followers. They must not recklessly cast themselves adrift from proper effort and just provision for coming days. And here one of his greatest lessons was taught. The prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread," implied a just concern for physical blessing. But it implied also that these were to be sought with natural and wholesome effort, under the blessing of God, and were not to distract attention from the serious business of life, the gaining of character and the performance of the will of the Father in the world.

To go beyond this point in anxious regard for the future was to put second things first and forget the greater interests of life. The early Christian society rejoiced in the privilege of giving up its worldly possessions that all might be cared for on an equal footing. The mediaeval church taught and to a large extent practiced the virtue of poverty, and hundreds of earnest and consecrated preachers of righteousness journeyed over Europe possessed of nothing but the simple clothing, staff and scrip required for their journey, and the food which was given them by kindly hands. But the modern world, and with it the modern church, has forgotten the fine virtues of poverty, humility and obedience, and is tempted to accept the world's standard of financial measurement for all enterprises. It will come back one day to Jesus' estimate of real value.

It is not the proper care for the future, but undue and anxious thought, that absorbs concern and obscures more important things, that Jesus deprecated. Birds and flowers, he said, were cared for by the Father's hand. And men who were of infinitely greater value would be cared for in the same way, if, like the birds and lilies, they fulfilled with hearty cheerfulness the will of God in a social order that sought his glory. One day men will learn this truth also, and know that the great and good of all history have been those who, forgetting the physical standards of comfort and affluence, have given themselves rather to the realization of Christ purposes in the world, and thus have achieved true and lasting success.

Losing and Gaining Life.

They have not been men and women of wealth. On the other hand, they have not failed to prove the fact that those who seek the kingdom of God and his righteousness are likely to make good in the simple needs of daily life. Nothing is more pathetic than the superficial and false standards which the modern world has created for itself. Men and women are losing their lives because they imagine that only by the possession of wealth can happiness be found. Most of them fail even on this low level, for the number who win wealth is very small, and those who fail are thrown back too frequently into embittered and protesting states of mind, from which no service of good will to the world can be hoped.

Upon reflection, then, it is clear that Jesus' teaching regarding the worldly spirit as contrasted with the spirit of trust in God is proving itself true in the experience of every man who tests it. One need not be a literalist nor go to extremes in the advocacy of poverty and renunciation to see that Jesus' doctrine of the modest, simple and wholesome life, that accepts with gratitude what reasonable effort brings under the blessing of God, is the normal and right life to live. To miss this is not only to miss happiness but as well the opportunity to render any service to the world. And so the text which might be used as the central truth of all this portion of the great discourse is, "Seek ye first God's kingdom and righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you. Be not anxious."

In a Reflective Mood

Some time-honored things are honored in no other way.

Advice that accords with our plans is heartily welcomed.

The Golden Rule—something our neighbors should conform to.

Foresight is not genius, but sometimes it is a good substitute.

Life is largely guess-work, with most of the guesses, misses.

The old-time vices and the old-fashioned virtues we have ever with us.

With all our boasted ingenuity, no one has yet invented a fool-proof gun.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

Topic for February 20: Intemperance and Other Sins of the Body. Rom. 8:1-14.

This important subject is apropos of the prevailing habits and tendencies of today among young people. It also gives us an opportunity to say and do some very foolish things unless we stop to think. We should remember that every organ and every function of the body is holy, otherwise God would not have given it to us. It is when we abuse the body or any part of it that we are committing sin. When we are making the gratification of our bodily appetites and desires the object of our thoughts and purposes we "are after the flesh" and "mind the things of the flesh." God is spirit and calls man to a spiritual plane. He would have men to make the things of the higher life, justice, righteousness, kindness, love, the object of our ambition and our bodies should be instruments to help us realize these things. Therefore, "they that are in the flesh cannot please God." But we do well to remember that this is not a wholesale condemnation of the body. Paul also tells us that our bodies are temples of the Holy Spirit. And those who prize the things of God, love, joy, peace, kindness, patience, longsuffering, etc., i. e., let the Spirit of God dwell in them, are not in the flesh. The big truth then for us to remember in the study of this subject is the necessity of self-control. We are endowed with reason and the power to choose, and the body, with all its functions, must be made our servant and we its master.

The use of alcohol as a beverage is one of the most striking and the most common examples of how men may become enslaved to the appetite of the body. The testimony of all is that its habitual use undermines the physical constitution, ruins the nervous system, and renders one unfit for labor. It is admitted too, as a consequence that it impoverishes the mind and degrades the heart. The truth of this latter statement is the fact that the very great majority of immoral habits, vicious practices, and terrible crimes cluster around the places where alcohol is sold and drank. Knowing that these are admitted facts the young person who is exercising self-control will not use this stuff as a beverage. It brings harm and only harm.

In this connection we must not overlook other forms of abuse. It is unnecessary to dwell upon those unspeakable forms of social vice which flourish so widely in our great cities among all classes of society—especially those at either end of the social scale. They—all who practice such—are passing swiftly down the road to ruin. Their ways take fast hold on hell. Shun it as the boatman does the rapids of Niagara.

We must not forget the less flagrant but still unholy habits. The boy with a cigarette who tomorrow is the man with a cigarette—if he lives so long—is a pathetic sight. Weakness—both mental and physical, as well as moral untrustworthiness—we all feel even of the boy who uses them, to say nothing of the man. The business man does not want him in a responsible position, to say nothing of the work of the teacher, the moral reformer or the preacher.

If Jesus and Paul be our teachers, sins of the body are not confined to overt act. He who delights and persists in foul stories and vulgar language, goes to the cheap theater and the public dance-hall, where every appeal is made to the sensual, and feeds on cheap and vicious literature is paving the way for his speedy downfall and ruin. Such are essentially after the flesh.

As Christians the trend of our lives is to attain the spiritual—righteousness, truth, kindness, sympathy and service—and we must eschew all things which tend to choke them out.

Foreign Missionary News

W. R. Hunt has located permanently in Shanghai, China. It will be remembered that he was for many years in Chu Cheo. Since going to Shanghai he reports forty baptisms. He expects to build up a strong central missionary church. He has been in China twenty years.

Good news come from our self-supporting native church in Shanghai. It built its own house of worship. It is growing in numbers and in all Christian activity.

James Ware baptized one dozen men and women at the Yangstzpoo church recently.

W. R. Hunt has had only three personal teachers in China in twenty years and all of them have obeyed the gospel.

"We are going to make an effort to put our church in the Living-link rank this time." H. A. Kinley, Wilkinsburg, Pa.

F. M. Biddle of Wheeling, W. Va., A. F. Biddle of Seymour, Ind., and Mrs. Harry N. Biddle. wife of the late Dr. Biddle of Africa, gave $200.00 for the purpose of setting up a hospital cabin on the "S. S. Oregon."

The First Church at Wheeling, W. Va., has voted to become a Living-link in the Foreign Society. W. H. Fields is the minister. The same step has been taken by the church at Huntington, W. Va., C. H. Bass, minister. All the signs point to a very large number of new Living-links. This is the first year of our Second Century.

The Central Christian Church, Portland, Ore., has it in mind to become a Living-link in our foreign work at the earliest possible date. J. F. Ghormly is the pastor.

Last week the Foreign Society received two gifts of $500.00 each on the Annuity Plan; one from a friend in Michigan and one from a friend in Indiana. A week rarely goes by without such a gift and sometimes two or three of them. Let the friends keep them flowing into the treasury of the Lord, that the Word of the Lord may be sounded out to the perishing.

Bruce L. Kershner, Manila, P. I., reports seven baptisms in the Central Chapel. He also reports twenty-six weddings form June 10 to October 1, 1909.

The church at Winona, Mo., was an "every member church" last year, that is a church in which every member gave for Foreign Missions in the March Offering. This is the only church of this class known to us for 11909. The church at Shiloh, Ind., E. L. Frazier, minister, was in this class in 1908. Norwood, O., will make an effort to reach this rank this year. Norwood is a Living-link, but it hopes also to be an "every member" church.

Miss Lavinia Oldham, missionary of the Foreign Society to Tokio, Japan, says: "On New Year's day three railroad men called upon me and asked me to teach a Bible class in their school every Lord's day. It is a government school for preparing men for railroad positions, and the men have been selected from every province in Japan."

John Johnson, Nantungchow, China, reports a Sunday-school in that new station and that a lot has been secured for the new hospital.

Never before have the prospects for the March Offering been brighter. A large number of new churches are being enlisted, and all the indications point to a higher standard in the gifts.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first four months of the current missionary year amounted to $25,639, a gain of $3,685. There has been an all-around gain and the signs point to a general advance.

Last week a friend in Kentucky sent the Foreign Society $500 on the Annuity Plan. He rejoices in the opportunity of helping on the gospel campaign in this way.

Thousands of friends will be glad to know that the mission boat, the "S. S. Oregon" was shipped from the port at New York January 29. It will be landed at Matadi, mouth of the Congo, Africa. It will be taken up the Congo river to Leopoldville on the Congo railroad. At Leopoldville it will be met by Dr. Dye and other missionaries and there will be put up and will be taken up to Bolenge on her own steam. This is a new and important epoch in our work in Africa.

The Foreign Society lost one of its best friends in the death of the late Lathrop Cooley. He helped the work with wise counsel, earnest prayers and with his money. He had a world-wide interest in the spread of the gospel.

The serious sickness of Mrs. M. D. Madden made it necessary to call her husband by cablegram from Sendai, Japan. Mrs. Madden is now beter. One of the most aggressive and use ful evangelists in Japan is our own M. B. Madden. He is ready to visit churches if his wife continues to improve. The church at North Tonawanda, N. Y. supports him. V. W. Blair is the pastor.

An increasing number of churches are planning to enter the Living-link column in the March Offering, and it is encouraging to note that a number of churches formerly supporting a Living-link expect this year to raise $1,000 or more.

The way the March Offering supplies are being ordered from the office of the Foreign Society is encouraging indeed. Words of cheer come from every quarter. All the signs point to the greatest offering in our history. We suggest to the churches that they be prompt in ordering their supplies and making the necessary preparation.

We hope every church in the Brotherhood will plan to hold a Foreign Missionary Rally Sunday evening, February 27. A suggestive program wil be furnished upon application.

The increase in expenditure in China has leaped from $52,257 to $71,785 last year; the increase on the border of Tibet has gone up from $3,777 to $7,911; in the Philippine Islands the increase has been from $10,063 to $24,533; in Africa the increase has been from $8,112 five years ago to $31,925 last year.

J. H. Goldner, pastor of the Euclid Avenue church, Cleveland, O., says: "You will be pleased to know that our church has voted to treble its offering for Foreign Missions, that is $2,000." This is good news and this reminds us that the East End Church, Pittsburgh, Pa., expects to double its offering and give $1,200 instead of $600 as last ear. The First Church, Louisville, Ky., hopes also to increase its gifts for Foreign Missions this year. It has been standing loyally by the Living-link and now it wants to move up a notch. A number of churches are taking this step. Let this spirit spread to every church in the whole brotherhood.

The Laymen's Movement is effecting great things for Foreign Missions. Our people have been wonderfully helped by it in Pittsburgh. All the Protestant churches of that city have about determined to double their gifts of last year. This is true of other cities as well. Our preachers and brethren generally should avail themselves of the advantages of the Laymen's Movement in communities where the conventions are are held.

The following report indicates a fine condition of growth and progress: "We have closed six years' work as pastor of the Jewell Christian Church, and are entering upon the seventh. During this time a debt of $605 has been paid, a parsonage valued at $2,500 has been built, expenditures to the amount of $400 has been used on the church building, and a $350 piano has been installed in the church. The church is on the state honor roll every year. The church is becoming intensely missionary. More than one hundred have been added to the church during this time. All departments are in good working order and we begin the new year with fine prospects."—B. A. Cranner.

Church Life

Certain considerations make it impossible to fulfill our promise of a special Graded Sunday-school issue this week. This will be on the schedule at the earliest moment allowed by other interests which press for space.

The article on Our Readers' Opinions page last week entitled "Is God Christlike," was written by Evangelist J. M. Lowe, whose name was omitted by our error. Some of the considerations which Mr. Lowe urged seem to us to be true and not at all opposed to the editorial which called forth his excellent article. We agree with him, of course, that God is first in point of fact, but the inquiry and quest of each soul is to know what sort of God he is, what his attitude is toward us men. This question is not answered by mere innate ideas, but by Christ. He reveals the Father, he tells us that God is like himself, that he is a Christian God.

There were four additions to the church at Arkansas City, Kansas, January 23. Thomas Popplewell is pastor.

"We are using in our home 'The Daily Altar,' with a great deal of delight and satisfaction."—Garry L. Cook.

Chas. E. McVay has been assisting Pastor R. H. Heicke in a meeting at Fort Madison, Iowa. There were thirty-nine accessions.

G. W. Brewster, of Healdsburg, California, will begin work as pastor of the church at San Jose, about the middle of February.

P. H. Welshimer, pastor of the church at Canton, Ohio, will hold an eight days' revival meeting, beginning Sunday, February 27.

B. F. Shoemaker, after two years' pastorate at Nevada, Ia., has resigned. He has not announced his plans for the future.

The Christian Endeavor societies of Washington are in a contest for attendance and membership, which is developing great interest.

Hon. T. W. Phillips and Crayton S. Brooks were the chief speakers at a recent meeting of the men's club of the Second Church, Warren, Ohio.

The Brotherhood of the church at Massillon, Ohio, held a Lincoln meeting February 1. Each member was requested to come prepared to tell a Lincoln story.

The receipts of the A. C. M. S. for the quarter ending December 31 show a distinct gain over the quarter of the preceding year, the amount being $13,729.58.

C. A. Lowe, District Secretary of the Christian churches, preached in the First Church, St. Joseph, Mo., January 23. C. M. Chilton is pastor there.

H. H. Peters, field secretary of Eureka College, gave two addresses in the church at LaPorte, Ind., January 23. An offering was taken for the college.

The Central Church, Peoria, Ill., is engaged in an evangelistic meeting, led by Evangelist W. E. Harlow, of Springfield, Mo., and F. F. Dawdy, leader of song. W. F. Turner is pastor of the church.

Thomas Wallace, pastor of the church at Richland Center, Wisconsin, reports a meeting held there in which there were 100 accessions, mostly by confession. Wray and Davis were the evangelists.

At Sterling, Colorado, the church has just closed a three weeks' meeting, in which it was led by B. F. Clay and Floyd Chandler. There were fourteen additions to the church. W. B. Harter is the pastor.

The First Church, Eugene, Oregon, is planning to erect a $50,000 building during the coming summer.

"'The Daily Altar' is invaluable. I have never had anything I liked more. The quotations from the best poets, especially Browning, the poet of the soul, are incomparable." —Mrs. E. W. Martin, Fremont, Nebraska.

The Varneys and Marks evangelistic team closed a meeting at Denver, Ill., January 27. There were fourteen accessions. The work of the evangelists is commended by J. T. Sapp, Canton, Mo., pastor of the church.

The statistics published in the last Year Book tell us that we have 11,614 churches. Of this number 3,480 made contributions to the Foreign Board, 2,120 to the American Society, and 1,318 to Church Extension work.

Rev. C. H. Hands and wife, of Berlin, united with the First Church, Springfield, Ill., the fourth Sunday in January. Mr. Hands was formerly pastor of a Baptist church, but comes now to labor with the Disciples.

Oliver McCully, who has been living on a ranch near Boulder, Colorado, has taken the church at Manzanola, Colo. Mr. McCully entirely regained his health within the past two years. The church at Manzanola is to be congratulated in securing such a competent minister.

Miss Annette Newcomer, State Secretary of C. W. B. M. for Iowa, spoke in the First Church, Milwaukee, both morning and evenin, January 30. Claire L. Waite is just closing a three years' pastorate with this church.

Mark A. Collins, the Living-link of the church at Harrodsburg, Ky., and stationed at Waynesborough, Pa., reports the year just past as the best in the history of our work in that place, where they now have 125 members.

Lee Ferguson, pastor at Prosser, Washington, says four fine young men came into the membership of the church, January 23. These were by confession and obedience. The same day at regular services there were five other accessions.

J. S. Raum, Corresponding Secretary of Montana, writes that the vigorous young church at Great Falls has secured C. A. Park of Whiting, Iowa, for pastor, beginning February 1. We welcome Mr. Park to our growing list of missionaries in the home land.

Clark Bower, the new Sunday-school evangelist of Colorado, is now working in the northern part of the state, endeavoring to bring the schools up to the International standard. He recently spent a few days at Boulder and was given a hearty welcome by the church.

The church at Durango, Colo., is making good progress. They recently dedicated a new building in a splendid location. R. H. Newton is the effective leader of this work. In a union evangelistic campaign, some thirty people decided to affiliate with this church. A resolution was recently heartily endorsed to the effect that no more money be raised for church purposes by pay socials or other unscriptural means, but that for the next three months the tithing system be adopted. Every man in the congregation signed the resolution.

The official board, members, and friends of the Union Avenue Church, St. Louis, Mo., gave a farewell reception to Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Philputt, Thursday evening, January 27. Mr. Philputt has been pastor of this church for a little more than six years. He came at the time when two separate congregations were being merged preparatory to building a fine new house of worship. The congregation now numbers 900 members and raised last year $25,000. Dr. and Mrs. Philputt left February 1 for their trip abroad, which will last perhaps a year.

E. F. Daugherty, pastor of the church at Wabash, Ind., is preaching the following series of sermons on Sunday mornings during January and February: "The Square Deal Philosophy," "Publicity's Corrections," "Manhood's Dawning Arousement," "The Passing of Bossism," "Unprecedented Beneficiences," "Intra-Moralism," "The Law—a Force." His evening subjects for the same time are: "The Anvil Chorus of Muck-Rakers," "Syndicated Sinners," "The Cymbals of Local Gossip," "The Stilettoes of Liars," "Scintillating Extravagances," "Graft and Grafters," "The Quagmires of Indifference."

W. J. Lhamon has just closed a meeting with the church at Wellsville, N. Y., in which there were forty-seven accessions. The pastor, J. C. Crosby, in writing of the meeting, says: "But the paramount value of the revival effort lay in its educational qualities. Mr. Lhamon is a pioneer in educative evangelism. His meetings were really a course of cultured Christian instruction in the character and purpose of Jesus of Nazareth." The church was very greatly pleased with the work of Mr. Lhamon, and he has left so good an impression in the community that the work of the church must henceforth be easier and more effective. Byron D. Burditt, of LaFayette, Ind., was leader of song, and delighted all with his solos and chorus work.

It is often suggestive to preachers to know what other men are preaching. Here is a list of Wednesday evening lectures by A. W. Fortune, pastor of the Walnut Hills Church, Cincinnati, Ohio: "Rehoboam, and a Nation's Down-fall," "Isaiah, and a Nation's Call to Righteousness," "Nehemiah, and the Restoration of a City," "Ezra, and the Restoration of the Law," "Job, and the Problem of Suffering," "The Preacher, and the Problem of the Highest Good," "Daniel, and the Divine Protection of the Faithful," "Jonah, and the Impossibility of Escaping Duty," "Judas Maccabaeus, and the Call for Heroism," "The Pharisees, and the Messianic Hope," "John the Baptist, and the Call to Repentance."

The church at East Liverpool, Ohio, is harmonious and hard at work, under the leadership of E. P. Wise. There were eight confessions at regular services on a recent Sunday evening. They are just beginning a series of evangelistic meetings with Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Darley, of Beaver Falls, Pa., as evangelists. The annual report of this church shows: money raised for current expenses, $2,176.41; for improvement of building, $833.75; for the Sunday-school, $954.56; by the C. W. B. M., $214.03; by the Junior Endeavor, $42.00; by the Intermediate, $2.52; by the Senior Endeavor, $406.72, making a total of $3,234.85.

F. W. Norton, who will live in the history of the Disciples for the large part he had in the building of the Wharton Memorial at Hiram, Ohio, not to speak of other good work he has done or may yet accomplish, has become pastor of the church at St. Thomas, Ontario. As to the matter of reporting what one is doing, Mr. Norton says: "As to reports on work, John P. Sala spoke his mind in The Christian Century of January 20. And yet there is much worth reporting, real news, stimulating others to good endeavor. No doubt that if matters could be regulated so that our religious papers contained more items of general interest and less of the brethren's self advertising, many would feel like reporting, who cannot now bring themselves to do so. Let us know what the workers are doing that marks real progress in the kingdom." It is just this sort of a news department that The Christian Century seeks to give its readers.

The attendance of the Sunday-school at Blandinsville, Ill., has doubled during the last year. The church is harmonious and moving forward in all departments. C. R. Wolford is pastor.

Professor H. T. Sutton and wife of Eureka, Ill., were in Chicago last week with their little daughter of four years, whose illness was causing them deep concern. A card has just been receiving saying that their hope and plans were in vain and that Pauline slipped away from them into death. Tender sympathy goes out to this estimable family from their host of friends.

The veteran leader, L. L. Carpenter, lies very near death's door in Kansas City. His illness attacked him while absent from Wabash, Ind., his home, but the Disciples of Kansas City are delighting to show him courtesy and care. The pastors' alliance sent him a resolution of sympathy last week, extending appreciation of his fruitful ministry, his extraordinary mental and spiritual grasp of our plea and pledging him their prayers for his recovery, or, if God wills otherwise, their assurances that to be with Christ will be for him "far better." Thousands of the acquaintances and friends of this splendid hero of the cross will join in tender solicitude for him.

The following annual report of the Jefferson Street Church, Buffalo, N. Y., B. S. Ferral, pastor, shows good normal work, and will prove of interest: Pastor now three months in his seventh year with the church. During past twelve months he made 1,281 calls, married ten couples, officiated at thirty funerals (nine being members of this congregation), had 128 responses to gospel invitation (eighty of these coming from the Bible-school). Of the total number added, eighty-seven were by primary obedience, delivered thirty addresses. The Sunday-school averaged 462 during the year and raised a total of $1,561.51, of which $634.94 was for missionary purposes. The church raised about $4,800, of which over $1,300 was for missions. New hymnals were put in the pews and a new individual communion set installed. The church purchased a corner building-lot on which a chapel for the Kehr Street Mission will have a new house of worship by early spring. The church supports F. L. Mendenhall in China and R. E. Deadman in the city at the Kehr St. Mission, that is soon to become a church.

The First Christian Church of Boulder, Colo., has just closed the most successful year in its history. There were 135 additions during the year and every department has taken on new life. The missionary spirit is growing in the church. The Sunday-school gave $100 to the Denver Orphans' Home, the first school in the state to become a Life liner. The church raised $500 more than last year on current expenses, and closed the year out of debt. The Juniors and Intermediates made the pastor, A. L. Ward, a Life Member of the C. W. B. M. The pastor has a class of twenty-five men studying "The Gospel of the Kingdom," by Josiah Strong. The Brotherhood was organized with a large number of the men of the church as members. The pastor has added two instruments of work which he never tires praising, an automobile and a stereopticon. The auto has added much to the pastoral work and the stereopticon has enabled him to give many interesting and instructive lectures on missions at home and abroad. The Foreign Society has gladly furnished slides for this work. Steps have been taken to thoroughly grade the Sunday-school.

In connection with Geo. B. Van Arsdall's close of his pastorate at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, the following comparative statement of the growth of the church during the five years of his pastorate was made the church: Resident members five years ago, 285. New members received into the church by confession and baptism, 253; by letter or statement, 187; total, 440. Present resident membership, 507, of which number 213 are of the original membership and 294 new members. Actual net gain in membership is 222. Financial statement: This statement covers the receipts in the church and all its societies. April and May, 1905, missions, $368. General expense—$793, total $1,156. June, 1905, to June, 1906, missions, $1,732; general expense, $4,435; total for year, $6,167. June, 1906, to June, 1907, missions, $1,510; general expense, $5,-789; total for year, $7,299. June, 1907, to June, 1908, missions, $1,947; general expense, $5,127; total for year, $7,074. June, 1908, to June, 1909, missions, $1,965; general expense, $5,715; total for the year, $7,680. June, 1908, to February, 1910, missions, $854; general expense, $3,132; total, $3,986. Grand total for missions, $8,371. For general expenses, $24,991. Receipts for church building lots, $6,435. Grand total for all purposes, $39,797.

No better news will be found in our pages this week than the announcement that C. G. Kindred has resumed the pastorate of the Englewood Church, Chicago. It will be recalled that his resignation from this pulpit some six weeks ago was accompanied by the statement that he would withdraw from the ministry and enter business life. In the newspaper reports of the resignation general publicity was given to certain infelicities in the pastor's home life which made further continuance in the ministry impossible. The congregation was deeply grieved that Mr. Kindred felt compelled to resign his work, and set about in the spirit of Christ to heal the domestic wound. This has now been accomplished. Rarely do we witness so gracious a transformation as has been brought about through the prayers and good offices of a congregation whose attachment to pastor and wife is that of profound affection. In view of the wide publicity given the regrettable episode during past weeks by the secular press, it is due both Mr. and Mrs. Kindred to say that the search light of newspaper enterprise in seeking for a sensational "story" has only revealed the universal respect in which each is held by the entire community and the utter absence of even the palest rumor upon which discrediting insinuations might be based. All Chicago ministers and laymen will rejoice at the signal triumph of Christianity in this most delicate situation.

Richard Martin, of "The Martin Family," is in a meeting held in the newly dedicated church at Salisbury, Mo. There have been about fifty additions. The audiences have been so large that it has been necessary to hold overflow meetings in the city hall.

S. J. White, pastor of the church at Chillicothe, Mo., has the distinction of having more of his men subscribe to Christian Men than any other pastor in the United States. In recognition of this service, the publication has made Mr. White an appropriate present.

Colorado is calling for double the amount of money she gave to state missions last year. It is expected that this will be raised. The first Lord's Day in February has been set apart for the offering to this work. The churches are showing a deep interest.

H. D. Sedinger closed his work as State Evangelist in Alabama, December 15. Raymond Sherrer, of Jellico, Tenn., succeeds him, taking up the work March 1. Alabama and the entire South presents a most inviting field to the American Christian Missionary Society.

Norman H. Robertson, pastor at Colfax, Ill., held a three weeks' meeting with his brother, C. J. Robertson, at Heyworth, Ill. Good audiences were in attendance. There were thirty-six additions to the membership. This church is making rapid progress under the leadership of Mr. Robertson.

A very successful meeting is being held by the Geddes Street Church, Syracuse, N. Y. The pastor, C. R. Stauffer, is preaching, and Miss Una Dell Berry, LaFayette, Indiana, is leading the singing. Some of the sermon topics for the second week of the meeting were: "Sowing and Reaping," "Why I Accept the Bible," and "Faith and Its Importance."

Ben. F. Hill and son, Harry, are now in a good meeting with the church at Lanark, Ill. The town has many churches, most of them doing very little, and slow to take hold of aggressive programs, but Mr. Hill is working earnestly, and with a stout heart. He has March and April unengaged.

The Brotherhood of the church at Modesto, Calif., is doing vital work. The men of the Presbyterian church of the city recently invited these men to a union banquet, at which the question of a united effort for civic betterment was considered. J. W. Webb is pastor of the church at Modesto.

Dean A. M. Haggard, of Drake University, was called upon to dedicate the new church at Clinton, Ill., Sunday, January 30. The church has been thoroughly remodeled during the last four months at a cost of nearly $5,000, and is so changed as to hardly be recognized as the same place.

R. E. L. Prunty has begun his pastorate at LaBelle, Mo., with a four weeks' meeting, which closed January 30. There were forty accessions to the church. Miss Nellie Northcutt, of Knox City, was leader of song. The church is strong and happy in its helpful ministry in the community.

P. C. Macfarlane and R. A. Long, of Kansas City, Mo., Secretary and President of the Men's Brotherhood, will within a few days visit Des Moines and hold special conferences with the clubs of the churches there, regarding their work. Mr. Long will give an address at a union meeting of the clubs.

Thirty-six new men were added to the Bellevue (Pa.) Men's Bible class as a result of the contest between the Reds and Blues. Wm. Ross Lloyd, the pastor, says the banquet and toasts given by the Reds to the Blues was one of the finest social events of the church. This is now one of the large classes of the country.

Miss Lucile May Park assisted J. P. Lucas at Tingley, Iowa, in a three weeks' meeting, which was very successful. There were eleven accessions, six by baptism. Miss Park graduated a class of forty-five in Primary Bible study, also. All departments of church work are in excellent condition, and constantly increasing in numbers and interest.

A. L. Orcutt closed a meeting of two weeks at the Fourth Church, Indianapolis, January 30. There were nine added by confession and nine by letter, and the church much strengthened and helped by Bro. Orcutt's earnest preaching. The church is thoroughly organized in all departments and doing efficient work.

The churches of Holtville, California, are in a union meeting with the M. E. church. The Methodist preacher and Sumner T. Martin, pastor of the Christian church, preach on alternate evenings. There have been forty confessions. A Christian Endeavor Society has just been organized in the Christian church.

E. E. Moorman, pastor of the Englewood Church, Indianapolis, read a paper on "The Minister's Recreation" before the Indianapolis ministers' meeting, January 23. The discussion made it apparent that the ministers were all of the opinion that the preacher should devote one day a week to his favorite recreation.

The work prospers at Kensington Church, Philadelphia, under H. W. Cadwell. Evangelist H. F. Lutz is in a good meeting there.

The church at Wilkesbarre, Pa., is concentrating every effort to get into a home of its own this year. They have a good building

SERIOUS QUESTIONS FOR THOUGHTFUL CHRISTIANS

If missions are of any importance they are tremendously important. Ought the missionary enterprise ever to have been launched? Should it now be discontinued?

Have the results of missions justified the time and thought and expenditure of the men and money required?

Do the Scriptures clearly and distinctly and beyond all question lay the obligation upon Christions of preaching the gospel to the whole wide world?

Has the Foreign Missionary work actually kept back, or in any way hindered, the progress of the Christian church in the home land?

Do those most active in Foreign Missions manifest a lack of concern regarding the needs of the home land and of the local church?

Does the local work suffer in those congregations where the most active interest is shown in the work abroad?

What are some of the helpful reactions upon men and churches, who engage actively and generously in the missionary enterprise?

Can the heathen, living today in need of the gospel and entitled to its blessings, justly be asked to withhold their appeal until conditions at home have all been thoroughly righted?

What has been the successful program thus far of extending the gospel in the world, including the practice of Jesus and his Apostles, and the primitive church?

Would it be reasonable for the present generation of Christians to seriously undertake the evangelization of the whole world? Are the resources of men and money sufficent for the task?

When we consider the results of missionary effort in either the first or the nineteenth century, is the history discouraging? Has the enterprise been a mistake from the beginning, or is it practicable, reasonable, expedient, and even imperative?

What has been the general influence of the missionary upon the world? Has he made contributions of importance to the world's knowledge—to geography, natural science, to philology and other branches of learning? Has he helped or hindered the world's commerce and trade?

In a word, do Foreign Missions pay? Can all the results of this or any Christian work be accurately tabulated? What is the total number of Christians in heathen lands? Has there been encouraging progress in visible results during the past one-hundred years?

Have our own people been helped in this country and in our local churches since 1875 by the organization and work of our Foreign Christian Missionary Society? Have we done less at home on account of what we have done abroad?

site and hope to dedicate next May. Chas. E. Frick is supported here by the help of The Margaret Oliver Memorial Fund.

There were fifty-three accessions to the church at Hepner, Oregon, during the meeting which closed January 9. Thirty-seven of these were by baptism. Pastor J. P. Conder writes that the church is in excellent condition for aggressive work. The audiences are better than ever before. But Mr. Conder has received many calls for evangelistic work, and will soon move to Des Moines to give his entire time to this service.

D. B. Titus is in an excellent meeting in the new town, Jerome, Idaho. Mr. Titus had expected to devote his energies to evangelistic work in the Northwest; the church at Rupert, where Mr. Titus has been pastor for three years, has urged him to remain with them, and he has yielded to their entreaty. We rejoice in this determination for pastor and people to remain together. C. H. Altheide is leader of song in the meeting at Jerome.

Following the suggestion of B. B. Tyler, announced in The Christian Century, John H. Booth, pastor of the church at Centerville, Iowa, is preaching a series of "Reasons Why Sermons." He says that one fine man has come into the church directly through the influence of these sermons. The men of this church, under the leadership of Dr. J. L. Sawyer, are having very interesting meetings.

Howard Peters is the Living-link at Ft. Smith, Ark., where E. B. Bagby ministers. That church is highly gratified with the splendid work he is doing at Altus, Ark. One year ago there were but fourteen members, today, 140. Then there was no meeting house, now there is a beautiful building costing $4,200, this amount being raised without help from the outside and from people rated "poor in this world's goods but rich in faith."

A novel way of illustrating the Christian Endeavor topic, "Does Religion Pay?" for January 23, was carried out by the Boyle Heights Christian Church society of Los Angeles, Cal. Members of the society took the parts necessary for a mock trial, in which an injunction was sought by one, An Honest Thinker, to restrain one, A. Christian, from following his usual mode of life as a follower of Christ. The jury returned a verdict in favor of Christian.

The Steamship "Oregon" is on its way to the Congo. This announcement comes a year sooner than it was at first expected possible. Geo. C. Richey, Newberg, Oregon, who has the raising of the money in hand, is very anxious that all the pledges to this missionary vessel be received before the boat reached its destination, also that $2,500 in new gifts be turned in. We take it that gifts from outside Oregon will be accepted also. Try it.

F. W. Norton, formerly in the field as representative of the Wharton Memorial Home, located with the church at St. Thomas, Ont., soon after the Centennial Convention. Our church in St. Thomas has about 375 resident members and is one of the most influential that we have in Canada. The work is opening splendidly. He has recently organized a Business Men's Bible class with forty charter members.

There are twenty young men in one of the classes of the Sunday-school of the First Church, Evanston, Ill., where O. F. Jordan is the pastor. Mr. Jordan has arranged the following interesting Sunday evening meetings for February: (1) N. D. Pratt will speak on "Memories of Moody." (2) Mr. Colby, Protestant representative in the Juvenile court, will speak on child saving work in Chicago. (3) A. T. Campbell will speak of religious work in the Chicago play-grounds. (4) "A Man's Work in a Man's Way" will be the subject of the address by the pastor.

The church at Pomeroy, Washington, held an all-day meeting the first day of the new year. Just before the dinner hour, the pastor, H. S. Champie, gave a sermon. In the afternoon, the business meetings of the church were held, and in the evening the church began, with the help of home forces alone, a protracted meeting. There were seven additions to the church the first week.

G. F. DeVol, who gives half of his time to the church at Mendon, Mo., and the other half to the church at Rothville, sends the following report for the year. At Mendon: money raised for missions. $25; for education, $100; for repair of building, $1,200; for pastor's salary, $500—an average of $18 per member. The Rothville church gave, for missions, $237.50; for education, $125; on pastor's salary, $500—an average of $8 per member. Mr. DeVol continues to preach for the Rothville church another year.

The new church at Tulsa, Okla., was dedicated January 30. The church began this building about a year ago. The money for the payment of all indebtedness was almost all in hand before the day of the dedication. George L. Snively, of St. Louis, had charge of the dedicatory service. D. A. Wickizer, the pastor, has done faithful work in bringing about this commendable result. He has acted on the building committee, and himself served as architect in planning the building, which meets the universal approval of the church.

The beautiful new building of the Rowland St. Church, now located on South Geddes street, Syracuse, N. Y., was dedicated Sunday, January 23, by F. M. Rains, of Cincinnati. New lots and building cost over $15,000. $8,000 needed on dedication day. $8,300 pledged. A great victory for a church in the East, not yet six years old. The building is a gem. The auditorium seats over 300. Six large class rooms in basement, with all modern conveniences. Pastor's study and robing room in connection with auditorium. C. R. Stauffer is pastor.

We have just received the printed report of the University Church, Lincoln, Nebraska, where H. O. Pritcard is pastor. The present membership of the church is 792, including sixty-one additions in a meeting just closed. During the last year there were 125 accessions to the church. In two and one-half years of Mr. Pritchard's ministry there has been a net gain in the membership of 345. The church paid on the building fund during the last year $12,606.96. There is still a debt of $18,000 on the building. This is covered by pledges. Paid for missions last year, $1,905.43. The total receipts were $17,669.32, a gain of $4,355.13. The enrollment in the various organizations is as follows: Sunday-school, 605 (gain, 170); Ladies' Aid, 80 (gain, 20); C. W. B. M., 168 (gain, 17); Senior C. E., 168 (loss, 20); Intermediate C. E., 45 (gain, 10); Junior C. E., 108 (gain, 25).

The church at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, gave a reception to their departing pastor, G. B. Van Arsdall, and his wife, the last Thursday evening in January. The meeting was well attended by the members and friends of the church who were anxious to express to Mr. and Mrs. Van Arsdall their appreciation of the work they had accomplished for the church and the community. The local papers were generous in the space they gave to an account of the work of Mr. Van Arsdall, and their comments indicate a discerning observation of his work, in its high spiritual tone and its appeal to the intelligence of people, while losing none of the deeper elements of the Christian religion. Mr. Van Arsdall preached his last sermon in the church Sunday morning, January 30, and left for Denver the same afternoon that he might be present at the farewell reception given Dr. Breeden by the Central Church, Denver. Mrs. Van-Arsdall and son will remain in Cedar Rapids until the last of March, when Mr. Van Arsdall will return to accompany them to the western city.

A NEW JUNIOR TERM
(for pupils 9 to 12 years old)
Begins February 20
IN THE GRADED SUNDAY SCHOOL
All our orders for the Bethany supplies for this grade have been kept on file and will be filled by that date. These supplies will last until July 1. Now is the time for many new schools to introduce the BETHANY GRADED LESSONS.

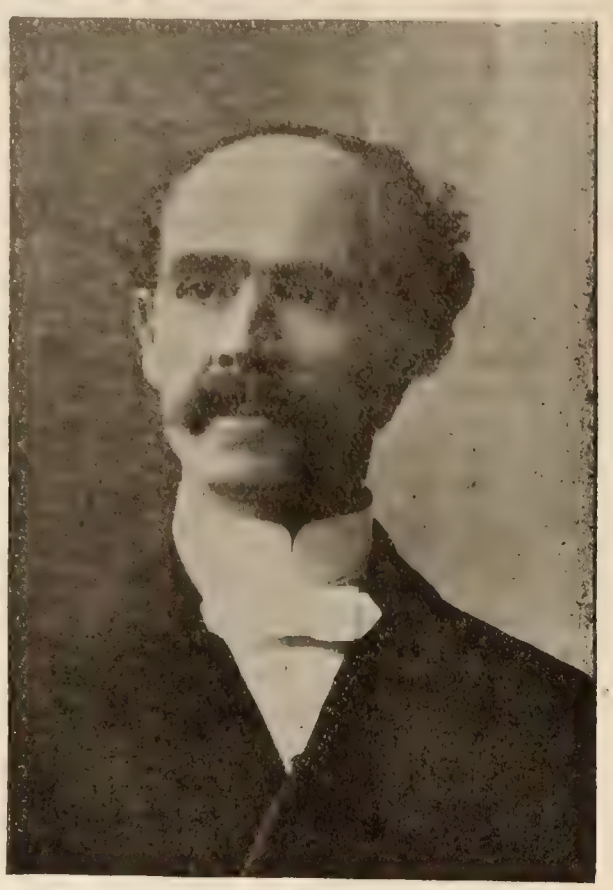
The Quarterly Assembly Greets the New American Secretary

By O. F. Jordan

Every change in secretaries of the American Christian Missionary Society has significance to the work in Chicago in some way. The tidings of the resignation of W. J. Wright was received here with sorrow as he nad been much interested in the city problem, and during his brief term of office advance steps had been taken in eastern cities. When our new secretaries, McCash and Lewis, were announced, we felt an immediate interest in their attitude toward the home missionary situation in America.



This will account then for some of the unusual interest in the coming of Dr. McCash to Chicago last week. We wanted to meet him and to observe how he would act in the presence of the great human problems of our city life.

We were interested in the fact in advance that we had for our secretary for the first time a man who was a Doctor. Not that he himself cares much about the title. But it is significant to have a man at the head of our great national society of scholarly attainments who joins the culture of the schools with the refinements of foreign travel. Scholastic titles have never been very popular among the Disciples; we ought, however, to hold in continually higher esteem the training that they represent.

We heard Dr. McCash first at the dedication in Austin. It is the place of all places where the desire to succeed will lead preachers to questionable methods and unworthy expedients. We had thought that no man could raise the money needed that morning and we were by no means ignorant of the field. Dr. McCash preached a devotional sermon which had for its culmination the idea of Christian sacrifice. With great dignity, and yet with a tremendous urgency, he presented the appeal of the building committee for funds. The results were such as to make him long remembered in the community. None had been over-urged. He left a religious feeling in the hearts of the givers which was as it should be. The money was raised.

Dr. McCash was surprised as are most of our visitors at the size of our quarterly meeting. Owing to the number of vacant pulpits around Chicago just now and to the dedication at Austin on the asme day, the attendance was not quite so large as usual, though Jackson Boulevard Church brought eighty-five members. It was nevertheless a gathering to inspire one with the sense of the fellowship of the Chicago churches. Dr. McCash was the speaker of the afternoon. He made the point of his address to show the importance of our city task and something of the nature of it. The former preacher of the University Church in Des Moines faced an audience in which many old members of his congregation were present and these were especially moved by the sound of the familiar voice. We were all inspired to undertake greater things for the kingdom. Doctor McCash asked for more subscribers to our building syndicate and an additional thirty members were secured agreeing to pay five dollars on each church erected in the Chicago field.

On Monday following these strenuous exercises, the new secretary was on hand early to investigate with us some of the problems of our city life. We were especially anxious over the problem of establishing a foreign work. We have a Hungarian preacher ready to go to work for us, who holds a Ph. D. degree from the University of Vienna. He has been a successful minister to his own people in another religious body. There are three great centers for the Hungarian Magyars in America—New York, Pittsburg and Chicago. We found that they had arrived in Chicago to the number of fifteen thousand. Since they speak both German and Slavic, they have not settled in one large colony as the Poles have been compelled to do on account of their language. The largest settlement of Hungarians seemed to be on the North Side in the factory district known as Clybourn. Other settlements were found in the Hull House neighborhood and in the district southeast of this. It is too early to know what the policy of the two societies can be toward this problem. At any rate we are much encouraged to know that we have a secretary who is curious to see things and not simply to hear about them. He is coming back to Chicago to go over the problems of city evangelization more in detail.

We were interested to note how our churches in Chicago impressed the new secretary. We had a chart on which were pasted photographs of all our buildings in Chicago. This chart tells in a most graphic way the story of the city's need of equipment. It proved a most interesting object to Dr. McCash. He deplored the fact of our churches being compelled to do their work in such miserable buildings as some of them have. We have one five thousand dollar church on a twenty-five thousand dollar lot. In a village, these figures might be reversed and a twenty-five thousand dollar church on a five thousand dollar lot make a great showing in the community. We have one church worshipping in a board tabernacle. We have another at work in a little building that seats eighty people when it is full. There are no large and imposing structures such as our people enjoy at Kansas City, St. Louis or Indianapolis. Dr. McCash was much interested in the plan of our building syndicate which was described in these pages a few weeks ago and expressed himself as much pleased with it. He declared the p'an unique in our brotherhood.

Dr. McCash has been a pastor all of his life. He is well into middle life. We hope that these qualities will persevere in him.

The Bethany Graded Sunday-School Lessons

Will the new Graded lessons make their way into the Sunday-schools and become the standard lessons of the Sunday-schools of the world as the Uniform lessons have done? There are many signs indicating that this is precisely what will happen.

1. All the authorities in religious pedagogy have been a long time agreed that it is better to suit the lesson to the learner than to compel the learner to adapt himself to the lesson, regardless of his stage of mental development.

2. The International Committee which has for thirty-five years selected the Uniform lessons has now begun the issue of an additional series called the International Graded Course, consisting, not of one Scripture lesson for the entire school, but of a separate series of lessons for each year or grade, chosen with direct reference to the age and ability of the pupils.

3. These lessons are being adopted by the best schools of all denominations. The Presbyterians report that about two thousand of their schools adopted the International Graded courses for children under twelve years, last quarter. This is phenomenal. The Methodists and Congregationalists had to go to press the second and third time to supply the unexpected demand for the graded lessons.

The New Christian Century Co. is supplying these lessons to the Disciples' schools. There is no single achievement in which the publishers of this paper take greater satisfaction than in connecting our schools with this most significant Sunday-school advance of the last fifty years.

The editors of The Christian Century, Mr. Morrison and Professor Willett, both regard the Graded principle as essential to the highest efficiency in religious instruction, and both believe that the Bethany Series is the truest, simplest and most artistic set of supplies for the elementary grades that has ever been put out.

Our pleasure in offering the Bethany Graded Lessons to the brotherhood is enhanced by the fact that our orders for supplies for the winter quarter have been much beyond our expectations. Many other schools have assured us of their purpose to adopt The Bethany Lessons at once. This series may be begun at any time. See full description on another page.

The New Christian Century Co., 700 E. 40th St., Chicago.

Our preachers need a pastor such as he has been to local congregations. We hope that the grind of office work may be put on other shoulders somewhat and that he may have time for the more spiritual ministries in which he has been so capable in the past. The leader of the great cause of home missions must be more than a mere money raiser. He must have sagacity beyond the drawing up of annual reports and the sending out of fervent appeals. He must feel the grip of the great human problem that lies before him. There must be before his eyes continually the suffering millions and their sin and misery. As pastor to the United States and its unevangelized populations, Dr. McCash will have a far greater spiritual ministry than he has had in any of his great pastorates. Each of us pastors knows the need of faithful workers. If we have called Dr. McCash to be the pastor of our unevangelized millions, we should never forget his need that we work faithfully in the ranks to second every good project that looks to the saving of souls.

GRADE YOUR SCHOOL

On the Installment Plan!

Every informed Sunday-school worker desires to have the graded system introduced into his school. But it seems like too big an undertaking to grade the school all at once. Hence nothing at all is done, and the school goes on in the same old absurd way of teaching the children the lessons provided for grown-up people.

The International S. S. Committee has made it possible to bring the graded system in, like the Kingdom of God comes, "without observation." You can have your school graded without any agony—almost without knowing it, except in its beneficent results. Begin at the bottom now—with the elementary grades, the pupils under twelve years old. Provide teachers and pupils with the Bethany Graded Lessons, based on the outlines already authorized by the International Committee. Later on—perhaps in nine months or a year from now—when the Committee authorizes an outline of lessons for the Intermediate grades you will be ready to adopt them and the Bethany Series will be ready with the helps for you. And so on, through the Senior and Advanced grades, follow the International Committee and as fast as they provide the lessons you will be ready to adopt them.

Our advice to all schools, then, is: FOLLOW THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE. No independent course yet devised is better than that provided by the International Committee, if indeed there is one so good in all respects. Besides, there is advantage in the whole Sunday-school world studying together when our leaders really lead—as the International Committee is now doing.

The Bethany Graded Lessons may be commenced at any time. Purchase the main bulk of your supplies wherever you wish, but let us furnish you these fascinating lessons for your pupils under twelve. THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO., 700 East Fortieth Street, Chicago.

As We Go to Press

Eminence, Ky., Feb. 3.—The officers of the Eminence church voted unanimously to enter the ranks of the Living Link Churches this year in the Foreign Society, if possible.—Joseph D. Armistead, pastor.

Chapin, Ill., Jan. 22.—Closed a three weeks' meeting here last night with eight added, three by letter and five confessions. Bro. Jno. C. Lappin, of Armington, was the evangelist. His sermons were strong and well received by all.—T. L. Read.

Vincennes, Ind., Feb. 6.—Meeting three weeks old. Three hundred and two additions. Praise God from whom all blessings flow. Great crowds. Intense interest. Thirty-one added today. Wilhite mighty in proclaiming word of God. Tuckerman doing great work as leader of song. Great enthusiasm prevails. Great victory in sight. We continue. —Wm. Oeschger.

Keokuk, Ia., Feb. 6.—Victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. Once more God has marvelously led our Brother Thompson. With no printing or advertising since meeting started he has packed the church all the time and confessions are being heard at every meeting. Twenty-four last week. Organized adult Bible Class today with twenty members, also Christian Endeavor society with thirty members. We continue.—N. E. Cory, pastor.

Little Rock, Ark., Feb. 6.—Our great meeting here will close with reception tomorrow night. Sixty-six added today; $1,055 to date. This has been one of the most pleasant fellowships of our experience. Jessup, Brooks and our aged brother, Browning have been A. K. Brooks preached; fifty children in the nursery. One hundred and thirty-one last week; sixty today; 911 to date. Meeting grows deeper and wider. Our cause is taking heart everywhere. It has been a long hard fight in the South, mainly because we have been misrepresented "In the house of our friend." Prejudice has been strong. The great plea is being heard and the response is as fine and hearty as was ever seen; nothing now can be said of Brother Scoville. He is a master in his profession and a prince among men. Mrs. Scoville is a great power in song and beautiful in character; meeting continues.—J. N. Jessup.

York, Neb., Feb. 7.—Eight nights invitation. 103 confessions, mostly young men and women of society age. Many prominent young men surprising the town. Last night garage overflowing long before services. Eight churches packed and additions at all. A spiritual wave sweeps the town irrespective of denomination. At first ministerial alliance indifferent but now every minister praising the work. My Saturday night lectures pack the large garage. Last Saturday night hundreds turned away. Both services for men and women only packed the garage. Mayor Kirkpatrick and the president of York Commercial Club of over 200 members called at my hotel to arrange for a Business Men's revival, looking to temporal and moral conditions. I address them tonight. Our church jubilant and thanking God for this unexpected and undreamed of opportunity. Considering local conditions we are all surprised. Buss here and doing great singing. I loaned Sturgis to Fairfield for few weeks where Dr. Cooksey is in a fine meeting. Engagement at garage closes Friday. California next. Address me Chicago, general delivery.—Herbert Yeuell.

College President Holds Successful Evangelistic Meeting

Yesterday we closed the best series of meetings the Ninth Street Church has ever had. Rev. R. H. Crossfield of Lexington, Ky., was the evangelist and Captain S. O. Murphey was the singer. I have never been in a meeting of any kind where the evangelist and singer both gave such universal satisfaction as did these two men. The preaching was the strong manly appeal of the simple gospel to transform the lives of men and women. The singer touched the hearts of the people by his solos and in a hapy and pleasing manner led the large chorus and congregation. On Sunday nights hundreds were turned away for lack of standing room. The last has never been counted an easy field but such work as these men did backed by a willing and harmonious church accomplished great results. There were all told 168 who came forward during the three weeks and one day that the services lasted. Six of these were at the Bening Church where we went to the Bible School on Sunday afternoon. There were 141 confessions and 9 others who had never before been connected with any of our churches. This gives this splendid church a membership of nearly 1200. The Bible School reached an attendance of 675. The services could have contiued profitably much longer as there were 37 additions the last day—24 the last invitation, mostly grown men and women. It would be a great blessing if these two men could give their lives to this work.

Indianapolis' New Church

The North Park Church was dedicated last Sunday, January 16. The building was crowded at the three services, and it was a great day in the experience of our people. Considerable more money was raised than we expected to raise, and the remaining indebtedness can be readily handled without injury to the work. Bro. F. M. Rains is a master in his line of work, and he won the unstinted praise of our people. While in the city he was the guest of Rev. W. D. Starr and family, friends of many years.

The afternoon service was one of great delight. All but two of the churches in the city were represented, and letters of congratulation were read from churches of other

CLEAR-HEADED.

Head Bookkeeper Must be Reliable.

The chief bookkeeper in a large business house in one of our great Western cities speaks of the harm coffee did for him:

"My wife and I drank our first cup of Postum a little over two years ago, and we have used it ever since, to the entire exclusion of tea and coffee. It happened in this way:

"About three and a half years ago I had an attack of pneumonia, which left a memento in the shape of dyspepsia, or rather, to speak more correctly, neuralgia of the stomach. My 'cup of cheer' had always been coffee or tea, but I became convinced, after a time, that they aggravated my stomach trouble. I happened to mention the matter to my grocer one day and he suggested that I give Postum a trial.

"Next day it came, but the cook made the mistake of not boiling it sufficiently, and we did not like it much. This was, however, soon remedied, and now we like it so much that we will never change back. Postum, being a food beverage instead of a drug, has been the means of curing my stomach trouble, I verily believe, for I am a well man today and have used no other remedy.

"My work as chief bookkeeper in our Co's branch house here is of a very confining nature. During my coffee-drinking days I was subject to nervousness and 'the blues' in addition to my sick spells. These have left me since I began using Postum and I can conscientiously recommend it to those whose work confines them to long hours of severe mental exertion."

"There's a Reason."

names. The communion service was in charge of W. O. Moore and W. D. Starr, nine deacons waiting upon the congregation. The service was deeply spiritual and helpful in every way. The music during the day was of a high order, the large choir entering into the spirit of the occasion in a most commendable manner.

The building is modern throughout, and is furnished with kitchen, dining and assembly rooms, fully equipped for use. The ladies' parlor is pronounced the finest room of the kind in the city. The mothers' room is furnished with rockers, cots and such other furniture as makes it a rest room indeed. The Sunday-school room is divided into class rooms and is fully equipped for its special line of work. Everything pertaining to dedication was so much greater than we had anticipated that we have scarcely awakened to the blessing of it all. We hope to hold a gospel meeting in the near future, and our people are in fine mind for it.

Hamilton College Notes

Pres. H. G. Shearin.

The second semester opened on Wednesday, January 19, with thirteen additions to the boarding department, thus ensuring a record year in point of attendance. The examinations just completed revealed an excellent enthusiasm for those ideals of scholarship which underlie true culture—an enthusiasm which has shown itself in three new voluntary organizations for study and practice in various fields of work, viz., the Beethoven Club, the Debating Union, and the Blackfriar's Club, the latter fostering the literary interests of the college magazine.

The annual New Year party given by the President and Faculty to the student body was based upon Ben Jonson's "Masqure of Oberon," presented three hundred years ago almost to the day, in London, before the court of King James I. The first series of recitals by pupils from the Conservatory of Music, was ample evidence of the good work there being done. The Marlowe Club, composed of students from the Department of Expression, a few weeks ago gave a clever play of student life. The Department of Art made a display of one hundred and fifty finished pieces two weeks before the Christmas vacation. The Department of Physical Training has shown admirable results. An efficient instructor, a graduate of the New Haven School of Gymnastics, gives all her time to this essential part of the collegiate curriculum. Dr. Shearin spent the week following Christmas in attendance upon the Modern Language Association of America, at Cornell University, before which body he presented a paper upon a phase of the Elizabethan period of English.

The recent vacation period has given opportunity for material improvement in the various buildings. Most notable is the redecorating and refurnishing of the drawing-rooms, library and halls of the main building. Hardwood floors have been laid throughout. The walls have been done in oil-fresco by an Italian artist, a graduate of the art schools of Milan, Italy, and are considered by many the most beautiful in the city. Four massive Grecian pillars, with pilasters and architrave corresponding, have been set up in the central hall, giving a classic repose and dignity to the whole interior. New Ionic mantels, with solid brass andirons of massive design, with gas-logs, have been placed. New furniture for the college library, including book-cases and new pieces of suitable design for the drawing-room and halls, have been placed.

An earnest and concerted movement has recently taken place among the leading colleges for women in the state, for higher educational standards. The promoters of this movement have determined to standardize strictly the various curricula of study, and to make the work therein offered of such grade as to be fully abreast of the recent growth in educational ideals throughout the country. Young women of this generation are demanding for themselves as strong and serious courses of study as are available for their brothers; and it is both a duty and a delight to supply their demands.

Good News from Denver

B. B. Tyler.

Breeden has gone; Van Arsdall has come! Long live Breeden!! God prosper and abundantly bless Van Arsdall!!!

H. O. Breeden is great. This remark is not original. It is not merely my opinion. Everybody in "The Mother Church," Denver, so far as heard from, is saying the same thing. The dear old Central has never had such a revival as that inaugurated and carried forward by Dr. Breeden. The church has been practically reorganized and filled with a new life. More than one hundred men and women united with the church during the all too brief sojourn of this distinguished pastor-evangelist. The regular financial income of the church has been doubled. The retiring pro-tem pastor leaves with his successor the names and addresses of more than a hundred persons, in the neighborhood of the church, who have been members in other places—persons who are not in union and co-operation with the church in Denver, their present place of residence. The Central is now also a Living-link in the foreign mission field. A member of the church has volunteered to enter the foreign work. The congregation agrees to give her support. "A Century Bible Class" was started by Dr. Breeden. The attendance has gone beyond the one hundred mark. The dear old church is full of enthusiasm and a dauntless courage.

Monday evening, January 31, a great company assembled at the church to say "Good Bye" to Brother Breeden, who has gone to California, and extend a "Cordial Welcome" to Brother Van Arsdall, who has come from Cedar Rapids, Iowa, to take up and carry forward this great work. In the Monday evening meeting there was an unusual blending of sorrow and joy—sorrow because of the departure of Breeden; joy at the coming of Van Arsdall. This is a great field and there is a general conviction that the right man has put in an appearance at the psychological moment.

Our churches in Denver are doing well. The Highland church has had a season of evangelism, W. B. Clemmer, preacher, with a score of additions. The East Side church is receiving accessions every week and has been doing so for some time. This congregation will soon begin a campaign which will bring them to the completion of the house of worship.

South Broadway moves steadily on. Unusually large audiences have, for a month or six weeks, assembled on the morning of the Lord's Day to worship and to receive the spoken word. Two persons confessed Christ last Lord's Day. Our Bible-school is doing good work. The average attendance during January was 360. The average offering was $11.67. The average attendance last year was 357. The average offering was $14.26. This, of course, does not include offerings by classes and individuals for special objects outside of the Sunday morning offerings. A large per cent of the Bible-school contributions goes to missions. The missionary spirit is growing.

The returns are coming in from Education Day and it looks as if we would have the largest number of churches in line with us in the history of our educational work in Illinois. We are confident that considerably more than one-hundred churches will make contributions this year. When the returns are in, we shall state frankly and fully the results. The Endowment Campaign is creating much enthusiasm throughout the state. Our fund has now reached $40,000. About $11,000 of this was pledged during the month of January. We are bending every effort to raise $125,000 by the first of September. The success of this movement means the greatest victory that our work has ever registered in Illinois. The new semester opened with a number of new students and the old ones on the roll for the remainder of the year.

The necessity of the unity of the Christian forces in the villages grows more and more apparent. From two to six little churches in a village takes the power out of the whole christian idea. Here is our opportunity to make good. Our men should be retained long by the village congregations and they should have the time to make the plea of unity upon common ground powerful.

SEND For EASTER SUPPLIES

The new Easter Cantata entitled

"THE EASTER FLOWER GARDEN"

was prepared by

and is in some respects the best concert exercise she has ever written. It is designed to be used by the young people of the Churches of Christ in behalf of Orphanage work in Mission fields.

We have some very attractive helps to aid the young people in raising their Easter offering. These are an "Easter Egg" and "Easter Egg Envelope," to be used together for the smaller children, and the envelope alone for the older ones.

Order as many of all these supplies as you will need. They will be sent, prepaid, free of charge. Address

The Bethany Graded Sunday-School Lessons

Will the new Graded lessons make their way into the Sunday-schools and become the standard lessons of the Sunday-schools of the world as the Uniform lessons have done? There are many signs indicating that this is precisely what will happen.

1. All the authorities in religious pedagogy have been a long time agreed that it is better to suit the lesson to the learner than to compel the learner to adapt himself to the lesson, regardless of his stage of mental development.

2. The International Committee which has for thirty-five years selected the Uniform lessons has now begun the issue of an additional series called the International Graded Course, consisting, not of one Scripture lesson for the entire school, but of a separate series of lessons for each year or grade, chosen with direct reference to the age and ability of the pupils.

3. These lessons are being adopted by the best schools of all denominations. The Presbyterians report that about two thousand of their schools adopted the International Graded courses for children under twelve years, last quarter. This is phenomenal. The Methodists and Congregationalists had to go to press the second and third time to supply the unexpected demand for the graded lessons.

The New Christian Century Co. is supplying these lessons to the Disciples' schools. There is no single achievement in which the publishers of this paper take greater satisfaction than in connecting our schools with this most significant Sunday-school advance of the last fifty years.

The editors of The Christian Century, Mr. Morrison and Professor Willett, both regard the Graded principle as essential to the highest efficiency in religious instruction, and both believe that the Bethany Series is the truest, simplest and most artistic set of supplies for the elementary grades that has ever been put out.

Our pleasure in offering the Bethany Graded Lessons to the brotherhood is enhanced by the fact that our orders for supplies for the winter quarter have been much beyond our expectations. Many other schools have assured us of their purpose to adopt The Bethany Lessons at once. This series may be begun at any time. See full description on another page.

The Common Denominator

Through the hundred years' history of the Disciples there has run a silver strand of appeal of a wholly undogmatic nature, a strand which we must today seize and use as the clue to a true appreciation of their history and the solution of the biggest problem which the modern church is facing.—Editorial in THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY, January 20, 1910.

We have been studying the baptism question in the light of the Disciples' plea for Christian union.

A company of Christians committed to the enterprise of restoring the lost unity of the church may take one of two positions.

They may say, Our understanding of the Bible is infallibly correct. We will insist upon the Bible's being understood as we understand it, as the condition sine qua non of union.

This is the method of dogmatism. It is this very spirit that is the mother of division. Unity never can be born of it. Every sect from Seventh Day Adventists to Christian Scientists believes the Bible teaches its distinctive doctrines and practices.

The Presbyterian is not less sure the Bible teaches his creed than is the Methodist that it teaches his. The Congregationalist quotes no more Scripture for his mode of organization than does the Episcopalian for his. The immersionist is no more confident that the Bible supports his contention than the optionist is that it doesn't. The difference between two denominations is not that one takes the Bible and the other does not; the differences among evangelical denominations are differences in understanding what the Bible means.

And if a company of Christian people desiring to restore the lost unity of the church assumes that its understanding of the Scripture is the same as the Scripture itself, and if it uses its distinctive understanding of the Scripture as a test of fellowship with other believers, it is only adding yet one more sect to the too-long catalogue of sects and closing the ears of God's people to its plea for union.

Over against this dogmatic principle, there stands the principle of the common denominator.

If our company of Christian union advocates believe that the church is essentially and constitutionally one, that in its unity it is big enough to include all Christians, that Christians are they who strive to do the will of Christ their Lord "to the full measure of their knowledge of his will," they will easily be led to see that there exists among the great evangelical denominations a basis of union in the actual faith and practices which these denominations share in common.

The business of such a Christian union movement will be, therefore, to find the common denominator of the divided denominations and plead with them to make a test of fellowship only of those great fundamentals upon which all may be found to agree.

This is the method of Christian statesmanship and Christian love. It is utterly devoid of dogmatism. It cannot be charged with the sectarian spirit. It places those who make this plea outside all the controversies of the sects. Each individual in this Christian union company will read his own Bible and have his own stout convictions as to its teaching, but he will not insist that agreement with his personal understanding of the Bible teaching shall be a test of fellowship in the church.

Such a company of Christians are the Disciples of Christ.

The silver strand that has run through our history, albeit often hidden by the coarse strands of dogmatism, debate and sectarian pride, is the appeal to Christians of all denominations to seek for the common denominator underlying their differences, and to build a united church upon that common basis.

In this principle of the common denominator lies our genius and distinctiveness as a Christian union movement. Through it our contribution to present day Christianity must be made.

The preachers of the second generation among the Disciples had a characteristic sermon which all of them used with slight modification, following the classic model of Benjamin Franklin. In this sermon the preacher illustrated the plea of the Disciples by conceiving a great congress of representatives of the leading evangelical denominations to consider a possible basis of union. Three points of difference received more elaborate treatment than the rest, though many differences were discussed. These three were the creed, the name and the rite of initiation.

Each denomination offered its creed as the creed of the united church and it was rejected by all the rest. But all believed the Bible. It was the common denominator of the creeds.

Each denomination offered its name as the name of the united church and it was rejected by all the rest. But all accepted the name Christian or Disciples of Christ. Either of these was the common denominator of the names.

As to mode of initiation into the proposed united church there were many who offered an optional precedure with any one of three forms—sprinkling, pouring or immersion—to be accepted as valid. But the Baptist representatives contended that reading the Bible as they did they could not lend their sanction with a good conscience to the practice of anything save immersion. In the discussion it became clear that they all accepted immersion as valid baptism, and all practiced it more or less. Immersion therefore was the common denominator of the initiating rites.

Now the significant thing in this illustration is that the preacher who drew the picture always left the Disciples out of the congress, and they were pledged to abide by the results of the congress.

Which reveals the absolutely catholic ground the Disciples were determined to occupy. We had no sectarian interest to plead in such a congress. We had no special understanding of the Scripture which we wished to make a test of fellowship in the united church.

The finer sentiment of the Disciples has ever been that our position transcends sectarian disputes. We have been sensitive about being called a denomination. We insist that we are trying to occupy the common ground where all must stand when denominationalism is given up.

The Disciples of Christ are the company of those who believe the church is one and who through the love of their brethren and their desire to honor Christ with a united church refuse to set up an opinion as a test of fellowship, or engage in a practice that offends the conscience of other Christian people.

Their position is that the practice of love is the cure of sectarian strife. They do not urge their own dogmas as the basis of the united church. Their own dogmas change like other Christians' dogmas change. A union based upon anybody's understanding of what the Scriptures teach has no guarantee of surviving 'mid the changing thought of one church.

A union that has in it the promise of permanency tomorrow is a union rooted in love, a love that respects the views of others and discerns that through differing views comes progress and enrichment in the truth.

Who then is the typical representative of the Disciples' plea?

Is it he whose personal creed—that is, whose understanding of what the Scriptures teach—happens to coincide with the common denominator of faith and practice and who, because it is his personal creed, insists upon it as a test of fellowship and basis of union? He is not a representative of the plea. He is a dogmatist, a sectarian, a hinderer not a helper of the cause of unity.

Is it he whose personal creed coincides with the common denominator and who pleads for union upon this basis, not because it is his personal creed, but because it is a real basis of unity for God's people? He is a representative but not typical.

The typical representative of the Disciples' plea is he whose personal creed does not coincide with the common denominator, but whom love for Christ and the church impels to reduce his practice to the common denominator that the lost unity of the church may be recovered and maintained.

Such men as the two whose words appeared in our columns last week, one a young man, the other a veteran, who both question the immersionist interpretation of the Scripture, but who for conscience sake and love's sake practice nothing else—these are typical representatives of our plea.

Bryan's "New Issue"

Mr. Bryan's critics profess to see his plain words on the liquor issue an attempt on his part to find "another new issue." It is impossible for minds that run in the grooves of partisan bias to comprehend Mr. Bryan. The fact that he dares to espouse any cause that commends itself to his moral judgment makes him an enigma to them. They hold the a priori judgment that he is wild to become president, and that he is a rather shifty politician, and the fact that he has always espoused unpopular and losing causes fails to impress them. If he was out for the presidency he would stand by the party and command all its partisan bias and party machinery and refuse to champion any particular cause not in the traditions of Democracy until he was at least safely elected. He has always been a firm temperance man, but other issues have had the field. Now he feels absolved from any duties to any particular reform or political issue and is a free lance. For this reason he comes out frankly on temperance and any other issue that he deems good. It is safe to say he will be found at the forefront among the local-option hosts in the future. One need not believe in a single one of Mr. Bryan's political contentions to acknowledge his moral integrity and to believe he would rather do what he thought was right than be president, and his declaration that it is the liquor interests that corrupt elections and that they must be driven out of power, is not a partisan but a moral issue, and all who believe in the cause of temperance and purity in politics, regardless of party, should welcome his powerful advocacy of the greatest single moral issue of the times.

What Makes Beefsteak So Expensive?

The foremost question of daily interest just now is "what makes beefsteak so expensive?" Congress and various legislatures, the Department of Agriculture, the Federal courts, the Labor Unions, the daily press, the magazines and most of the public are investigating it. A Babel of confusing opinion seems to be the result to date. Meanwhile we might calmly turn back the pages of economic history and see that this sort of thing happens periodically. True, prices have never gone so high before under normal political and economic conditions. Doubtless there are aggravating circumstances combining with the economic fever that has heightened them, and the best we will be able to do will be to discover them. It is a foregone conclusion that tariff and the trusts will be found among them, and that the increased production of gold may account for some of it. When the purchasing medium becomes cheaper commodities must become higher priced just as surely as cloth would cost more per yard if the yard stick were lengthened. If wages went up with prices, it would not matter in the least, but wages are not subject to the same fluctuations and do not get fixed on a free market, so the net result of rising prices are always against the laboring man. The wage worker and salaried clerk never received so much money as at present, but at the same time they seldom have ever been able to save so little. It is not what is received, but what can be saved that counts with the small income.

The rise has hit the poor hardest for the double reason that it has been greatest on the common commodities, and that they have always the least margin to meet any rise in the cost of living. Porterhouse steak has advanced 25 per cent, but round steak has gone up 60 per cent. Butter has raised more than 50 per cent, milk almost as much, and bread, eggs and potatoes are close seconds. This argues that the telephone and more fastidious living is not a very great factor. The further fact that Bowery restaurants have raised the five cent meal to six cents, an advance of 20 per cent on the cost to the very poorest, and where neither the telephone nor fastidiousness costs a penny, argues that there is something deeper than any of the superficial causes assigned.

The popular mind, the one that has enough, settles it offhand and in the way that the superficial know would effect the rise if it were so. That is to say, that the primary law of supply and demand accounts for it, and the farms are not supplying enough. In other words, that production is short and, of course, prices must go up. This, of course, would be so—if it were so. But the facts point otherwise. The stock markets show that the total receipts of live stock are not less. The cold storage companies report that there is one entire animal in cold storage for every man, woman, and child in the nation. Listen to their figures, as given in the "Ice and Refrigerator Blue Book," which says there is held in cold storage today 14,000,000 cattle, 6,000,000 calves, 50,000,000 hogs, and 25,000,000 sheep and lambs. Besides, there are $25,000,000 worth of fish held in ice. Then think of the 150,000,000 dozen eggs, the 130,000,000 pounds of butter, the $50,000,000 worth of fruits, and the $100,000,000 worth of vegetables and other stuff that the great refrigerator plants have under their ammonia process of preserving. Loose this stuff and let out products running up into the billions, and it might effect something. Of course much of it is held in the natural processes of trade, but much more of it is doubtless there for the speculation higher prices are expected to make profitable. We may not find the solution, but we will get a panic as the sure result of this kind of "prosperity."

Chicago to Vote on Local Option

The most sensational temperance election yet to be held will doubtless be that of next April in the city of Chicago. The petition required 61,000 names, and nearly 75,000 were obtained. This does not mean that every one of the 75,000 will vote "yes" in April, but neither does it mean that all who will vote "yes" signed the petition. None but the most fervid of advocates thinks for one moment that the city will become "dry" territory. The leaders expect to make it a vote for moral suasion, and through the agitation to educate the voters, and through a total vote that will surprise the brewers and topers to force consideration of temperance demands. Many ardent temperance advocates have doubted the wisdom of bringing the issue up at this time. Three chief reasons have been given. They think it inopportune at an aldermanic election in which the forces of corruption are to be faced with an attempt to elect men who will guarantee an honest administration of the municipality, fearing that it will complicate issues and divide the vote of the best man. They are afraid many of the prohibition districts will go "wet" for the reason that men who are against the saloon in residential districts will think it unwise and impossible to try to drive them out of the business and densely foreign parts of the city, and that a successful demand will then be made upon the city council to turn such prohibition districts back to the saloonkeepers. Then they are afraid the reformers have reckoned without their host and that this great foreign city will give such an overwhelming majority against so sweeping an attempt at temperance reform that it will but entrench the saloon power more solidly in city affairs and turn all that has been gained in the way of a cleaner city back to the unspeakable regime of the "grey wolves." These men favor increasing the prohibition districts, securing district local option, such as is enjoyed in Ohio, securing more strict regulation, and thus proceeding by those means that will educate the public and take the city a step at a time. Only the April election can decide which is wisest. If a surprisingly large vote is registered for the "yeas," the campaign will be justified.

Need of an English "Social Program"

Winston Churchill advocates an insurance against unemployment for England. Once enacted, like old-age pensions, no party will ever dare repeal it. It is startling to know that one out of every thirty-seven persons in England and Wales are reported as paupers. An army of almost a million! Two and one-third times as many able-bodied men received help last year as the year before. There are in round numbers 15,000 able-bodied men who have to be helped. London alone spends $50,000,000 on charity. Last year over 4 per cent of the working people applied for help. It is estimated that more than one-half the aged are dependent.

The Chamberlainites used these facts and these poor unfortunates to the best advantage in the late election. They pointed to the higher wages in protection America and promised higher wages through a tariff for Britain. Even those who see good in protection for the United States would not necessarily find it of benefit to England. It would surely increase the cost of living more than it could increase the rate of wages there. If the unemployed of England could be turned onto the unused land of the lords they would both earn a living for themselves and furnish food for a multitude of the workers. This would create less demand for work and more for workers and relieve that congestion that is debilitating the nation.

These facts certainly cry for a "social program." "Dost thou know, my son, with how little wisdom the world is governed," said old Oxenstern of Sweden. So long as men seek self interest and advocate it as the basis of law for nations, the peoples will be subject to the terrible waste and the cruelties of material nature. The Golden Rule is needed more than even "enlightened self-interest."

The Colleges and Their Supporters

It is a matter of deep satisfaction to the Disciples of Christ everywhere that two or three of our educational institutions have recently succeeded in meeting the conditions imposed by generous givers and have thus secured considerable additions to their endowment fund. This is the case with Bethany College and the College of the Bible at Columbia, Mo. We wish that the institutions thus benefitted would adopt the admirable method employed by similar organizations in other religious bodies and present convincing evidence to the subscribers and the public that the claims made regarding the amounts subscribed are actually verifiable by competent auditors. More than once in the past our educational history has been blotted by the assertion that this or that institution had raised a given amount of money, either with or without conditions, the fact being later discovered that the amount actually secured was far less than that claimed. It seems a good time in this beginning of our second century to set a new mark of absolute accuracy in claims of this character. When we make this suggestion, so far is our purpose from questioning or discrediting the claims of the institutions named that we are anxious to have them make good in the fullest possible way by establishing a record of accuracy and business-like precision in all their claims. As in both these instances Mr. R. A. Long is the generous benefactor whose offers have been the largest inducement in securing additional funds, we presume that the auditing of the amounts received would be placed in hands satisfactory to him. Certainly a statement from him that the sums announced had actually been received, or that pledges satisfactory to him had been made, would be convincing to all concerned, and would give a feeling of confidence in regard to the institutions whose endowments have thus been so handsomely enlarged.

Graded Lessons and the Teacher

By a Teacher Who Knows.

The demands which we have made on our Sunday-school teachers are such that no body of salaried day school teachers would have tolerated. During these many years that the uniform lesson series have been taught, what is it that we have asked of our teachers? We have demanded an attentive, orderly class or department regardless of whether the subject matter appealed to the interests of the pupils or not; we have expected that the pupils should become possessed of Bible facts and a general knowledge, even if the lesson series had not covered the required subjects; we have claimed that the subject matter should be adapted to the pupils whether it was within or without the pupils' power to comprehend the truth involved; we have asked for a pedagogical treatment of an unpedagogically arranged series of lessons; we have called for and expected spiritual results at times when the lessons were not suited to the crisis in the pupil's life; we have demanded as a result of the Sunday-school teaching that the pupil should apply principles to life problems, when neither the ethical principles nor the application of them was in any definite way provided for in the regular course of study; and all of this we have asked of untrained teachers—a task far too great for those who have been especially trained for service. Nor is this all. In addition, we have denied our teachers the proper conditions for work. Rooms, proper seating, tables, and general equipment have often been refused when it would have been easy to grant them. Many a working girl is obliged to provide herself with her ordinary teacher's help, though sometimes teaching pupils whose monthly allowance would exceed her own for the year. Schools have spent in one year much money for "rewards" to pay the pupils for attendance, when the same expenditure would have given a permanent equipment to the school.

The function of the teacher is to teach, not to create new conditions, nor remodel courses of study. It is the right of the teachers to expect that those who ask us to assume this responsibility of teaching shall provide the equipment, create the proper conditions for good work, and introduce or adopt such courses of study as shall give promise of the desired results.

We have come to a new era in our Sunday-school life, and with the new graded courses introduced last October we have an opportunity to see what effect a graded curriculum will have upon the teaching force of the school. We have no reason to doubt but that the effect will be similar to that in the more secular realm of education. The work will be more worth while, and a definite, connected line of study must give a steadiness, a definiteness, and a purpose to our work.

Graded lessons are admitted to be better for the pupils, but in what ways will these new courses be of benefit to the teacher?

1. The Graded Lessons will simplify the task of the teacher. In every grade they will be easier to teach because having been selected so that they appeal to the interests of the pupils, it will be easier to hold their attention, for they will have an interest in the subject under consideration. As the truths to be taught will be within the comprehension of the class, the former efforts and, one might say, "struggles" for adaptation will not be necessary. Because the lessons as to subject matter will be within their realm of thought and related to their own experiences and needs, the lessons will make an intellectual or emotional appeal, depending upon the grade taught. This will make the enforced "application" of the teacher unnecessary.

2. The Graded Lessons will soon bring to us a literature upon the subject matter to be taught, and the methods to be applied, that at present is lacking. With at least five of the large denominations planning to produce helps for both teachers and pupils on these new lessons, it does not look as though the teachers would fail to be supplied with adequate assistance in the teaching of the lessons. But added to this will come in time a line of books and helps which will be closely related to our specific work within departments and grades. Still further, with a definite course of study it will be well worth while for us to acquaint ourselves with the public school courses for corresponding ages to the pupils whom we will be teaching. This has been too great a task for us to undertake in the past, for the series of lessons was not in reality a course of study and did not lend itself to related subject matter. Now, it will be a pleasure for us to read the nature books, the supplemental readers, the histories, the biographies, or whatever books form the background of the knowledge which our particular group of pupils possess.

3. The Graded Lessons make it easier for the present-day teacher to become a trained teacher . The real study of the specific course which she is to teach will give her the special knowledge which she now lacks. The continued teaching will give her skill in the teaching, and make it possible to acquire a true and natural method of teaching. But an opportunity for a broader training is also before her, for as the graded courses are produced she can, if she will, pursue them and thus gain for herself a definite basis of Bible knowledge which she was denied in the past. In this way the subject matter of the entire school may form a part of the training for the individual teacher.

4. The Graded Lessons give new life to the "Teachers' Meeting" by making a readjustment of its present methods possible. "Teachers' Meetings" are of various sorts, some helpful, more unsuccessful. Here is an opportunity to draw the teachers together in an effectual way, not through uniformity in lesson study, but by unity of purpose in other directions. The use of the curriculum of the entire school as a "normal study" for the training of the teachers in "subject matter" will prove a great gain, and other features of interest may be introduced which will be developed in experience.

5. The Graded Lessons themselves provide the basis for the training of the future teachers. The pupils who pass through the lower grades of the new graded courses and who remain with the school will at some time in the future be provided with a knowledge which our present-day teachers now lack. They will come up to the place where the "Normal" or "Teacher-training" courses will be given in the school with a very different need, and because of what they have acquired through their Sunday-school training will be better prepared for the new sort of training courses which will then be possible.

The five advantages mentioned are not all that graded lessons will do for our teachers, but these are enough to set us thinking. When we say that graded lessons "will do" these things for us, it is not to place these in the future in a theoretical way, but only because for the great majority these results are still before us. The statements are based on actual results in many graded schools, where graded lessons have been used for years, and where the benefits to the teachers have been far greater than the limited space at our disposal makes it possible to enumerate.

Teachers should welcome the innovation of the graded lessons, while superintendents cannot afford to miss this opportunity to try this way of starting to solve the teacher-training problem.

Jesus, the Light of the World

"The present life of man, O king, seems to me, in comparison with that time which is unknown to us, like the swift flight of a sparrow through the room where you sit at supper in winter. The sparrow flies in at one door and immediately out at another, and, whilst he is within, is safe from the wintry storm; but he soon passes out of your sight into the darkness from which he had emerged. So this life of man appears for a short space, but of what went before, or what is to follow, we are utterly ignorant. If, therefore, this new doctrine contains something more certain, it seems justly to deserve to be followed." In this way reasoned one of the wise men of Edwin, King of Northumberland, at the council called to consider the merits of the Christian religion. The pagan needed light.

In the current number of a theological journal, a professor of philosophy writes: "It has been a true instinct, therefore, which has led religion to refuse to trust its truth to philosophy for decision. . . . What shall assure the soul, as baffled and perplexed by mystery and evil it cries in the Te Deum of the ages, 'O Lord, in thee have I trusted, let me never be confounded.' Certainly no past can demonstrate the future. It is—and must be so long as moral life demands resolutions—a supreme venture of faith. But if any thing can give not only emotional cheer and contagious hope, but also the rational basis for this venture, it is the experience, the struggles, the serene calm, the confidence, the actual achievement of the world's great spirits. 'Be of good cheer, for I have overcome the world,' is the historic note which tells of reality—not only the reality of actual deeds, but as well the reality of a kinship of spirit that promises similar victory."

It is not to the liking of any man to live in darkness. Men like to know whither their paths lead. They have a horror of fighting an unseen foe. They do not ask that everything shall be plain; a game is not worth playing if its outcome is absolutely certain from the beginning. There must be the possibility of losing as well as of winning if the players are to do their best. If we could know all the plans of God, the chances for spiritual achievement would probably be lessened. The great original souls have often walked in the valley of the shadow of death. It is the commonplace mind that confronts no mystery. We justly mistrust one who explains offhand any and every situation the human soul encounters. Neither he nor his explanation amounts to much. If any man ought to be treated with contempt it is the man who knows all mysteries and all knowledge. But we must have some light. We demand for ourselves a fighting chance. We refuse to fight when the antagonist can see all our movements while we cannot see any he makes. We want to know that the path leads somewhere, although we may not "ask to see the distant scene." One step is enough if we feel that when it is taken there will be light for the next.

Light on moral questions comes from persons. If we long to see the issues involved in the situation that confronts us, we must walk in the light of those who have lived well. A nation without heroes is a nation without moral strength. The blood of the martyrs has been the seed of the church because the martyrs have brought to light the motives that should control all human actions. The great light of the world is the one whose life was the supreme revelation of the will of God. "No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him." And the Son declared the Father by his life among men. If we know the Son, we are not in darkness concerning the manner of life we should choose. We know that nothing can compensate a man for the loss of his soul, for loss of the ability to appreciate the truth and the desire to seek for it with the whole heart, for indifference to moral values and for hardness and coldness of heart.

"Ye are the light of the world." Jesus is the light of the world when he has disciples who show by their lives that they have been with him. Mere telling that Jesus came to give light will not reveal the way in which men should walk. If the laying down of rules were sufficient for moral guidance, most parents would train their children well. But rules mean nothing unless they are secondary to a good example. The preaching of the gospel is a useless performance where it is not supported by godly living. The light of the church shines every day of the week or else it does not shine on Sunday. The church member is a light when he is fair in trade and upright in all that he does. His regularity in attending the worship of the church is illuminating when his daily life shows that he has the spirit of Jesus.

Midweek Service, Feb. 23. John 1:4; 8:12; Matt. 5:14-16.

Mount Your Pictures

The teachers of the beginners' and of the primary courses will find it greatly to their advantage to mount the pictures intended for their use with the class.

The Beginners' Large Picture Cards should be mounted on stiff cardboard. Cut the white margin from the picture entirely or leave a tiny white edge, according to taste. Mount firmly, and on the back of the card paste the printed matter taken from the front of the picture, that the picture may be quickly identified for use.

The primary teacher should preserve the pictures of the supplemental sheet accompanying her text-book in the same way, except that a heavy cover paper will do instead of cardboard. If holes are punched in the side or end of the cover paper, these small pictures can be kept together in convenient form ready for class use. The cover paper, if cut the size of the teacher's text-book, will be sufficiently large.

Biblical Problems

By Professor Willett

In your editorial article, "The Lost Coin," in The Christian Century of December 2, you speak of the ten pieces of silver as being coins. I heard a preacher criticise this statement, saying that they were not money, but a betrothal or wedding gift. It was thought preposterous that you should make such a blunder as to call them money. Reader.

The parable is very simple and explicit in its statements regarding the woman's loss. The only pieces of silver known in the Orient in this age or any other, and likely to be found in a home, were coins. These are often worn by the women of the country as necklaces or ornaments of head dress, and in such instances usually represent a part or the whole of the dowry. But there is nothing said in the parable regarding any such use to which these pieces of silver were put. They may or may not have been what the critic spoken of affirms. His information is to be classified as interesting if true, but not in the least important, and wholly without foundation in the text. We could imagine some reader complaining because we did not describe the character of the house in which the woman lived, the style of her dress, or her domestic relation as single or married. No doubt these would all be points of interest if only they had been mentioned in the parable. But they are not, and neither is the character of the coins the woman treasured. We believe it a safe principle in this as in doctrinal matters to speak where the Bible speaks, and where the Bible is silent to be silent.

Is not the plea "Christian union" (there can be none without immersion, according to your late editorials) not a narrow one, a sectarian one? Is not the betterment of the world a greater plea? Men can well afford to struggle and die for that, while the other is a minor creed. D. C. B.

It depends on what one's view of Christian unity may be. If it is regarded as the ambitious effort of a denomination to draw all other Christians into its own organization, it would certainly be an unimportant, selfish enterprise. If, on the other hand, it is the serious effort to remove the most outstanding obstacle to that very work of social betterment and world-wide educational uplift in which our questioner is apparently deeply interested, then we cannot believe it to be a matter of minor importance; certainly not a "minor creed." The church of Christ, if united, could accomplish in a single generation the social uplift of the world. At the present time the power that ought to be devoted to this great task is largely exhausted in sectarian rivalry and the attempt to foster competing establishments. We believe the most serious need of our age is the unification of all Christian forces upon the faith, the spirit, and the program of Jesus. And until this is accomplished we believe all the work of social reform will halt and hesitate. For this reason are we urging with all our force the completion of the work to which the fathers of this religious movement set themselves a century ago.

Why, in the Book of Kings, is the history of Judah subordinated to that of Israel? M. D.

Probably because the prophets who gathered the memorials of the nation preserved in the earlier portion of the Book of Kings were members of the northern kingdom and magnified the interest of their own section of the land. Then, too, it must be remembered that down to the times of Isaiah and Micah prophecy of the more conspicuous sort was confined to northern Israel. The work of such prophets as Ahijah, Elijah, Elisha, Amos, and Hosea lay there. It was only in later times, after the downfall of the northern kingdom, that prophecy became a commanding feature of the life of Judah.

Points to Remember

About the Bethany International Graded Lessons

1. They are for all Grades. The new graded series will in time cover all the grades of the Sunday-school, from the youngest child to the oldest member.

2. The Elementary Courses Planned. Up to the present the courses are outlined for the first nine years of Sunday-school life, and consist of the Beginners' Series, complete in two years; the Primary Series, complete in three years; the Junior Series, complete in four years, the other courses for the older grades being in course of preparation.

3. The First Year of Each Course Published. Beginning with October, 1909, the first year of each of the three elementary courses was published, and the remaining years of each course will be issued year by year.

4. To Whom Taught. Having but one year of each course ready to introduce into the school at this date, it follows that they should be taught as follows:

The first year of the Beginners' Course to all the four and five-year-old children.

The first year of the Primary Course to all the six, seven, and eight-year-old children.

The first year of the Junior Course to all the pupils of that department, the nine, ten, eleven, and twelve-year-old children.

5. By Whom Taught. These lessons for this year may be taught by the department superintendent to all the department or by the class teachers, as preferred. When all the years of each course are complete it is hoped that the schools will see its way clear to have the lessons taught by class teachers, each grade having its own lessons. Until that time comes, and until the school can adapt itself to this graded scheme, the courses may be taught in an interchangeable way, that is, year by year, to all the pupils within a given department, if that seems best.

6. One Lesson, Not Two, to be Taught. Each of these courses when complete will be found to cover the needs of the several grades and that supplemental lessons as now used with the uniform lessons will not be needed. The grade work for promotion from grade to grade will not be something outside and apart from the regular lesson, but will be intimately connected with and related to the lessons of the course. The teachers will be able to concentrate their thought and attention not on two lessons, as in the past, but upon one lesson, and with no loss to the pupil. The knowledge of the story taught and the memory work connected with the lessons will be made the basis of promotion. How to do this will be explained in the text-books for the teacher issued for each grade.

7. Adjusting the First Year to the Department. As previously stated, the graded lessons will ultimately consist of a series of lessons for each year, so that the six-year-old children will have their lessons for the year; when they are seven they will take the next series of lessons, and so go through the school following a progressive course of instruction. It follows that each succeeding class will take up the course of study that the promoted pupil has just finished, so that in a few years in each department the several series of lessons belonging to the department should be in operation. As above stated, this year we have no choice in the matter, and we will teach the first year to the entire department. Now, if the course for the six-year-old pupils is especially planned to meet the needs of that age, when it is used for the entire department with seven and eight-year-old children, it might be questioned if the lessons might not be too simple in character. Anticipating this need, the text-books for the Primary teacher will show how the lessons may be taught to all three years, so that whether taught by the department superintendent or by the class teacher ample material will be provided for the teachers and pupils.

The Junior department, if provided with a separate room, should use this first year with all its pupils; but as there is a greater difference between the nine-year-old pupil and the twelve than in the range of age in the primary department, more adjustment is necessary. The work for the nine-year-old children as given in the course of study is complete, the additional information needed for the pupil being correlated with the lesson in the book for the pupil, and outlined for the teacher in the teacher's text-book or manual. The ten, eleven, and twelve-year-old pupils will need some additional information and drill work while using this first year of the course, and until they each come into the course planned directly for them. This need has been anticipated and a list of those things which it is desirable to teach to these older pupils of the department has been prepared and will be given in connection with the text-book for the teacher.

8. Where There Is No Separate Room. In schools not provided with separate rooms, but where all meet in the "main room," we suggest that in introducing these graded lessons into the school the children under six be taught the Beginners' lessons, screening the children if possible; that the children six, seven, and eight be divided into small groups and be taught the first year of the new Primary course, but that the first year of the Junior course be taught only to the nine-year-old classes of children, the Uniform Lessons being used with the rest of the school, as at present. By another year these classes using this first year of the Junior course would be ready for the second year of the course, which would then be ready for them, while the newly promoted pupils from the Primary could start with the first year of the Junior course. In time the full course would be in operation.

9. These Graded Lessons are for All Schools. As these lessons are planned to meet the needs of the pupils, it follows that they will be helpful in all schools where pupils of the age for whom the lessons are outlined are enrolled. The teaching of the lessons does not depend for success upon the conditions under which they are taught half so much as do the Uniform Lessons, for as the lessons are suited to the pupils, their interest is at once gained in the subject matter. They are suited to the small group in the country school quite as well as to a similar group in a well-organized city school.

10. The Lessons are Easy to Teach. It has taken a skilled teacher to take material suitable to adults and make it over for children, and none so well know this difficulty as do the teachers themselves. These graded lessons having been chosen for the children, they will be found easier to teach, while the text-books for the teacher that accompany the new courses are so finely planned that teachers will have adequate help and suggestions for their work both with the lessons and in the conduct of the class.

11. The Courses and Equipment are Permanent. With the Uniform Lesson we have a new lesson for each year, but no succeeding year do we have exactly the same course. The course each year is new to the pupils and new to the teachers. It is because of this that no two sets of pupils ever pass from one department to another with the same knowledge, nor can that knowledge be definite in character when the lessons are ever changing. With the new lessons, while the pupils will always be passing to a new course which has been especially selected for them, in reality the lessons of a year are fixed, so that when the helps for teachers are published they can be purchased as an equipment for the school, and be used over and over again by the teachers, if desired. The helps for the pupils must, of course, be purchased each year for succeeding classes, but the pictures, the books, and other helps provided for the teacher may be the permanent possession of the school.

12. How to Start the Courses. The way to begin is to begin. The lessons are here, and have the indorsement of the various denominations, the editors and the publishers. No pains have been spared to make the new lessons attractive and within the range of the schools as to expense. That no embarrassment may come to the schools while we are in this transition stage in regard to the course of study, the helps for the Primary and Junior teachers on the Uniform Lessons will be continued for 1910, though it is anticipated that the new lessons will soon substitute the Uniform Lessons in the grades for the children.

13. The Prospectus, and the Lesson Outlines. Upon application to the New Christian Century Company, Chicago, a prospectus giving full description of the helps for the teachers and a sample of the folders and books for the pupils will be mailed. The outlines for the first year of each of the three courses published can also be obtained from the same address.

Cover the Pupil's Book for Work and Study

As the book for the pupil in the junior graded course is to be a permanent possession of the pupil, the teachers should encourage the preservation of the book while it is in use by the pupil. If used as intended, and that is daily at home, the constant wear will mar the cover. To assist the pupil in this matter some teachers have provided manila covers for the books, the pupils covering them themselves.

Uniform and Graded Lessons

A Bit of History and an Explanation

For men and women in every age and in every field of human endeavor there has been a message and a vision revealing ever enlarging opportunities for service. In the development of Christian education this truth is illustrated in the history of the Sunday-school and its movement toward graded lessons.

A Record of the Years.

In the very earliest Sunday-schools of which we have a record the pupils were taught not only Bible lessons but also reading, and reading primers were published for the youngest children. Later only Bible lessons were taught, each teacher selecting the lesson he wished to teach. Finally the lessons known as the International Uniform Lessons were issued. These lessons were selected with the intention that the same lesson should be taught in all Sunday-schools on the same Sunday and to all classes. Teachers of the youngest pupils found these lessons difficult to adapt, and asked for lessons chosen specially for little children. In response to their request the Two Years' International Beginners' Course was issued by the International Lesson Committee in 1902. Next the Lesson Committee issued special lessons for the adult classes of the Sunday-school.

From an experience gained by the effort to adapt the Uniform Lessons to pupils of different ages, and to teach these lessons in accordance with the best methods, together with an experience gained from teaching the Beginners' Lessons and the special lessons for the adult classes, there has grown a desire on the part of thousands of teachers for a thoroughly graded system. The desire is for a series of courses in which there shall be unity but not uniformity, which shall make possible a natural classification of the pupils, which shall demand a method of lesson presentation adapted to the intellectual development of the pupils, and which shall establish regular promotion from grade to grade through the various departments of the Sunday-school.

Graded Lessons Authorized.

In response to the request for lessons chosen specially for the pupil to whom they will be taught, at the Twelfth International Sunday School Convention, held at Louisville, Kentucky, June 18-23, 1908, instructions were given the International Lesson Committee "to continue the preparation of a thoroughly graded course of lessons."

The first series or sets of lessons of this course were issued by the committee in January, 1909. These first series are Beginners' First Year, Primary First Year, and Junior First Year, with a list of the themes for the following years in these departments, together with the assurance that a general scheme of lessons is in preparation for all departments of the Sunday-school. The departments recognized by the International Sunday School Association are Beginners' (ages four and five), Primary (ages six to eight), Junior (ages nine to twelve), Intermediate (ages thirteen to sixteen), Senior (ages seventeen to twenty), Advanced (ages twenty-one and older).

From this brief record and explanation we perceive that to teachers of the Bible, the Sunday-school teachers, vision after vision has been granted. In truth, the years since the establishment of the Sunday-school have been like an upward-winding stair which with each turning has revealed a wider and wider view. The high outlook to which the years have brought us, who are the teachers of today, is that of lessons chosen specially for the pupil to whom they are to be taught—the Graded Lessons of the International Course.

What Is Meant by the Uniform Lessons.

The Lesson Committee has for thirty-five years selected one Bible passage as the lesson for the entire school without special reference to the grade to which it should be taught. It is known as the International Uniform Lesson for the reason that the same lesson is uniform throughout the school. The editors and publishers take this list of lessons for the year, and issue a graded treatment of this lesson passage, and in this way throughout the years they have tried to adapt the lesson to the several departments, from the Primary through to the adult classes. No effort has been made to adapt these lessons to the several grades within a department, but one Quarterly has been issued for the use of the entire Primary department, one Quarterly for the entire Junior department, and so on through the entire school, including the Adult Bible Class. In other words, we have a uniform lesson, with one and the same selection from the Bible for old and young, and a supply of adapted helps upon the course.

What Is Meant by the Graded Lessons.

This same Lesson Committee has now issued an additional course of study called the International Graded Course, consisting, not of one Scripture lesson for the entire school, but of a separate series of lessons for each year or grade, chosen with direct reference to the age and ability of the pupils. The course is called a graded course for the reason that each series fits the particular group, or grade, of the school for which it is intended. The editors and publishers will issue these new lessons upon lines in harmony with the new scheme of graded material. Naturally, these lessons group themselves into a course for children of Primary age consisting of three series of lessons, a course for the Junior pupils consisting of four series of lessons, and so on through youth and the young people's departments, with, doubtless, elective courses for the adults. In other words, we will have a thoroughly graded course of study or curriculum for the entire school, with a (sub-) course for each of the several departments. Each departmental course, in turn, will cover several years, with a separate series of lessons for each year. And we will have separate text-books or other helps for each year.

Why the Graded Lessons are Issued.

These new graded lessons have been outlined by the Lesson Committee, authorized by the International Association and issued by our publishers, in response to an increasing demand from pastors, superintendents, teachers, parents, and others interested in the welfare of the Sunday-school that it was time that the Sunday-school should occupy its proper relationship to the church as an educational institution; that a pupil entering the Sunday-school should be able to begin a systematic course of Bible study at least as well suited to his needs as were the courses of instruction in the institutions of learning which he attended during the week. This demand for a graded curriculum for the Sunday-school has been loud and insistent and has come not merely because of the desire to have the Sunday-school more educational in character, but because it is felt that the spiritual life of the pupil will be stronger with a more normal plan of study. It is well known that with many criticism of the Uniform Lessons has passed into action, and many of our schools have given up the Uniform Lessons and are using independent courses of study. It is hoped that these schools having been the first to blaze the way to better things will now return to these new interdenominational graded lessons and aid us in perfecting the scheme which at last it has been made possible for publishers to undertake.

Our Lesson Writers

Each of the series has been prepared by a specialist in her own grade and department.

Miss Frances Weld Danielson, who prepared the two years' course for the Beginners, is a trained kindergartner, a noted story-teller, and an experienced writer and teacher. All of the lessons of the course have had the advantage of being taught to little children before being written, so that the connections of one part of the program with another, and the suggestions given to the teacher, will be practical and not theoretical.

Miss Marion Thomas, who is in charge of the three years of the Primary Series, is not only a trained kindergartner and grade teacher, but has an enviable reputation in educational circles. As an author of short stories for little children she is well known, and those who have seen the advance sheets of the new stories have pronounced them literary gems. The plans for the primary work begin in a simple way for this first year, but will gradually lead into the work of the junior child.

Miss Josephine L. Baldwin, the writer of the four-year Junior Series, is well known as a pioneer in junior work and with years of experience in dealing in a practical way with boys and girls of this period. So great has been her success in this field that she is much sought for as a teacher of teachers in the branches of study necessary for those working in this department. Her years of experience as a writer give her a peculiar fitness for the work to which she has been assigned in the writing of these new lessons. Her plans for the development of the four years of study are new, progressive, and practical. Each year will fit the course of study for the year, and will be adapted to the growing powers of the pupil.

These writers have been transferred from the uniform to the graded lessons, and their lesson writing will be confined exclusively to these graded courses.

Getting the School Ready

By Mrs. J. W. Barnes

Supervisor of Graded Instruction for the International Committee.

"Have you a graded Sunday-school?" This question is one which finds a place on the statistical blanks of many Sunday-school organizations, and while the replies vary, a study of the statements reveals not so much difference in the ideals of the schools, as a difference in the attainment of their ideals. With some it amounts to little more than that they have separated the small children from the "main school," others have gone far enough to group the pupils into departments, while many have succeeded in organizing departments with departmental supervision, and regular promotions on the basis of supplemental lessons. To the few it has been possible to add the one real element of the graded school—the graded curriculum.

Honest effort has been put forth by the superintendents and officers of schools to better conditions, to have a more effective organization of the school forces, and to as rapidly as possible make the instruction of the school what it ought to be. Our difficulties have been increased ten-fold because the really important thing, the graded lessons, have not been at our command, and we have been obliged, in the interests of better instruction, to substitute the supplemental lessons for the real thing. We have been forced to do pioneer work along the only line which we found practicable, for not many could become experimental schools with independent courses of graded study. To place in our schools such courses, excellent though they might be, demanded a more skillful teaching force than many of us possessed; for without adequate helps for both teachers and pupils the work required independent lines of study and an amount of time not at the disposal of our officers or teachers.

Now, however, with the new courses issued by international authority, and with adequate helps for teachers and pupils, we will have a comparatively easy task, and for the first time we have an opportunity to begin to make of our schools really graded institutions. While the courses at our command are limited to the elementary grades, we all understand that this is but the beginning of greater things for the entire school.

A graded course of lessons can be operated in any school, large and small, and while its effectiveness does not depend on either numbers or equipment, it is true that its success will depend upon at least the same common-sense conditions which we require for the uniform series or for any other lessons. Because the schools, through their Teachers' Meetings, gatherings of their Official Boards, Institutes and Conventions, are considering this subject, it may not be amiss to recall the common points or elements which go to make up a graded school, as generally understood throughout the country.

A graded school is supposed to recognize any apply at least the four principles which follow:

1. The pupils and teachers must be classified and organized for effective work.

2. The lesson system must be one which is suited to the mental powers, the interests, and the spiritual needs of the pupils of the different departments.

3. The teaching methods must be suited to the intellectual development of the pupils.

4. There must be regular promotions from grade to grade and department to department, with such recognition for efficiency as is deemed wise.

I. Classification. (a) Pupils. This is merely the common-sense plan of placing pupils of like age, mental attainment and development together. This effort usually gives us the grouping of the children of kindergarten age, known in Sunday-school as "Beginners," the grouping of pupils six, seven, and eight years of age as the Primary, and when the mental capacity increases and the ability to read easily has been reached we have the nine, ten, eleven and twelve years old children called the Juniors. When we speak of all the groupings together we refer to them as the elementary division of the school. Above this elementary division some schools have placed the Secondary division including the intermediate pupils of thirteen to fifteen, and Senior division of sixteen to eighteen, those above eighteen being in the organized Adult classes, the Normal class or other groups for special work.

It can readily be seen that the very, very small school will have at least one class of Beginners, one of Primary, one of Junior and so on. The larger schools with several classes of Primary and several of the junior ages are dignified with the name of grades within a department. Therefore we find Primary departments composed of grade 1 (which may be one or more classes of about six-year-old pupils), grade 2, grade 3, and so on through Junior departments. It is in this way we get the three grades in the Primary and the four in the Junior, and this explains why some schools are known by grades, as Grade 1 to 7, instead of being known by the more familiar names of Primary and Junior.

(b) Teachers. In most schools, even the smallest, the teacher of the Primary class is expected to be a permanent teacher; that is, she stays in the department, but the pupils pass on, whether it be to the "main school" or to a Junior department. The same is true of the beginners, and as the junior work has developed, the same has come to be true with the Junior Superintendent. In other words, as the departmental ideal develops, the question of the transfer of a teacher with her pupils or the promotion of the pupils without the teacher is a matter which soon adjusts itself. Probably no more vexing question has ever been discussed in conventions than this of the transfer or promotion of the teacher. As the department idea grows, it is found that the teachers really prefer, not only to remain in the department, but like best to teach the same class but one year. It is this attachment of the teacher to a grade or to a department which has brought the advancement in the younger grades of the school.

Because this vexing question does take care of itself as soon as a course of study is definite enough to give life to the teaching, it is foolish to raise the question. While a school is in a transition period it may be better to transfer teachers with pupils in some cases, and as soon as the teachers realize that they can do better work, and that it is easier for them to remain in a grade, they will come to it naturally, and without friction. Better let it work its way out along with the course of study. Every teacher wants to be where he or she can do the best work, and this may be found to be in one grade or another. It is sometimes only by a change that the right place is found.

II. Graded Instruction. If the lesson system is suited to the mental powers, the interests, and the needs of the pupils of the different departments, it is at once a graded course of study, for no one lesson selected for the entire range of the Sunday-school can meet these requirements. As above stated, we have not in the past been able to cover to our satisfaction this point in the graded school, but for the younger grades we have been able since last October to start our schools on courses of graded instruction. Henceforth we will be without excuse on point II in the making of a graded school.

III. Teaching Methods. With the Uniform lesson system it has been necessary for our teachers to become experts, almost, in order to adapt the one-lesson idea to the pupils. The result has often been, that while apparently the lesson of the day was taught, it actually was not, for the method of development with the younger children who could not read made it possible for the teacher to teach other things more suitable to the child than the text chosen. Without a doubt we have greatly advanced in the educational method used in the Sunday-school, and with the introduction of pictures, hand work, map making, drawing, etc., used in connection with the supplemental lessons or the regular lesson of the day, the work of the Sunday-school is far more interesting and profitable than formerly.

With the introduction of the graded lessons all of this work becomes not only easier for the untrained teacher, but a more natural method is developed, because the materials chosen for the lessons adapt themselves to the method which lends itself to a special grade. For instance, the lessons for the beginners and even for the primary children adapt themselves to the story method, while the published helps give the suggestions for the kind of hand work which naturally belongs to the work with little children. Take the geography and map drawing or map making; this will naturally introduce itself in connection with the lessons chosen for pupils when they are ready and equipped for this work through their day school training. The same is true in respect to the memorization of Scripture passages, the suggestions for home reading or home work; these come naturally as a part of the course of study.

It is expected, therefore, that the untrained teacher will soon be in possession of a natural and normal method because of the graded lessons.

IV. Regular Promotions. Without a definite course of study it is difficult to promote pupils other than "because they are old enough" or because "they are too big for the class," reasons with which we are all more or less familiar. With a definite course so laid out that it is possible to show to the parents what their children will study while in a given department, there will be a great gain in the home interest, while to the pupil the looking forward to an advanced study and to the department just ahead will mean much to him. Experience through the supplemental work in the elementary grades has proven this, and the interest will be much more keen when it is the regular lesson which is the course in question. Suitable recognition should be given when the transfers are made just as we do at present. In the the future the exhibit of the work done by the pupils during the year will take a much more prominent place than at present, and this will foster the educational plans of the school.

If along with the promotion from grade to grade or from department to department the pupil not only masters the course of study so that his work is a unit as he progresses through the school, but in addition has the advantage of coming into personal touch with different types of Christian teachers, there cannot fail to be a great gain to the pupil in his spiritual life.

If the pupils of even the smallest school can be grouped like with like, if to them can be taught the several courses of graded lessons as they shall appear, if the teaching methods shall be suited to the pupils and to the subject matter, and if the pupils pass naturally from one course to others equally well suited to their growing and developing needs—then even the smallest school can lay claim to the title of a "graded school" not only, but in addition will have the satisfaction of knowing that it is working in harmony with the laws laid down in the very life of a natural, growing, developing human soul. It is time that we understood that a "graded school" does not depend on numbers or equipment, but is possible by the observance of common-sense principles and bethods.

Many of our difficulties are at an end, and happy will be the superintendent, and happier still the children in those schools which seize their opportunity, and give a fair trial to the new graded courses.

Equipment for Teacher and Pupil

What the Bethany Graded Lessons Consist of

In the past the lack of good text-books for the teacher and an adequate equipment for the pupil has been one of the chief obstacles to the wider adoption of some of the very excellent outlines of graded lessons which have appeared from time to time. While the skilled teacher might with a Bible and the Outline be able to teach the lessons, the need of good pictures for the teaching, and something for the pupils to work with, soon became evident. The untrained teacher, or the teacher with limited time, has been helpless when denied the aids procurable with the uniform lesson courses. This difficulty, however, has been overcome, for the new International Graded Lessons, adopted by the several denominations, have made provision for the needs of both teachers and pupils.

The editors, lesson writers, and publishers have had a many-sided problem, not the least of which has been their desire to place the lessons within the reach of all schools as to price, and yet have the helps all that their ideals called for in this new departure in Sunday-school work. It is felt that the results of their labors are satisfactory, and that the helps not only adequately meet the needs of the teachers, but prove attractive to the pupils. The prices are very low considering the high quality of every detail of the entire work. In all the courses the art work has received careful attention, with the result that the best which this country or Europe affords has been placed at the disposal of the users of these courses. Many of the reproductions are from original photographs and drawings, and will be used only in these special publications. The size of the type, and the form of the publications have been carefully considered, and no little time and effort has been expended in experimentation that the courses as issued from year to year may each be related to that which precedes and that which follows. In other words, the several grades of the courses will, when complete, present a series of text-books for the teachers differing in plan and scope according to the subjects treated and in harmony with the needs of the pupils to be taught, while the equipment for the pupils will, starting with the simple work for the six-year-old child, gradually advance in difficulty in keeping with the growing power to do on the part of the pupil, and together will finally present a series of pupils' helps which will be graded in treatment and form as well as in subject-matter.

Beginning with last October, the first lessons of the two years' Beginners' Course, the first lessons of the three years' Primary Course, and the first lessons of the four years' Junior Course were put in operation. The equipment available for these several courses is as follows:

The Beginners.

The little child of four and five years of age needs an informal program with considerable variety, yet a complexity of ideas must be avoided. What is done at the beginning and at the end of the session has much to do with the success of the lesson teaching in the beginners' department, and to this end the text-book for the teacher will contain much besides the actual treatment of the lessons of the course. As elsewhere stated, the book for the teacher will later be a bound volume, but for the present it appears in parts. Part I contains in addition to the Foreword which gives the history, the purpose and scope of the lesson, a complete working manual. In it are given suggestions for the program, the circle talk, the use of pictures, the handwork desired, and the explanation of the terms used in the lessons for the year. Part I also contains the treatment of the lessons from October through December. Each lesson is complete in that it gives not only the treatment of the lesson story, but includes the parts of the program connected with the story of the day, such as the circle talk, the rest exercises, the handwork, the busy work, or the occupation work, as needed, making a completed program for the session.

Every teacher of little children realizes the teaching value of a picture. A part of the equipment for the use ot the teacher is the set of pictures, thirty-eight in number. These are printed on large size cards, 12x15 inches, and five of the nature subjects are in four-toned colored pictures. The text-book for the teacher and the large pictures referred to form a permanent equipment for the school, and will, therefore, cost much less than the picture roll and general equipment usually furnished to the primary department, and which has to be renewed from year to year.

For the pupils a "something to take home" is provided for each Sunday of the year. These little children cannot read, but their love for a picture and for a story has been remembered. To satisfy this desire of the child, a four-page Folder has been planned for them. The first page will be used for the picture for the day, thirty-eight of them being the same subjects as used in the large pictures, the others illustrating other stories. Upon the second page will be found the "Verse for the Child" attractively printed in two colors, each verse having its own appropriate design. The rest of the Folder has been prepared with a view to its use in the home, and will contain the Bible story for the child, that the mother may read it again and again to the child during the week. "The Mother's Part" will give suggestions as to how the lesson may be worked out in the home. The type is attractive and clear, though not as large as that used in the grades where the story will be used by the child. One Folder is provided for each Sunday of the year, to be given to the child after the story has been given in school, and distributed when the pupils are ready to go home.

The Primary.

For the teacher the same general plan is followed as already noted for the Beginners', that is, a text-book for the year, sold at present in four parts, with the Introduction and Foreword in Part I. The treatment of the lessons is unlike any other text-book now printed for primary teachers. The lessons themselves, being suited to the child, yield naturally to the story method, though with some lessons the development method will be employed. Aids for the teacher's own study are included, suggestions given for varying the plan of teaching where needed, and directions for handwork and other attractive methods given in full.

In the primary department the lessons will undoubtedly be taught by class teachers in many schools, and for the use of the teacher a picture supplement has been provided with each Part of the book for the teacher. These pictures can be cut and mounted and be as permanent as the book itself. The pictures are like those furnished for the pupil.

The six-year-old pupils, for whom these first primary lessons are really planned, cannot read, though many of them will be able, doubtless, to pick out some of the words, or will be able to do so before the year is over. With this in mind the four-page Folder for this grade contains the story printed in type similar to that used in the First Readers for children, that at least the older children in the family may be able to read the story to the pupil of this grade. Where the lessons are used with older children, as is the case for this year, at least, the pupils are more apt to read the story for themselves because of the attractiveness of the type. Each Folder contains a picture like that used by the teacher. While the Folders are similar to those used in the day school for work with young children, and appearing weekly, have not been designed for permanent keeping, the stories are so beautifully written that it is hoped that the teachers and mothers will follow the suggestions given in the book for the teacher, and place the Folders in permanent form. In this way the Folders for the year would form an illustrated story book of 208 pages, or four books of 52 pages each.

Each succeeding year of the course will vary in form and treatment from the preceding year. While the equipment for this year is simple, the teacher's text-book gives suggestions which will aid those who are using the lessons with the older pupils of the department.

The Juniors.

When we begin the work with the junior children a new type of teaching must be employed—partly story, partly development method, but always a stimulating of the thought of the pupil, and aiding him more and more to think for himself. For this reason the treatment of the junior lessons differs in style from the courses preceding. Like the others, however, the work is in text-book form, but divided into three instead of four parts. Like the others, again, Part I contains the Introduction and Foreword, with many pages of suggestions as to the work of the junior department.

The junior pupil has an enthusiasm for work, certainly when promoted from the primary department. Wise is the teacher who realizes that the first work of the junior teacher is to cultivate this desire to do things, and does not allow this growing ability to go to waste. Able to read and write, yet not independent enough to be trusted always to direct his own work, it is very important that this first year the work, while made attractive, should, after all, be somewhat methodical, and the pupil taught to do well what is undertaken. This will prepare him for the original work to follow in the other years. Failure to secure the accomplishment of the simple task will mean failure beyond. Success here means the beginning of the establishment of the study habit so desirable a little later.

With these thoughts in mind the equipment for the pupil has been made to consist of three work-books for the year, and will correspond to the teacher's book as to division of the lessons for the year. The pupil's book is known as "The Pupil's Book for Work and Study," and is just what its name implies. With each book for the pupil there goes a picture supplement for use in connection with the book itself. Of course the book will belong to the pupil, and when completed will be a part of his own library. The type is large and the whole book is attractive.

The Test of Experience

A Few Clippings from the Bethany Editor's Correspondence

LINCOLN, NEBRASKA.

Dear Mr. Morrison: The Bethany Graded Lessons are surpassing in their usefulness the fondest dreams of our Bible-school council and teachers. This series created an intense interest from the moment of introduction.

It is a wonder that our schools have been compelled to wait so long to obtain helps based upon the true pedagogical methods of instruction.

We congratulate the New Christian Century Company that it is so happily meeting the demands of our best schools.

I am sincerely,
H. H. Harmon.

Dear Mr. Morrison: I gladly send you a note of appreciation of the Bethany Series of Graded Lessons and trust it may help others to a favorable decision.

We are delighted with the Bethany Graded Lesson Series. Every teacher is happier in the teaching and every child happier in the study of God's Word. They help solve more problems in Bible-school work than we had hoped. We thank you, and The Christian Century and our Bible-school Council for giving them to us. Irene M. Flint.,
Bible-school missionary.

STEUBENVILLE, OHIO.

In regard to the Bethany Graded Lessons I wish to state that we are highly pleased with same, as they are entirely satisfactory in every respect. We would urge others to adopt them. Hoping that you will be successful in getting many others to use them I remain Yours sincerely,
John H. Harwood,
Treasurer Christian S. S.

ELYRIA, OHIO.

Dear Bro. Morrison: The supplies received from The New Christian Century Company, Bethany Graded Lessons, seem to be meeting the needs and approval of our Primary Department. I have just concluded a conversation with our Primary superintendent and she tells me that the teachers are holding the attention of the scholars better and like the new supplies very much. "Of course," she said, "in regard to permanent results I can tell you more after we have tried them a little longer." They look good to me. Sincerely,
John P. Sala, Pastor.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.

Dear Bro. Morrison: We have graded our school, introducing the Bethany Graded Lessons into the Beginners' Primary and Junior departments. Our teachers are delighted with the courses. The scholars show a renewed interest. The attendance in the Beginners' and Primary departments has more than doubled since starting in with the new graded series. This is due to three reasons: (1) We have divided the departments and have moved into our new building. (2) We have six teachers at work in these two departments where we had one before. (3) The Graded Lessons are within reach of the child. They are carried away with the stories and come more regularly that they may not miss any. I cannot commend them too highly. Very truly yours,
C. R. Stauffer,
Pastor South Geddes St. Church.

Dear Mr. Morrison: The very best thing I can say for the New Graded Lessons is that our school was on the waiting list for months, and that we were among the first school to place these lessons for actual use.

I rejoice that the enterprise of the New Christian Century has resulted in our being able to have this fine series edited by one of our own men. The lessons are a great improvement over the old uniform set.

Joseph A. Serena,
Pastor Central Church.

WEATHERFORD, TEXAS

Dear Bro. Morrison: Mrs. Livengood is delighted with the results of the Bethany Graded Lessons she is using. It seems we are just beginning to really teach something to the child. We anxiously await the opportunity of adopting thoroughly graded lessons in the entire school.

Sincerely,
Owen Livengood, Pastor.

SHELBYVILLE, INDIANA

Dear Mr. Morrison: I have long entertained the hope that our Sunday-school might some time have a system of lessons adapted to the needs and the stages of development of our pupils, and am pleased to say that at last my hopes have been realized in the adoption, by our school, of the Bethany Graded Lessons.

Owing to the imperfect system of gradation used in our school, as well as in most other Sunday-schools of the present, however, we cannot expect to obtain the best results from the use of these lessons at once, but we have adopted them for our beginners and shall adapt them to the remainder of our school until such time when we shall have been able to grade our pupils along scientific and educational lines.

Our teachers in the primary and beginners' departments are enthusiastic in their praise of these lessons and our junior teachers are waiting impatiently for February 20, when they will be permitted to take up the work with the graded lessons.

In my judgment these are the best system of lessons ever put out by the International Committee, and are a long step in the right direction of placing our Sunday-schools on a higher plane of Christian efficiency and leading a much greater number of our pupils to accept Jesus as their personal Savior, which should be the ultimate aim of all Sunday-school work.

Thanking you for your assistance in introducing these lessons into our school, and wishing you unbounded success in your glorious work, I am Yours truly,
A. H. Oldham, Supt.

HARVEY, ILLINOIS

Dear Bro. Morrison: We are using the Bethany Graded Series in the Primary and Junior departments of our Sunday-school and we would not under any circumstances return to the old Uniform series of lessons. The latter sees only the truth they wish to teach, the former sees both the truth they wish to teach, the person to whom it is to be taught and the best method by which to impart it. Push the Bethany Series.

A STORY OF THE TRUSTS

BY JANE RICHARDSON

CHAPTER XVI.

Political Aftermath.

Election day came and went and when the returns were all in it was found that the Republican party had been victorious throughout the entire land. Teddy was not able to go to the polls for he was not strong enough to leave his bed, and he greatly mourned that he had lost his vote.

The "overwhelming victory" was followed by a ratification meeting to which Susan lent her satisfied countenance, while Alonzo marched in the "torch-light procession." Bannister, among others, spoke, and the campaign closed with this final burst of perfervid oratory. Eleanor was not present, of course, and she replied in the negative when Bannister wrote and asked to see her, assuring her of his sympathy in her bereavement. He realized that now it would be difficult to overcome her prejudice, and he decided to let matters rest for the present. He was compelled by the demands of his own and other's political schemes to be in Indianapolis during the session of the legislature which would convene in January, as usual. B. F. Mullins was already actively at work for him, and he was sanguine, with such influence enlisted in his behalf, that the senatorship would be his for the taking.

The election was followed by an immediate rise in stocks; capital that had been hoarded in anticipation of still harder times became abundant and readily sought investment.

The Wire Fence Works had come through the four years' panic remarkably well. The men had not demanded impossibilities of Randall. They were benefited by his prosperity and they had stood by him when the times were hard. While half a dozen similar concerns had been forced to the wall, the Carlinville works had been kept running, discharging no men, paying good wages, even making a little money.

Since his visit in June, B. F. Mullens had done his utmost to induce Randall to go into the Trust that had been organized, but he persistently refused.

"This is my personal enterprise," he said when again approached by the burly capitalist. "I established it, put my money into it, took all the risks of the experiment, built it up from nothing and put it on a paying basis. Now that it is a success, and has come through the panic without loss—thanks to the confidence of my customers and the personal loyalty of my employes, I am not willing to transfer it to an organization in which I shall personally count for little, if I'm not 'frozen out' altogether within a year or two."

"That's not likely to happen," said Mullens flatteringly.

"I don't want it to happen and it shall not, if I can prevent it—neither on my own account, nor on account of my men. It has happened to scores of firms and I'd be a great fool to risk it."

"All right, all right! Please yourself!" Mullens replied testily. "We don't force anybody into the combination if they don't want to come."

"I'm not so sure of that!" replied Randall with equal heat. "You may not employ actual physical force—thumbscrews and the rack went out of fashion a good while ago—but you have found other means of dealing with men who have been rash enough to defy you. You have not literally crushed their bones or slashed their sinews as was once done, you attain your ends without mangling your corpses!"

You've got a mighty vigorous imagination!" and Mullens laughed grimly.

"It's not imagination at all! I have stated a truth in plain language—that's all."

Since that interview Randall had seen him only at long intervals. After the stabbing affray Billy Mullens disappeared and was not heard of again. It was thought that he had gone to San Francisco where he was in hiding until the storm should blow over. When Mag Lewis was questioned by the police she had told as little as she could—shielding Billy, as such women always do shield their treacherous lovers. When it was known that Teddy would recover, no attempt was made to find the assailant. The police and the Mayor were noticeably luke-warm, and the latter was known to have said privately that "He guessed Wilkins was partly to blame; he'd just as leave not get mixed up in it himself and get the old man's ill-will!"

The Clarion gave a garbled report of the affair, suppressing Billy Mullens' name and recognizing in a half-hearted way Mag Lewis' courageous interference which had adverted a murder. It was rumored in Carlinville that B. F. Mullens, upon this last and most heinous of his son's many misdeeds, declared that he should never darken his doors again and that he had made his will providing for his wife during her life-time, dividing the bulk of his estate amongst his daughters. Billy was disinherited and would receive nothing beyond what his mother and sisters might choose to give him. It also leaked out that Mrs. Mullens knew where he was and secretly supplied him with money, under an assumed name. Mullens, himself, gave no evidence that he felt this last disgrace which had been inflicted on his family. He was even more surly and arrogant than before and drove about the town in his dog-cart or drag, the personification of ostentatious prosperity. There was not a Sunday when he was at home that the big house was not crowded with guests—men of money like himself—politicians he wished "to fix," and humbler tools, who, as his enemies said, "did his dirty work," who "took the lowest seats at the feast."

Through it all he kept his eye on Dick Randall, whom he could not corrupt, who refused to be bought or cajoled, and who—as he knew—was not in the least afraid of him.

The effects of better times were as apparent in Carlinville as elsewhere. Men who had felt it necessary to save every cent possible were now reassured and hopeful, and Dick Randall's men were especially confident. If he, "the Boss," had done so well in hard times, what might he not do now? The "full dinner pail" would be realized as it never was before.

Jessie Clark dropped in to see Eleanor one evening with the good news that her father's wages had been raised five dollars a month, and thus almost everyone in Wakefield had some small share in the better times, and the people were contented and grateful.

CHAPTER XV.

A Vain Quest.

Teddy Wilkins was not told of Mrs. Crofton's death. Susan waited upon him faithfully, finding another congenial object on which to spend her energy.

Nearly a month had passed before Ned was permitted to pay his first visit alone. His prattle amused the sick man, and he was relating a long story about Jody when Susan came in bringing a bowl of broth, Mary Benson following her.

During Teddy's convalescence Mary had been of the greatest assistance, relieving Susan when she was not on duty at the Works. She read to him by the hour—the papers, books of travel and adventure, as much to her own benefit as to his pleasure, for Teddy's taste in such things had improved much in familiar contact with a mind like Brainard's at the Sunday Afternoon club.

She brought him fruit and flowers and such delicacies as the doctor would permit him to have. There were days when he was impatient and irritable, but she developed a heavenly patience that nothing could disturb. Already disposed to be gracious when Teddy was so brutally assaulted, she realized that it was, indirectly, her own fault and she was filled with compunction and remorse.

As they entered the room Teddy gave Mary such a look that Susan was suddenly enlightened and handed her the bowl of broth, and said:

"Mary, if you'd just as leave, you may feed it to him. Don't spill it on him and gorm him all up! I'll go down and give Lon his supper or he'll be as cross as a bear." At this pleasantry they all laughed, and Susan disappeared dragging off her reluctant son.

The climax was not altogether romantic. Mary propped Teddy up with his pillows, pale and hollow-eyed, for he had had many hours of wakefulness and pain, and proceeded to feed him discreet spoonfuls of soup, watching him tenderly.

He looked boldly into her face and asked without any preliminaries:

"Well, Mary, when is it to be?"

Mary set the bowl down on the table while Teddy caught the hand which still held the spoon, and began to cry; but she managed to get out the words:

"Just—just when you please, Teddy."

She had idealized him to such a degree during his illness that her vanity was quite subdued, and she felt that it was she who was honored by the offer of so tried and faithful a heart—a view she would not have taken a few months earlier.

An hour later Susan and Alonzo were taken into their confidence.

"It was worth getting knifed for!" Teddy said contentedly. "I don't believe she would

"It was worth getting knifed for! Teddy said contentedly." I don't believe she would have had me if Billy Mullins hadn't interfered."

"You don't know. You hadn't asked me, and," a mischievous light in her eye, her cheeks dimpling, "I couldn't propose to you. You would have refused me if I had. Men find it hard enough—that is, some of them do—but they wouldn't like the women to help them out."

"No, the contrary things!" said Susan, "I guess they wouldn't! There's Lon, he was real miserable for weeks, and I think, near's I can recollect, he was three hours by the clock clearin' his throat, and hemmin' and hawin', before he could get up the courage to say what he'd been tryin to say, goodness knows how long."

Alonzo spoke up with astonishing spirit, for him, and said jokingly: "If I'd known all I know now I might 'a hemmed and hawed a heap longer."

"Perhaps so," Susan remarked dubiously, "but you was about as anxious then as they make 'em."

Alonzo, knowing the futility of having the last word was suddenly silent.

Our Readers' Opinions

Baptism by Water and Spirit

Editors Christian Century: As you expect to write more on the question of baptism, and this question is the greatest hindrance to Christian union, will you allow me to offer a few thoughts on the subject.

I notice that some of your writers try to make it appear that water baptism should be universally accepted and practiced; not simply on the ground that it was commanded and practiced by the apostles and first Christians, but because the institution conveys some spirituality to those who are baptized.

Now, if there is any truth in this contention it would be the strongest reason why it should be practiced, and made a test, or condition of fellowship in the church, and a part of the basis of union.

But I understand spirituality to mean the same spirit of holiness that dwelt in Jesus; and if there is any more of this spirit of holiness, in the hearts of those who have been baptized in water than there is in those who have not why is it that we have no evidence of this fact? It seems to me that those who take this ground confound water baptism with spirit baptism, and have simply mistaken their mental satisfaction, for spirituality; for there are thousands of Christians who have never been baptized in or with water, who have just as much of the spirit of Jesus as those who have; and every man who has the spirit of Jesus is his or is a Christian.

When Jesus said to Nicodemus, "that which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the spirit is spirit," he failed to say that which is born of water is, or can be, spiritual. With all due respect for the honest views of others, I must think that the "dead-lock" will never be broken as long as the Disciples continue to make water baptism a test of fellowship, and a part of the basis of Christian union.

I base this on the ground that water baptism was a temporary, initiating ordinance, designed to end with the law age, after spirit baptism was fully establihsed.

W. H. THOMAS.

Insists on the Argument

Editors Christian Century: Your zeal for Christian union is very praiseworthy. Your eagerness for it has led you to underrate the difficulties in the way. This is indicated by your plea for immersion. That plea seems reasonable, and one would think that it would be effectual. But to my certain knowledge it has been made with great earnestness many times in the past, yet without avail. One is almost compelled to think that the sprinklers and pourers who say that immersion is right are not really in earnest. I have often been surprised at what my brethren, Congregational ministers, sometimes say and do with regard to baptism. You will not be displeased when I say that it seems to me that you were deceiving yourself when you wrote the paragraph beginning, "Nor are we the champions of a particular set of ordinances." Of course you do not intend this to be taken as a historic statement, for you know well how earnestly the church has contended for immersion for the remission of sins, and for the weekly communion. But I refer especially to what you say about "the simple and beautiful customs which found sanction in the ministry of Jesus." You do not here mean the eating without a fork, or the wearing of a seamless garment or any other such thing. By "found sanction" you probably meant something less than you would have meant by "commanded." How much less? Would you say that Jesus sanctioned whatever he did that involved no principle? How far would it be safe to disregard what he sanctioned? If our only object is to get together, this end could be reached most easily by our going into the Roman Church. But I feel sure that you would not sacrifice loyalty to Jesus, nor expect others to do so. But to be loyal to him we must give heed to whatever he sanctioned.

You think it is futile to continue the baptismal controversy. So do I. The time was when some men tried to prove that every word in the English Bible was inspired of God. Others strove to show that the whole Bible is a human fabrication. Both parties failed because both were wrong. Was that a reason why men should give up Bible study? Sprinklers have tried to show that their mode is right, and immersionists that their mode is right, each to the exclusion of the other and both failed, because both were wrong. Is that a reason why the question should not be soberly considered? Every question important to the welfare of the church can be settled. Because I believe this I have labored on this and other hitherto perplexing questions.

Eldon, Mo. H. C. GARVIN.

Union and Infant Baptism

Editors The Christian Century: In your number of January 20 appears an interesting editorial contribution to the question of how best to bring about the union of Christians. The gist of your argument seems to be that the Disciples should change their methods, and instead of arguing that immersion is the only scriptural baptism, should plead with the denominational bodies to adopt it from the higher motive of the good of Christ's kingdom; explaining to them that they can do so without any sacrifice of principle. Pardon me if I say that this view of the matter will probably appeal more strongly to ourselves than to the other side.

In the first place you appear to overlook the fact that it would involve a change of the subjects as well as mode of baptism. You leave this out of the question entirely. But to do so is surely fatal to your proposal. We stand for believers' immersion; Paedo baptists for infant sprinkling, pouring or immersion. The question of the subjects of baptism separates the two camps more irreconcilably than that of mode. Many who are indifferent as to the latter feel most keenly about the former. For instance, the Church of England (Episcopalian) Bishop of Lahore, India, advocates immersion, but is staunch in his adherence to infant baptism. This makes organic union immensely more difficult; and, it seems to me, quite beyond the reach of such a plea as you advocate.

Paedo-baptists, as a rule, believe that their practice is scriptural, and has been in vogue from the earliest times. Bishop Merrill, of the M. E. church, strongly maintains this. It makes no difference that they base their arguments more on the Old than the New Testaments, take a view of certain passages in the latter book that seems to us mistaken and illogical, and attach undue importance to the writings of the Fathers and records of early councils. The fact remains that they do hold the practice as scriptural and necessary. Is this not true? And, as long as they so hold it, the change to our position would mean to them as great a sacrifice as the adoption of infant baptism would to us.

I doubt if even the optionist churches could narrow down their practice to believers' immersion without a sacrifice of both reason and principle. They reason that their position is the only common ground on which Christians can meet as matters now stand; and it must surely be a matter of principle with them to maintain it. What grounds have we for assuming otherwise?

The conclusion appears to be that we must either: (1) Continue our present plea, backed up, as in the past, by solid scriptural arguments; and trust to the truth surely, if slowly, permeating the rest of Protestant Christianity. (2) Widen our basis by including infant baptism and other modes besides immersion; which would appear to most of us an unthinkable proposition; or, (3) join heart and soul in the movement towards a larger measure of coöperation and brotherly love, looking towards a federation of churches and missions, which seems to be the dominant feature of Protestantism today, and which may, or may not, pass into organic union. We seem bound to adopt the third course; and it need not exclude, though it will certainly modify, our old position and plea.

It may interest your readers to know that in India our plea was definitely presented to the whole of the Protestant Missions, and practically rejected. This was ten years ago. Now there is a proposal for closer coöperation and interchange of church members, which will certainly be adopted, and will lead up to some kind of federation. We will have to join it, and try to lead it further on than the present leaders contemplate.

Like Christian Century

Editors Christian Century: I want to add my testimony to the increasing interest and value of the Christian Century. It gets better every week, and the last issue is the best of all. Yours, fraternally,

Corydon, Ind. W. D. BARTLE.

Editors Christian Century: I am another of those who do not care to rush into print simply for the purpose of saying something; hence I usually let a monthly letter to our state paper cover my report of this congregation's activity.

But I cannot refrain any longer from expressing to you my hearty appreciation of the great paper you are giving us. It stimulates and inspires me more than any other paper, and is of more real value than all the rest put together. I read it all, and often re-read it. It is passed on to many others, and I have had nothing but favorable comments upon it. It will take time to gain a fair footing here in the south, but your day is coming. I was surprised to find so many of the live Georgia preachers at our last state convention conversant with The Christian Century.

In writing to the Christian Evangelist the other day I said that The Christian Century is my ideal of a Christian newspaper, and that the nearer they patterned after its general program the nearer "our paper" would suit me.

May I suggest that one little feature once carried in the Century and now omitted I would like to see recommenced? I refer to the record of sermon topics. Would it not be possible to again use such a department, with the addition of the text to the subject? I am not looking for subjects. But it is a great help to me to know what others are doing in this line.

For the discussion of the live problems of the day, give me The Christian Century.

The Book World

SUNNYFIELD by Louise Morgan Sill. A splendid book for small ones relating the adventures of Rodsy and June, a dainty little girl and the cutest little boy in the world. Truly a book to captivate childish heart. (New York: Harper Bros. Co., $1.25.)

HIGGINS, A MAN'S CHRISTIAN. Norman Duncan has written a vivid description of the life of lumbermen in the winter months. His "Sky Pilot" reminds us of one of Ralph Connor's heroes; but the book is not a story—just a picture, and one which we cannot forget—of the soul of a man who loved his neighbor as himself. Read "Higgins, A Man's Christian," and you will understand better why people loved and trusted the Man of Nazareth. (Harper & Brothers, New York and London. Price 50 cents.)

BLUE BOOK OF MISSIONS, by Henry Otis Dwight. This valuable compendium of missionary information is issued once in two years. It is in three parts, the first treating the Fields, the second the Societies, and the third Miscellaneous matter such as tables, accounts of conferences, comparative notes, etc. There is a valuable statistical table, a chronology of important missionary events, and much information especially designed for the society secretary and mission student. (New York: Funk & Wagnalls Company. 248 pages. $1, net.)

HUMAN BEINGS VS. THINGS. A book for students of sociology; very little plot, but interesting conversations, like Holmes "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table," expressing truths that awake an answering chord in the hearts of some, and give others something new to think about. Rilly's plan to reform the tramps, by treating them as if they were gentlemen, is an original one, and worthy of consideration. Dainty touches of the home life of old-fashioned, home-loving, peace-loving Quakers, make the book an attractive one. (Asenath Carver Coolige, published by Hungerford-Holbrook Company, Watertown, N. Y.)

HEATHENISM UNDER THE SEARCHLIGHT, William Remfry Hunt. Mr. Hunt truly turns the searchlight on heathenism, especially in China. The chapters are short, and give us glimpses into the lives of those people, that may well startle us—just as if we turned a strong light, for an instant, on some scenes in great cities, which scenes would ever after burn in our memories. The ordinary customs of the Chinese are compared with ours; and, on sober thought, do not seem so incongruous as at first they might seem. We are helped to see ourselves from the Chinese point of view. If you are in doubt as to the wisdom of foreign missions, and wish to be fair-minded and study all sides of the question, read this book. (Morgan & Scott, Ltd., London.)

JOHN OF THE WOODS, by Abbie Farwell Brown. John is born into a home closely related to the king. While still a child "The Tumblers" get possession of him. He escapes and finally finds himself with a priest in the center of a great forest. The priest loves all animals and they in turn love him. Around his cabin the lion and the lamb lie down together. The boy enters into the spirit of his forest home and becomes an apt disciple. Later the priest and John are instrumental in restoring the king's son to health. Discoveries of relationship are then made, and rewards follow. After the cruel king dies all are happy and the kingdom is possessed by the spirit of the priest and John—the spirit of love. All children will like the story, and certainly will be taught the unity of life by it. (Boston: Houghton Mifflin & Co.)

MARY MAGDALA, by Harriette Gunn Roberson, is a story of the life of Mary Magdalene. It is full of interest, holding the reader fascinated to the end. One soon learns to love the beautiful maiden who lost her reason by the persecutions of one Galba Pretonius. The description of the love and devotion of John, who, after she became a maniac, took her to his mother, where they watched over her with tender care, is fascinating. After years of suffering she was healed by the Master. The reader is led to see in Mary of Magdala a pure-souled maiden and not the courtesan that tradition has pictured her. After her healing she devoted her life to the work of him who had brought her from the depths of darkness into light. The story is rich with pathos and biblical history.

GODLY SELF-CONTROL, by the Rev. A. T. Pierson, D. D. There are few, if any, better devotional writers than A. T. Pierson. He is devotional without losing restraint. In the present small volume on "Godly Self-Control," Dr. Pierson keeps up to his standard. There are fifteen brief essays in the book on such subjects as Regulation of Thought, Regulation of Moods, Regulation of Passions, &c. The suggestions and advice given cannot but help to be of service to the less experienced. There is one chapter on "The Regulation of the Nerves." This suggests our modern life. The author's treatment of "the nerves" is very sensible. He first enlarges on the value of caring for the physical health and then proceeds to give some well balanced advice as to spiritual things. The average church member will be made a better one by reading this small book. (New York: A. C. Armstrong & Son.)

LETTERS ON THE GREATNESS AND SIMPLICITY OF THE CHRISTIAN FAITH, by Henry Churchill King. These letters were formerly published under the title, "Letters to Sunday-school Teachers." The title has been changed so as to make the object of the letters clearer. Dr. King is doing much to interpret essential Christianity to our feverish age. He is also doing much to calm our hearts before the on-rush of changes. To help us to see that we are not discarding the fundamentals is to do us a great service. Even over so brief a book one grows enthusiastic. Every young person ought to read this book. Chapter three, on "The Significance of Jesus Christ" contains the substance of this day's best faith. The nine compelling qualities of Christ as here set forth ought to be studied by all Christians until the Christ really becomes authoritative in their lives; not legalistically authoritative, but lovingly such. No modern author in America writing in the same line is more helpful than Dr. King. He simplifies and illumines that which he touches. (Boston: The Pilgrim Press.)

PRODUCT AND CLIMAX, by Simon N. Patten. Those who have read Prof. Patten's "New Basis of Civilization" will welcome this brilliant little book with eagerness. It begins with an account of the return of a party from the freedom of a vacation camp to the restraints of of their usual city life and makes a parable of the experience. The problem centers about the morbidness and downward cast of the many in the busy working city world and the query is as to why life is so much less happy and guileless in this world than when the same folks are in the woods on undress and a vacation. The conclusion is that they are not getting the "climax" out of their "product," that they are not realizing on their efforts and that men are debilitated by failure to get returns for their labor, by an overstrain, and by the artificial complexities of a life that gives too little for too much. More play and more freedom from worry that they may play is the desideratum. To get it each man must get his share of the product and turn himself from seeking more than he needs to an enjoyment of what he has. (New York: B. W. Henbesch.)

RUM AND RUIN—THE STORY OF DR. CALDWELL, by Edward R. Roe, is a thrilling romance and timely temperance novel. As the title suggests, the demon Alcohol plays a prominent part among the different characters brought to the attention of the reader. The author relates the unavailing struggles of a promising young physician who, although he has warned and saved many people from ruin, is unable to overcome an inherited craving for intoxicating drinks. Dr. Caldwell becomes infatuated with the beautiful daughter of one of his patients, with whom another young man is also deeply in love. The doctor is in most respects superior to his rival, but "The Fiend" (Alcohol), which already has a firm grip on him, gets the better of him and finally drags him to ruin.

The story is said to be based upon real occurrences in actual life, presenting a most powerful illustration of the truth that there can be no temeprance or safe moderation in the indulgence of intoxicating liquors. (Extra cloth, artistic cover design, $1.00. Paper covers, in colors, 25 cents. Press of Laird & Lee, Chicago.)

RELIGION AND THE MODERN MIND; by Dr. Frank Carleton Doan. This volume is the more interesting because written by a man of Disciple parentage. Some fifteen years ago he was a student in Hiram College, where even yet the tradition of his unusual brilliancy lingers. The yoke of orthodoxy becoming somewhat galling he at last found congenial environment among the Unitarians, in one of whose Seminaries he is now Professor of Philosophy. He has studied in Germany and has his Doctor's degree from Harvard.

The book is fascinatingly written in pure but current language, being free from that stilted and incomprehensible terminology sometimes employed as the vehicle for the vagaries of pedants, whose ideas would mean little in the language of the street. Moreover it is written with a note of passion and you know that he voices experiences forged in the white-hot fires of his own manly soul. He writes with a bravery, an abandon, a freedom that is stimulating. However much or little one may differ from his conclusions, the whole effect of the book will be found a tonic. It puts iron into one's blood, enduring fight into one's life and great and glorious freedom into one's mind. It puts "a degree of freshness" into our "withered steadiness."

In philosophy Dr. Doan breaks with extreme pragmatism and seeks to establish a school which he calls, "Cosmic Humanism."

The book is well worth a careful reading, for, while we undoubtedly would not go to the lengths pursued by Dr. Doan, and being thinking men ourselves are not given to swallowing anyone whole, nevertheless we would be conscious of a most powerful stimulus, we would experience the charm of freedom in thinking, we would feel the inspiration of a communion with a most brave, pure, free, sincere and helpful human soul. The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 20.

Theme for the Day.

The Holy One of Israel.

Scripture.

I saw the Lord sitting upon a throne high and lifted up. Above him stood the seraphim. And one cried unto another and said: Holy, holy, holy is Jehovah of hosts: the whole earth is full of his glory.—Isaiah 6:1-3.

Lines.

Round the Lord in glory seated
  Cherubim and seraphim
Filled His temple and repeated
  Each to each the alternate hymn:
"Lord, Thy glory fills the heaven,
  Earth is with its fulness stored;
Unto Thee be glory given,
  Holy, holy, holy, Lord."

Prayer.

O Lord, may the spirit of worship and praise be ours today. We would join our songs with those of the shining ones about Thy throne. Help us when we enter Thy sanctuary to make it a place of holy thoughts and sincere devotion. We long for the peace and calm of Thy house, and for the message from Thy holy Word. May the gospel of Christ be preached with power this day throughout the world. And this we ask in his dear name. Amen.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 21.

Theme for the Day.

Thy kingdom come.

Scripture.

Thy kingdom come; thy will be done as in heaven, so on earth. Matt. 6:10, 11.

Lines.

Thine own prayer to Thy listening ears
  Ceases not, night nor day.
"Christ's kingdom come!" through all the years,
  Men every moment pray.

It travels with the earth around,
  Beneath all countries' skies,
North, South—wherever men are found,
  Dawn breaks and prayers arise.
  —Marianne Farningham ("Without Ceasing.")

Prayer.

Our Father, we have prayed the prayer our Saviour taught us, and its words grow unceasingly dear to us. But we confess with shame that we have not given ourselves with whole-hearted surrender to the task of helping in its realization. We want to see the gospel preached in all lands. And we consecrate ourselves anew and more fully to assist in the work. Help us, Father, to have a due part in the evangelization of all peoples, till "the whole round world is every way bound by gold chains about the feet of God." Amen.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 22 (WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY).

Theme for the Day.

The nation's heritage of patriotism.

Scripture.

He hath remembered his covenant forever, saying, Unto thee will I give the land, the lot of your inheritance, when they were but few men in number, yea, very few, and sojourners in it.—Psalm 105:8, 11, 12.

Lines.

No people can be bound to acknowledge and adore the invisible hand, which conducts the affairs of men, more than the people of the United States. Every step, by which they have advanced to the character of an independent Nation, seems to have been distinguished by some token of providential agency.
  —Washington (First Inaugural Address.)

Prayer.

God of our fathers, Thou hast brought our nation safely through the perils of war and of peace, and given us an honored place among the peoples of the earth. We thank Thee for the noble men to whom we owe the wise and careful founding of the state. May we cherish the rich legacy of their unselfish patriotism, and seek to hand on the inheritance undiminished to our children. Bless our country, its rulers and its people. And may our patriotism manifest itself in labors for the true prosperity of our national life. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 23.

Theme for the Day.

The divine work of Christ.

Scripture.

I must work the works of him that sent me while it is day: the night cometh when no man can work.—John 9:4.

Lines.

Day and night our Jesus makes no pause,
Pleads His own fulfillment of all laws,
Veils with His perfections mortal flaws,
Clears the culprit, pleads the desperate cause,
Plucks the dead from death's devouring jaws,
And the worm that gnaws.
  —Christina Rossetti ("Day and Night.")

Prayer.

Merciful Father, we thank Thee for Jesus Christ, Thy unspeakable gift. We worship Thee with joy as we recall his human birth, his life of love and work, his atoning death, his resurrection, and his glorious life in heaven. Grant us power from on high that our lives may be like his, our labors constant and effective, our faith unshaken and our witness clear and strong. Give all who suffer the patience of hope in Christ. Amen.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 24.

Theme for the Day.

If death were all!

Scripture.

If we have only hoped in Christ in this life, we are of all men most pitiable.—I. Cor. 15:19.

Lines.

Nay, hoped I not thro' Death's swift-soaring ways
  Mine own poor self some glory unknown to know,—
If, slowly darkening from delightful days,
  I to mere night must gird myself and go—
Then on thy face I should not dare to gaze
  For wild rebellion and for yearning woe.
  —F. W. H. Myers ("To a Picture.")

Prayer.

We thank Thee, O God, for the coming of Jesus into our mortal flesh, and for his glorious resurrection, the sure token that death is not the end. We rejoice that through his cross Thou hast provided for the eternal life of all who share his spirit. Kindle, we beseech Thee, in our hearts the holy fire of devotion, and make us brave in Thy service and serene in our blessed hope. Bring all wanderers back to Thyself at last, and let the whole earth rejoice in Thy salvation, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 25.

Theme for the Day.

Jesus' temptation and grief.

Scripture.

Who, in the days of his flesh, having offered up prayers and supplications with strong cryings and tears unto Him that was able to save him from death, was heard for his godly fear.—Hebrews 5:7.

Lines.

My sins, my sins, my Saviour!
  Their guilt I never knew
Till with Thee in the desert
  I near Thy passion drew;
Till with Thee in the garden
  I heard Thy pleading prayer,
And saw the sweat-drops bloody
  That told Thy sorrow there.
  —J. S. B. Monsell ("Confession.")

Prayer.

O God, there is forgiveness with Thee, and plentiful redemption. We confess with sorrow that we have resisted the Spirit of grace, and hindered his quickening power. We have been cold to our fellow-believers, scornful toward those we counted less worthy, and indifferent to the divine call to service. Yet turn us not away, good Father, but receive us, though unworthy. Continue to lead us, guide of our souls, and bring us home in the close of the day. Amen.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 26.

Theme for the Day.

Repentance and tears.

Scripture.

And the Lord turned and looked upon Peter. And Peter remembered the word of the Lord, how that he said unto him, Before the cock crow this day, thou shalt deny me thrice. And he went out and wept bitterly. —Luke 22:61, 62.

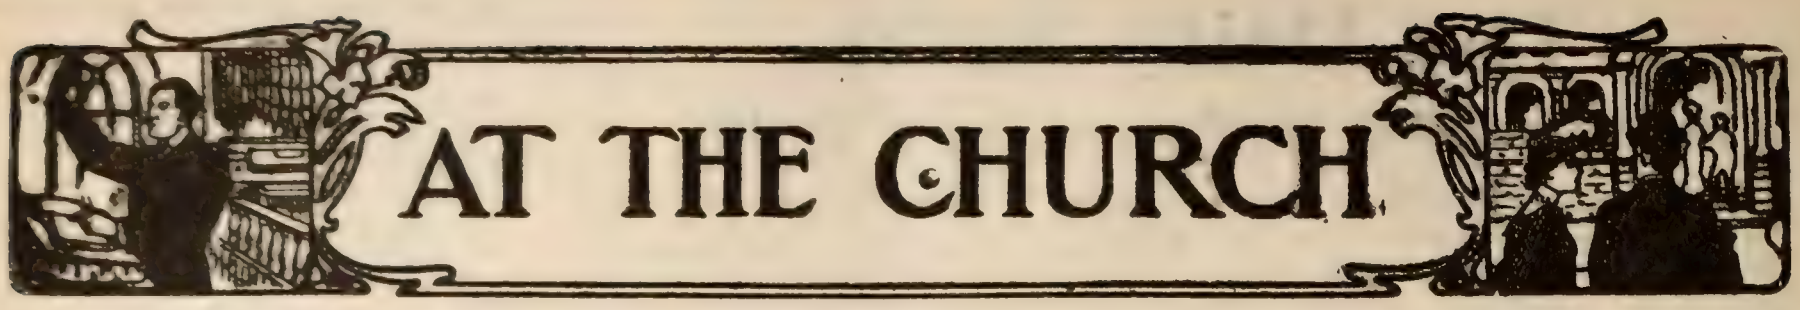
Lines.

"That God would move
And strike the hard, hard rock and thence,
Sweet in their utmost bitterness,
Would issue tears of penitence.
  —Tennyson ("Supposed Confessions.")

Prayer.

Creator and lover of men, we, like Peter, have denied the Lord who bought us, and with bitter shame confess our sin. We are unworthy, we have come short of Thy glory, we have done much evil. But the Master has looked upon us, and, even while his tender glance broke our hearts, it gave us hope of pardon. May our sorrow lead to humble repentance and amendment of life. Lift us up with Christ, and give us eternal life in him. Forgive all our sins, and answer us with Thy mercy, through Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

Woman's Sphere



—Of the 12,000 saleswomen in New York department stores one-third are wives and mothers, the greater part of these having taken positions after their marriage.

—Miss Miriam Hathaway, a graduate of 1897, instructor in mathematics at Wellesley college, is during her year's leave of absence at the head of the mathematics department in the American College for Girls at Constantinople, taking the place of Dr. Roxana H. Vivian, 1894, who is now in office at Wellesley as associate professor of mathematics.

—Mrs. Thomas F. Ryan, of New York, has given $4,000,000 to promote the charitable work of the Roman Catholic Church.

—Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont gave away 2,000 dolls to poor children during the Christmas holidays. Each doll wore a "Votes for Women" sash. It is reported that several suffrage clubs were formed by the little girls who received these dolls, without suggestion from older people.

—Miss Cynthia M. Wesson of Springfield, Mass., has given $7,000 to Bryn Mawr college. Miss Wesson, who was graduated from Bryn Mawr in 1909, was prominent in the athletic affairs of the institution and her gift is to be expended toward the betterment of the swimming pool.

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The Two Ways*

Perhaps in the latter part of the Sermon on the Mount there is shown a greater continuity of thought than in the earlier part. And yet it is not as a logical development of a theme but rather as a series of more or less unrelated statements concerning the basic facts of life that the discourse proceeds.

Jesus saw the necessity of making clear to his disciples how impossible it was to expect success in the work of the kingdom of God and at the same time to covet the praise of the men of that generation. The world was not prepared for the ideals of Jesus. Neither is it yet prepared, though great progress has been made since that time. Between a course that was easy and popular, and one that was difficult and likely to be avoided by most, it was necessary to choose.

A Difficult Test.

One of the outstanding mistakes of our present Christianity is that it has been made too easy for the man on the street. In the effort to prove that the Christian faith does not demand of men the ascetic and unsocial life, the church has gone dangerously near the opposite extreme and has left the world to believe that it is but little concerned with the high quest of character and is willing to make almost any compromise for the sake of popularity. There is no message that is more timely than that Christianity is not an easy piece of recreation, but rather the severe and sustained effort to attain character and to accomplish results.

A lax and easy type of Christianity can never appeal to the best there is in human nature. Young men can never be won to the ministry nor to missionary work by the attempt to prove that these are light and congenial tasks. Rather must the appeal be made to the heroism and courage of youth. The men and women of this generation want real work to do. They are willing to attempt the impossible if only the effort seems worthy of their power. It is to such a supreme and imperial task that Jesus summons men. It is a task fraught with great difficulty and requiring courage, tact and persistence. But its results are magnificently worth while, and it may well challenge the consecration of the best elements in the youth of the time. No mere argument from majorities is worth anything. The fact that many people take the broad and popular course is nothing to the point. The question is rather in which direction the heroes go, and most of all in which direction God himself is moving.

Appearance and Reality.

The second section of our study relates to the contrast between the real and the apparent. There are real and false prophets, good and bad fruit, genuine and superficial professions, and solid and insecure foundations. Every one of these must be tested, and no plea is worth while that does not bear the proof of use and experience.

In the Old Testament time the people were warned that a prophet must submit his claims to the testing issue of time. If his message came true he could be trusted. Yet, even this predictive test was considered precarious, and the law-givers laid down the rule that neither fulfilled prediction nor the working of miracles could ever be taken as a satisfactory proof of a prophet's message. Both of these tests were superficial and likely to prove fallacious. Rather must dependence be placed upon the character of the message itself. If it pointed to truer relations with God, if it forbade disloyalty to him, if it insisted on cleaner life and nobler motives, then the prophet was to be trusted.

The Love Test.

Not less true is this principle in the realm of later religion. Men are known by the fruits of their lives, not by any superficial tests like miracle or prediction. It is easily conceivable that there might be found all the power of miracle-working or of prediction in a being entirely destitute of moral character. Indeed, such a being Satan is declared to be. The true fruits of life are found in the moral nature, the dominating purposes, the controlling ideals. Where these are right, a man may be trusted to the end. Upon such a tree no poisonous or harmful fruit can grow.

And the final test as to whether a tree shall be left standing or not, is its fruit-bearing power. In the East, especially in Palestine, the government derives tax from the trees, so that a fig orchard or olive grove must always yield revenue according to the number of its trees. If one of them ceases to bear fruit, it is cut down because the farmer cannot afford longer to pay tax upon it. In the Garden of God the unfruitful trees are hewn down and cast into the fire, not because of the spirit of vengeance, but because of the great law of economy which forbids the continuance of any wholly use less thing.

The Lurking Danger.

But men are more audacious than trees. The latter generally proclaim their barrenness by the appearance of decline, though to this there are exceptions, as Jesus pointed out on another occasion. But men will claim to be friends of the Lord, to have preached in his name, even to have prophesied and performed miracles by his power, and yet give no evidence of a nature consistent with his desires. This is the subtle danger of all religious work. The ministry, the work of the Sunday-school teacher, the task of the missionary, all alike share the lurking lure of the self-interest under the professional guise of religion. The Christian needs to search his heart as with candles to make sure that his zeal for righteousness is genuine and not tinged with selfishness.

The Two Houses.

Jesus closed this wonderful discourse with a description of the two foundations upon which men build. One is the shallow unsubstantial, shifting foundation of pretense; the other, the genuine, rock-founded, solid substructure of truth. It makes but little difference what the character of the house may be. The most expensive and pretentious structure is likely to the same ruin as the more modest one, provided the foundation is unstable. It has no power of resistance. The storm beats it down. Pretenses cannot endure the testing of trouble unless one is firmly grounded upon truth and the love of God, no kind of religious service will prove permanently satisfying. There will come moments when he will say it was a mistake to try this kind of life. That is the moment when his house begins to collapse.

But the rock foundation is the guarantee of permanence, no matter what the size or cost of the building may be. When the rains come, the floods rise and the winds blow, the house is secure because it is firmly fixed upon a rock. The application is of course clear. No testing can imperil the character that is genuine and sincere. Its deepest interest consists with the nature of things. There is no falsehood or pretense about it. And all the powers of the universe coöperate with it for its survival and growth.

It is for this reason that Christianity can easily meet the challenge of the world. The more severely it is tried, the more clearly does it reveal its inward nature of love, rghteousness and service. And the more these qualities are revealed, the more the world prizes the people in whom they are embodied. Thus the church stands and will stand in spite of all the errant conduct of its people, and the professionalism too often found in its leaders. For it is founded on the Rock, and despite all pretense the reality reveals itself in the testing time.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

Topic, February 27: Christ Winning our Nation. Luke 10:1-17.

The great passion of Jesus' life was to win others to the standard of life which he lifted up. We who wear his name and would be his true disciples must be the partakers and exponents of this same spirit of concern for others. We who are Christian Endeavorers in the true sense of the term are committed already to the task of winning our nation for Christ. Not only did his own life exemplify this and his commission make it obligatory but the lesson which records his choice of the seventy represents him inaugurating the same thing among his own people. We must do the same if we would be like him.

Win our nation for what? To the cause of righteousness and truth. Induce men to make an effort to be good. Not only to be good but to defend goodness as the proper ideal of life for all men and women. This is a challenge to the moral fiber of any person who will take it seriously. It is not enough to follow good influences when they are aroused in public worship upon the Lord's Day. It is a perpetual obligation. It follows into the home, and the office, the shop and the school room, the places of amusement and recreation—everywhere; it is the plane of Christian living. To win men to such a standard is a worthy task.

This is our only salvation. Many are interested in reforms. But forces are constantly at work throwing snares and temptations in the way of those who are in a position to make the reforms effective. The bribe-giver is always ready to buy off the legislator, and laws prohibiting this are disregarded by the officials in the executive chairs, the sheriff or police. So long as we do not have honest men it is impossible to have just relations among the members of society. At this point Christianity and that alone is sufficient. It seeks to bring men into a conscious and vital relation to the eternal God to whom all men are responsible. He is just and good and demands that all men must be so. It is his omnipotence alone which has power to make men be good at all times. Whether we are interested in the abolition of vice and crime of the lower sort or of the respectable immoralities which prevail in business the country over we must ultimately rely upon Christ. Is this not reason enough to help Him win our nation?

But let us never forget what is involved in this. The time was not long ago when the people of the United States were relatively homeogeneous, and our cities were new and small. Today we are probably the most heterofeneous people on the globe. Every nation, tribe and tongue has its representatives here. Many of them have come in large numbers and colonized in many of the cities. They transplanted sections of their native country and people with their low standards of living—its vice and its degradation—in the new world. The small towns and cities have grown into cities of great proportions. While these are the centers of opportunities and privilege, they are the centers of evil as well. Poverty, vice and suffering flourish here. To win our nation for Christ means that all this must be purified and made right.

Five Hundred Miles in an Open Boat

News has just come from the Congo of a trip recently made by Dr. Royal J. Dye two hundred and fifty miles up the Bosira branch of the great Congo River. It is 100 miles up this tributary where the new station was opened at Longa. One hundred and fifty miles further is the site now desired for the third station in Congo.

At Bonyeka the work was opened just two years ago by a native evangelist, Iso Timothy. It is a very populous country with villages as large as European cities. Up to this time the people had never heard the gospel. During these two years the work has been blessed under the care of the Christian teachers and preachers sent out and supported by the church at Bolenge. It was to this point that Dr. Dye made his recent trip, accompanied by E. R. Moon. The journey was made in an open boat and at one time they were in peril of their lives. A sudden tropical tornado burst upon them and huge branches of trees were broken off and fell all about them as they sought shelter from the terrible storm. Had they been traveling in a dug out canoe as formerly, nothing could have kept them from being swamped. As it was, Dr. Dye sat in the prow protecting his typewriter with his mackintosh and umbrella. Their cameras and medicine cases were in a zinc tub. but the paddlers thoughtlessly removed the covering so that the cases were completely water soaked. They think a liberal application of glue may restore them to usefulness, but never again to their former appearance. Such experiences are what some call the romance which differentiates home and foreign work. They paddled on, drenched as they were, for there was no opportunity to change.

With a short stop at Longa, they pushed on to Bonyeka, arriving on Sunday, about noon. A crowd met them at the beach and escorted them to where the Lord's Day services were still in session. Dr. Dye had never been there before, and as they came up the village street the assembled congregation burst out singing, "Oh Happy Day." They insisted that he begin preacahing to them at once, although their service was over. Even then they refused to be dismissed, so on he talked. Often he stopped to ask them if they heard and understood, to which they would reply as one man: "We hear, we understand." The peoplt were finally dismissed, save the Christians, who remained to partake of the Lord's Supper. At the close of this, the whole village had returned and filled the church, so the preacher had to begin again. Save for an occasional hymn, this continued until sundown, when a large Endeavor service was held. It was a wonderful meeting, out of doors. At its close the crowds of their own accord returned to the tabernacle to feed on the teaching of the white teacher. Dr. Dye continued preaching to them until 9 p. m., they being then dismissed to reassemble at daybreak for a sunrise prayer meeting. Although the speaker had not had food nor a moment's rest since dawn, he never felt the need of it as he broke to the starving multitudes the bread of life.

While there Dr. Dye baptized thirty-six people. He says: "Sunday was a busy day. At daybreak there was a prayer service for those desiring to make the good confession. At 9:30 they beat the five big knoles. (Thees are huge drums hewn out of logs.) My, what a din! This called together a large crowd. At the close of the morning service we took the confessions and went immediately to the river for the baptisms. One man working for the big Trading Company came just as we were closing and I took his confession and baptized him right there. Even the trees were crowded with men, women and children. The river banks were black, red black (red paint on black bodies) with people. There was a small sprinkling of clothes in the little group of Christians and those baptized. There is as yet no opportunity for people to get clothing. They have even less than at Bolenge in the olden days.

After the baptisms the church members lined up and the new converts passed before them and shook hands. It was a beautiful ceremony and a goodly sight. The heathen people remarked, 'That is a church indeed.' They now number 106. All the people are very anxious for us to come and establish a situation here. I have never seen so real a desire before. The children are simply swarming in the streets, and the school (taught by a Christian teacher) now numbers hundreds. As we pass through the streets they gather around us in great crowds, looking up with bright, beaming faces, seeking our smile. I hate to return to Bolenge. There is so much calling us here, but my work is there. I must give my strength and what ability I have there.

This town has thirty sections. Bolenge, with its one poor street, looks small beside it. It takes a half a day to walk through Bonyeka, while we pass through Bolenge in half an hour. The outlook is wonderful and we can but trust God and press on."

Bonyeka is but one of many such populous villages. Thousands lie wholly unreached by the gospel message. The new S. S. Oregon will facilitate getting to them, with less danger to health and life. God speed the Oregon and those who shall carry the light of a new life to those millions of darkened souls waiting, starving, dying, day by day.

Not a Sin

To Pere Monsabre, the distinguished French preacher, there came one Sabbath, after mass, a lady who insisted that she must see him on an affair of great importance. It was a matter of conscience, and she explained that she was most seriously disturbed. In fact, she was sadly given to vanity. That very morning, she confessed, she had looked in the glass and had yielded to the temptation of thinking herself pretty.

Pere Monsabre looked at her. "Is that all, my daughter?"

"That s all."

"Then go in peace, for to make a mistake is not a sin."—Lippincott's.

Church Life

The choir of the church at Muncie, Ind., is preparing to soon give a play called "The Deacon," for the benefit of the church.

V. L. Graves has been called to the pastorate of the church at Denton, Texas. Mr. Graves has a fine record for work in the state.

Claire L. Waite, pastor of the First Church and E. N. Duty, pastor of the Second Church, Milwaukee, exchanged pulpits Sunday morning, February 6.

The church at Ladonia, Texas, under the leadership of A. L. Clinkenbeard, has made a conditional pledge of $350 for Texas Christian University.

The First Church, Springfield, Ill., is already working in earnest for their new building. A new lot has been purchased and the architects have been employed.

Miss Eva Lemert, Sunday-school specialist, has just spent a month with the church at Troy, N. Y. Her services are highly commended by the pastor, C. J. Armstrong.

Osceola McNemor of Gridley, has been called to the pastorate of the church at El Paso, Ill., to succeed A. M. Growden, who went to Santa Barbara, Cal., in January.

The young women's class of the First Church Sunday-school, St. Joseph, Mo., gave an afternoon reception to married friends February 10, in the church parlors, and a valentine party in the evening for the young people.

A. D. Skaggs, is moving things in the work at Sunny Side, California. During the month of January there were twenty-two accessions at the regular services of the church.

In the three weeks of the meeting with the First Church, Hutchinson, Kans., there were 138 accessions to the membership. Victor Dorris is the preacher and V. E. Ridenour, singer.

Professor Kirk of Drake University, has accepted the pastorate of the church at Stuart, Iowa, where he will preach each Sunday, continuing of course his teaching in the university.

The church at Fort Dodge, Iowa, has completed the basement for their new building. They will proceed at once with the superstructure and feel assured of much help from the churches in other parts of the state.

The state missionary convention of Texas will be held at Dallas, May 9-12. The papers and preachers of the state are preparing to make this one of the largest gatherings ever held by the Disciples of the state.

In the brief series of meetings being held in the First Church, Kansas City, Mo., there were forty-five accessions to the membership the first week. John Ray Ewers, pastor of the East End Church, Pittsburg, did the preaching.

The First Church, Oklahoma City, has sold its present property, which is being encroached upon by the business part of the city, and purchased larger lots in the most beautiful part of the city, where they will soon erect a new and larger building.

The Sunday-school of the First Church, Warren, Ohio, is taking steps to provide a class for mutes. A fine illustration of the need of adapting the work of the church to the special needs of groups of people in the community.

The church at Albuquerque, New Mexico, is at work to meet their first payment of $300 on their loan from the Church Extension Society. All departments are making healthful growth under the leadership of W. E. Bryson, pastor.

An evangelistic band has been organized among the men of the Central Church, Des Moines. These men seek out personally those who should make the confession of faith, and those who have been for some time in the city but have not united with their church.

E. W. Thornton, for the past year pastor of the Raomi Avenue Church, Los Angeles, has resigned and will in the future devote his entire time to Sunday-school work, being associated with Herbert Moninger. R. P. Shepherd acting secretary of the state work succeeds Mr. Thornton.

They had a great day at Hammett Place Church in St. Louis, January 23. C. C. Garrigues preached in the morning on "The Ministry as a Calling." In the evening the Men's Berean class conducted the "Volunteer Service" and five volunteered, one for the regular ministry, four for the mission field. Great!

The forty new members of the church at La Belle, Mo., were given a reception by the church February 2. The meeting of this church was led by the pastor, R. E. L. Prunty, and as an expression of their appre-

The Uprising of Men for World-Conquest

By E. W. Allen

The word business comes from the Anglo-Saxon "byzig," which means diligent. A man of business means an active man. Business spells activity. Now the one great and only business of the church is missions, and from the nature of modern business and the charactcer of Foreign Missions, two things are coming up clear on the horizon of our men in the churches.

1. Business is connected with Foreign Missions, and business prosperity is indebted to them.

In a great speech made during the Presidential campaign, printed and circulated as a campaign document, President Taft declared missions were indispensable to the political and civic progress of the world, and that there can be no true material development without the Christian religion. Converting the heathen, as a business enterprise, manifests good business acumen, even as trade excursions into surrounding territory is encouraged by every city's chamber of commerce. Whatever line of trade our men are engaged in, if they will read its record of exploitation, they will find themselves face to face with Foreign Missions. Modern commerce is the fruit of Christian Missions no less than modern civilization. Missions have made London and New York the financial pillars of the world, instead of Pekin or Constantinople. Missions create commerce as well as foster it. Ipecac, quinine, and India rubber were discovered by missionaries. The first steamships on African lakes and rivers were built for missionaries. Commercial travelers follow in the wake of missionaries. Railways in China, Japan, India, and Africa have placed the rails upon ties laid in the footsteps of missionaries. The Belgium Trading Company have a string of stores in the Congo. Into one of the largest the manager called one of our missionaries two years ago and said: "Mr. Hensey, why is there no sale for all these goods?" The missionary replied: "Give our evangelists six months' time in which to preach here, and you will have plenty of trade." Six months later the missionary again visited that Congo city to inspect the work of the native evangelists. The store manager took him in and said: "Mr. Hensey, our sales for the past three months have exceeded those for the whole fifteen years previous." This keen business man then offered to pay for the support of seventy evangelists of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, to be sent to every one of their seventy trading-post cities.

Our business men owe a debt to Foreign Missions as business men. The heathen have a claim on you at least six days a week. Who gathered and dried the tea in India, Ceylon, and China? Who toiled at the looms in Persia and Afghanistan to fill your tapestry department? Did the Negro who carried your ivory to the coast ever hear of your Savior? You say all business men are not interested in billiard balls or piano keys. Granted. But look at your desk. Whence came the tool of your profession? Your bottle of mucilage and your box of stamps owe a debt to the Arabs of Hadamant. Your eraser and the handle of your fountain pen came from South America, the neglected continent. The graphite of your pencil from dark Siberia, and your finest grade of ink from China.

In the business world no man liveth to himself. A famine at the antipodes changes stock in Wall Street. The value of exports and imports of Hawaii for a single year are twelve times as much as the total sum spent from the beginning by foreign missionaries in evangelizing and civilizing its people. War destroys markets and has closed more doors than it has opened. But the missionary is the pioneer of commerce and the herald of civilization. If you want a wider market, send out more missionaries.

While you profit by this world's market you can not hide from yourself the fact that much of this wealth costs the lives of men for whom Christ died, and that they have died practically in your service, never having heard the blessed Name. Here lies a great responsibility for business men, and they should show to the world that they have a stake in the greatest business enterprise of the twentieth century—Foreign Missions.

2. Foreign Missions need you because you are a business man.

The King's business requires the very qualities in its servants which you possess. Capital, confidence, attention, application, method, dispatch—these are some of the elements for efficient conduct of business. These are the very elements needed in the prosecution of the foreign missionary enterprise.

Foreign Missions sadly need capital. It is acknowledged by Wanamaker and other acknowledged business men of authority that Foreign Missions are the best paying investments in the world. Business men should not be conservative about putting money into this enterprise. They pay one-hundred-fold in this world, and life everlasting in the world to come. The indirect and collateral benefits conferred upon mankind in the foreign missionary enterprise are enormous. Roosevelt has said: "No more practical work, no more productive of fruit for civilization, could exist than the work carried on by the men and women who give their lives to preaching the gospel of Christ." Our business men should now come to the front with new enthusiasm and with coöperative enterprise and offerings far beyond anything of the past. With average gifts to Foreign Missions of less than the value of a postage stamp a week per church member, the men of the world may fairly smile because they are so pitifully small. How does such giving appear to Christ? We have been in the "retail business" in Foreign Missions long enough. Men! Turn the current of thought to missions as the greatest thing in the world, and show the world our proper conception by the largeness of your gifts.

ciation of his work the church made him a present of eighty dollars. Since his return to Missouri Mr. Prunty has had many invitations to conduct revival meetings.

Joseph Gaylor has just assisted in a meeting with the South Church, Japlin, where J. R. Blunt is pastor. There were 279 accessons. The Sunday-school and workng force of the church are said to have been doubled. Twelve hundred dollars were rased for the purchase of a lot for a new building.

A five weeks' meeting has just closed at Richland Center, Wis. There were 118 additions. The Sunday-school attendance was doubled. The church is a child of the Church Extension Society, and is active along all lines of missionary work. Thomas Wallace is the pastor.

B. A. Abbott, pastor of the Harlem Avenue Church, Baltimore, who contributed an excellent article to the columns of the Christian Century two weeks since, will give four lectures at Milligan College, Milligan, Tenn., on the general theme, "The Spirit of Science and Progress," the first week of the present month.

Frank E. Boren, pastor of the church at Vicaville, Cal., says that their experience with the "merger service" during January was so successful, that they have decided to continue the plan indefinitely. The Sunday-school has increased in attendance and interest, and many young people are finding increased profit in the work of the school.

The church at Mattoon, Ill., has made special preparation for the union meeting to be held in the city, beginning February 22, and led by M. B. Williams. In preparation for this event, the church called to the assistance of the pastor, W. D. Wetzel, W. W. Sniff, pastor of the church at Paris, Ill. In the two weeks of preparatory meeting there were twenty-nine accessions to the church.

The Christian men of all the churches of all the denominations of Des Moines met in a great union banquet, Tuesday evening, February 6. These men as they have come into the work of the church, have felt the weakness of working separately and are purposing in their hearts to so organize as to present a solid front to the enemies of righteousness.

At Roswell, New Mexico, a Century Bible class was started soon after the convention in El Paso, eight months ago. This class has already passed the century mark, and continues to grow. This church is making rapid progress along the best lines. Last July they paid off the final note on their church building debt. The services of the church were never so well attended as now. George Fowler is the minister.

The Indiana State Convention will be held at Anderson May 16 to 19. The church at Anderson is one of the best among the Disciples, and under the leadership of T. W. Grafton has never been satisfied with small things. It is therefore confidently expected that this convention will be one of the largest in the history of the state. Aside from the numbers who will attend much interest will center in the fact that at this convention the proposed new constitution for the state will come up for discussion.

The church at Troy, N. Y., where Cecil J. Armstrong is pastor, held a special men's service, Sunday evening, February 6. The service was under the direction of the Sunday-school, with Superintendent C. E. Van Zandt presiding. The music was furnished by men. The pastor gave the sermon, his subject being "A Man's Job." Though the mercury was at the zero point, the body of the church was filled with men, and the side roms with women. It is the plan of the church to hold a service once each month.

Dr. Harvey O. Breeden is giving a course of twelve lectures in the Berkeley Bible Seminary, Berkeley, Cal., on the general theme "Evangelism." Some of Dr. Breeden's subjects are: "The Wisdom of Soul Winning," "What to Preach," "Evangelistic Music," "Sane Methods of Promoting the Evangelistic Campaign," "Historic Movements in Evangelism," "Problems of Evangelism," "Modern Evangelists—Sunday, Chapman and Gipsy Smith," "Bible-school Evangelism," and "The Future of Evangelism."

GRADE YOUR SCHOOL
On the Installment Plan!

Every informed Sunday-school worker desires to have the graded system introduced into his school. But it seems like too big an undertaking to grade the school all at once. Hence nothing at all is done, and the school goes on in the same old absurd way of teaching the children the lessons provided for grown-up people.

The International S. S. Committee has made it possible to bring the graded system in, like the Kingdom of God comes, "without observation." You can have your school graded without any agony—almost without knowing it, except in its beneficent results. Begin at the bottom now—with the elementary grades, the pupils under twelve years old. Provide teachers and pupils with the Bethany Graded Lessons, based on the outlines already authorized by the International Committee. Later on—perhaps in nine months or a year from now—when the Committee authorizes an outline of lessons for the Intermediate grades you will be ready to adopt them and the Bethany Series will be ready with the helps for you. And so on, through the Senior and Advanced grades, follow the International Committee and as fast as they provide the lessons you will be ready to adopt them.

Our advice to all schools, then, is: FOLLOW THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE. No independent course yet devised is better than that provided by the International Committee, if indeed there is one so good in all respects. Besides, there is advantage in the whole Sunday-school world studying together when our leaders really lead—as the International Committee is now doing.

The Bethany Graded Lessons may be commenced at any time. Purchase the main bulk of your supplies wherever you wish, but let us furnish you these fascinating lessons for your pupils under twelve. THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO., 700 East Fortieth Street, Chicago.

The Central Church of Christ, Decatur, Ill., closed a three weeks' meeting Sunday, January 30, with fifty-one additions. C. M. Chilton of St. Joseph, Mo., was with them two weeks and was called home by sickness and death in his church. His preaching was masterly. Mrs. J. E. Powell directed the music with perfect satisfaction. O. W. Lawrence is pastor.

S. R. Hawkins of McAlester, Okla., dedicated the new twelve thousand dollar church at Miami, Okla., February 6, making the third church he has dedicated in Ottawa County, and the twentieth in Oklahoma. Sixteen hundred dollars was asked for, and more than eighteen hundred was raised at the morning service, rendering it unnecessary to ask for pledges at the afternoon and evening services.

A very successful revival has just closed at Elyria, Ohio. H. Newton Miller, secretary of the Ohio Christian Missionary was the evangelist and J. P. Garmong of Des Moines, was song leader. There were forty-six confessions and fifteen by statement and letter. The church is the stronger and richer for the meeting. Mr. Miller goes to the pastorate at the Broad Street Church, Columbus, Ohio, within a few weeks. John P. Sala is the pastor.

A letter has come to us from J. L. Brandt, written January 14, just as he and his party were coming into sight of Japan. Mr. Brandt tells of his short stop and pleasant visit in Honolulu with Pastor McKeever. The church there is growing rapidly in numbers and strength. There were fifteen accessions to the church the last Sunday in 1909 and the first in 1910. Enroute to Japan Mr. Brandt held three religious services, speaking through an interpreter to the Japanese passengers. He says they are interesting and attentive auditors.

Prof. Edward Kreiser, musical director of the First Congregational Church, Kansas City, Mo., who is soon to become the director for the Independence Boulevard Church, gave a lecture at the latter church recently, in which he is reported to have said that his criticism of the modern church music is that emphasis is laid upon the work of a quartet, to the neglect of the singing by the congregation. Prof. Kreiser has drafted the plans for the new organ which is to be installed in this church. This organ will in many respects surpass the great organ used by the Mormons in Salt Lake City.

S. M. Martin has been engaged to assist M. L. Rose and the church at Yakima, Washington, in a meeting during February. Chas. Reign Scoville held a meeting with this church last year.

A new mission is to be established on the West side at Wichita, Kansas, through the united effort of the three churches there, led by Walter Scott Priest, C. C. Sinclair, and R. H. Newby.

J. H. Capp was installed as minister of the church at DeKalb, Mo., February 6. For the past three years Mr. Capp has ministered to the people of the Woodson Chapel, St. Joseph.

"At the Beginning of the Second Century" and "The Church and the Christian Religion" were the subjects of sermons by Perry J. Rice, in the First Church, El Paso, Texas, on a recent Sunday.

Nay and Davis, evangelists, closed a meeting at Richland, Wis., a week ago, in which there were 118 additions to the church, and the attendance of the Sunday-school was doubled.

For three months the University Church, Champaign, Ill., has been making most careful preparation for a revival, which began February 6, with Charles Bloom as evangelist and Mrs. J. E. Powell leader of song.

The last Sunday evening of each month, R. G. Frank, pastor of the church at Liberty, Mo., holds a service of song. The last evening in January he gave an account of the life of Isaac Watts, and told how some of his noted songs came to be written.

Rochester Irwin has just closed a meeting at Long Point, Illinois, where he is pastor. There were twenty-four additions to the church, making seventy-seven in less than a year that Mr. Irwin has been pastor of this church.

The world's Sunday-school convention will be held in Washington, D. C., May 19-24. In preparation for some of the papers of this meeting several persons are at work gathering statements from prominent men as to their judgment of the helpfulness of the Sunday-school as a character-forming institution.

The Fifth Ave. church, Grand Rapids, Michigan, is enthusiastically at work in a revival meeting. The pastor, Homer E. Sala, is assisted by his brother, O. M. Sala, of Minerva, N. Y., as evangelist, and Peter Quartel leader of song. The meetings are well attended and promise to bring a large number of people into this young church.

W. A. Moore, pastor of the First Church, Tacoma, Washington, has been directing the attention of his people to some present day interests of humanity in Sunday evening services. He preached on "The White Plague," assisted in the service by a local physician. The other sermons were "The White Slave" and "The White Life."

In the last four months there have been fifty accessions to the church at Chickasha, Okla., under the ministry of Andrew P. Johnston. Two months ago Mr. Johnston organized a "Fraternal Bible Class" which has grown to include a membership of eighty persons. This class as a part of its work extends systematic help to its members in time of sickness.

H. H. Peters calls our attention to a mistake made in our announcement of a few weeks ago that he had been at Laporte, Ind., for a Sunday address and had taken an offering for Eureka College. Mr. Peters wishes it understood that he does not ask for money for Eureka on "alien territory." We are glad to make this correction of an error occurring through our being misinformed.

Of the meeting and work of the pastor at Bloomfield, Ia., I. J. Cahill says in a letter just received: "Bro. Ferrall has done an abiding work there and it was a delight to work with him and to speak to his people, whom he has brought up to the place where they drink in eagerly one's very most spiritual messages. Besides the splendid spiritual culture given to his people, there have been 321 added to the church in his five years' ministry, and the church is a foremost factor in the religious life of the community."

W. J. Lhamon spent one week preaching nightly in Orrville, Ohio, where Earl P. Kempher is minister. The immediate results were four baptisms and two by letter. Our cause in Orrville is weak, new and not well understood. The object in calling Mr. Lhamon was to get properly before the people. Mr. Lhamon did it effectively. He leaves a warm place in the hearts of Orrville people. His helper, Mr. Burditt, inspired all by the gospel in song.

The annual report of the church at Troy, N. Y., shows: Raised for current expenses, $2,685.10; on organ fund, $550; for missions, $1,004.99; total from the church proper, $4,240.09. The Sunday-school raised $631.97, of which more than $300 was for missions. The C. W. B. M. raised $308; the Ladies' Aid Society, $147; the King's Daughters, $63.95; the Dorcas Society, $70. The grand total for home expenses was $3,848.64, and the total given for missions, $1,693.03. The pastor, Cecil J. Armstrong, is doing a very constructive and permanent work with this church.

David H. Shields, Eureka, Ill., writes: "Three confessions last Sunday. Seven confessions on a recent Sunday. Fifty additions, seventeen baptisms and thirty-three letters in eight months at regular services. Offerings for Eureka College on Educational Day, over $400. Offering for Church Extension largest of any church in Illinois. Men's Club recently banqueted the "Princely Knights." About sixty boys present. Charles Stelzle gives the lecture course this year for the Ministerial Association of the College. A brick stack has been built for the college heating plant and an additional boiler installed."

In announcing the resignation of Claire L. Waite as pastor of the First Church, Milwaukee, we stated that he had been with the church three years. But time often flies more rapidly than we are aware. Mr. Waite has been in this pastorate for nearly four years, having gone there from an excellent service of love and faithfulness in Chicago. His work in Milwaukee has been one of earnest and constructive character, laying deep the foundations for permanent success. Mr. Waite is unusually faithful and efficient as a pastor. He gets near to his people, enters into their lives with a helpfulness of spiritual vision and worth that makes them loath to give him up.

An item of especial interest to Chicago Disciples and to all readers of the Christian Century will be the news that Dr. Errett Gates has been appointed Assistant Professor of Church History in the Divinity School of the University of Chicago. Dr. Gates' connection at the university hitherto has been that of Instructor in the Disciples' Divinity House, although in addition he has been often invited to offer courses in the Divinity School proper. His promotion to this honorable rank in the Divinity School is a just recognition of his splendid scholarship in his chosen field of church history. His courses in the Disciples' Divinity House will continue to be given as heretofore. In connection with the announcement of Dr. Gates' promotion it is also said that he will shortly go abroad for a year's study and travel.

The following report of the church at Fairmont, W. Va., where I. N. Grisso is pastor, has just come to our hand: "Added to the membership, 114, an increase of 67 per cent. The Bible-school has been graded and has made great increase. The Woman's Missionary Society has made an increase of 85 per cent. A Junior C. E. of fifty-four members has been organized. A Men's Brotherhood affiliated with the National Brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ has been started which promises much for the congregation and influence in the city. The sum of $233.60 has been raised for missions. Amount raised for all purposes $3,103.

Lowell C. McPherson of Keuka Park, N. Y., assisted by his brother, R. P. McPherson, closed their meeting at Parsons, Kansas, February 9. These meetings began January 9. The church at Parsons has about 800 members. The pastor, Frank Mallory, has received 129 into the church since he began his ministry here April 1, 1909. Of Mr. Mallory, Mr. McPherson says: "He is highly regarded and much loved in Parsons by all classes. In Topeka, where he had been for sixteen years, he was for eleven years a member of the board of education, and for five years its president. He was also a member of the Kansas Christian Missionary Board, and its president until his removal to Parsons. He is an ideal pastor, a strong preacher and a man of exemplary character."

For the second time in three years, H. E. Van Horn has held a successful meeting with the Capitol Hill Church, Des Moines, Ia., of which he is pastor. In the first meeting three years ago there were 120 additions. The meeting this year surpassed the record of the first. This is the more remarkable when it is remembered that last year this church held a meeting, led by Evangelist John L. Brandt, in which there were more than 200 additions. This meeting gives to the Capitol Hill church a membership surpassed by but few in the

GET POWER
The Supply Comes from Food.

If we get power from food, why not strive to get all the power we can. That is only possible by use of skilfully selected food that exactly fits the requirements of the body.

Poor fuel makes a poor fire and a poor fire is not a good steam producer.

"From not knowing how to select the right food to fit my needs, I suffered grievously for a long time stomach troubles," writes a lady from a little town in Missouri.

"It seemed as if I would never be able to find out the sort of food that was best for me. Hardly anything that I could eat would stay on my stomach. Every attempt gave me heart-burn and filled my stomach with gas. I got thinner and thinner until I literally became a living skeleton and in time was compelled to keep to my bed.

"A few months ago I was persuaded to try Grape-Nuts food, and it had such good effect from the very beginning that I have kept up its use ever since. I was surprised at the ease with which I digested it. It proved to be just what I needed.

"All my unpleasant symptoms, the heartburn, the inflated feeling which gave me so much pain disappeared. My weight gradually increased from 98 to 116 lbs., my figure rounded out, my strength came back, and I am now able to do my housework and enjoy it. Grape-Nuts did it."

A ten days trial will show anyone some facts about food.

Look in pkgs. for the little book, "The Road to Wellville." "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

brotherhood. As a recognition of his services at the close of the meeting the church presented Mr. Van Horn with two sectional book cases.

The special evangelistic meeting at Bloomfield, Iowa, under the leadership of I. J. Cahill and O. C. Petit, closed Sunday evening, February 6. There were twenty-one accessions to the church. Ten of these were men. F. D. Ferrall, the pastor, says: "The time had come in our work when we felt the need of a series of meetings of the pastor-evangelist type. Mr. Cahill more than made good. His sermons not only attracted the attention of large numbers of thinking men and women outside the church, but the church itself was greatly strengthened for a larger vision and more strenuous effort. Mr. Pettit led the large chorus choir efficiently and rendered special music each evening." On Monday evening following the meeting, Mr. Cahill gave his lecture, "Peter's Wife's Mother."

Geo. A. Miller, pastor of the Ninth Street Church, Washington, D. C., writes of a matter of interest not only to the Disciples of Washington, but to all Christian people in the states. He says there is at present no law at all regarding the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia. Taking advantage of this, contractors push their work seven days in the week, and all places of amusement are open on Sunday. A bill known as "The Johnson Bill" has passed the senate and is now in the hands of the house committee, which is intended to close all unnecessary work on the day that is observed throughout the country as a day of rest. Mr. Miller urges Christian voters to write their representatives, urging the passage of this measure. The measure is being opposed by the moving picture men and the Seventh Day Adventists.

Reports from the work at Galesburg, Ill., for 1909 show a gratifying growth in all departments. The pastor, J. A. Barnett, preached 151 sermons during the year, thirty-two of which were preached in a meeting at New Bedford in December at which twenty-five were added to the church. At regular services twenty-nine were added to the church and thirteen in a tent meeting in the east end of the city in July; total forty-two. The Bible-school averaged 190, a gain of twenty-six, and a large cradle roll and home department have been added. The church, including all departments, raised $4,396.75 during the year, $730.87 of which was for missions and benevolences. At the annual meeting in January the congregation voted to become a living link in the Foreign Society, and enough pledges have been secured to insure success. The next enterprise will be a new church home.

The annual report of the Englewood Church, Chicago, has just come to our hands. It shows advance in all departments of the work. There were ninety-one accessions to the church, forty-five by letter, thirty-six by confession, and ten by statement. The net increase was fifty-one. The treasurer reported total receipts for the year, $7,632.66. The C. W. B. M. raised, including subscriptions to Tidings, etc., a total of $587.35. The Young Ladies Mission Circle has a membership of twenty-five, and raised $60. The Christian Endeavor Society made a net gain of ten in its membership, and raised during the year $78.51. The Junior C. E. has twenty-five members and raised $34.54. The Ladies' Aid Society reported receipts for the year, $522.13. The average attendance at the Sunday-school was 366. There were fifteen additions to the church through the Sunday-school. The average weekly collection was $12.60, or a total of $642.66. The school gave $314.91 for missions. C. G. Kindred has been recalled to the pastorate of the church and has accepted.

Sunday, February 6, was Founders' Day at Eureka College. It was one of the great days of recent years. D. H. Shields, pastor of the Eureka Christian Church, delivered a sermon in the morning on "The Place of Christian Education in our National Life." In the evening H. H. Peters, field secretary for the college, delivered an address on "The Disciples—An Interpretation." Good congregations were present at both services and great interest was manifested. Mr. Peters showed that the logic of the plea of the Disciples was an educational program for all the interests of the church, culminating in a sufficent number of well-equipped and endowed institutions of learning to carry on a vigorous campaign for the cause of the Master. Fifty-five years ago the Illinois Legislature granted a charter to Eureka College. The college has done invaluable service. Many times this service has been rendered amidst the greatest difficulties. But the indications are favorable for some good things for Eureka in the immediate future. Mr. Peters was able to report $41,000 raised on the $125,000 endowment proposition with good prospects.

January 13, the congregation at Philipsburg, Pa., dedicated their beautiful new building. This is one of our really great churches not often noticed in the religious journals because of the modesty of pastor and people in reporting their work. This church has but a brief history. In January, 1907, the few Disciples of the community held a meeting under the leadership of W. S. Buchanan, as evangelist. As a result they were soon able to form an organization with 178 members. The meetings were held in a hall. The church called D. F. Harris of Montpelier, Ind., as pastor. He remained a year a half, and during that time, with the help of G. P. Taubman and W. A. Gardner in a meeting there were 161 additions to the church. In October 1908 W. S. Buchanan became pastor, and another meeting was held. The membership by the close of this meeting was 381. On account of the hard times, the plans for the new building were delayed until May, 1909, when the work was begun and the corner stone was laid in July. The church cost $25,000, and has an unusually attractice auditorium, which with the Sunday-school rooms will seat 1,000 people. The basement provides for kitchen and dining room, a boys' gymnasium, and a ladies' parlor. H. J. Dudley has just become the new pastor of the church. Z. T. Sweeney had charge of the dedicatory services and raised $9,000, leaving only a small indebtedness upon the church. Following the services on Sunday were special meetings during the week. On Thursday evening, Arthur Holmes of Philadelphia, gave an address. This growing church has not exhausted its vision in building, but is already planning definite lines of institutional work.

Newark, Ohio, Feb. 13.—Ninety additions the first day of invitation. The morning services brought fifty-nine. Twenty-two tonight. Nine at an afternoon service. W. D. Ward, pastor, has only been on the ground four weeks but is in the hearts of his people and is giving loyal support. Lewis leads a great chorus.—Brooks Evangelistic Co.

Elkhart, Ind., Feb. 13.—Sixteen today, fifty-seven in first thirteen days. The greatest meeting in this city in any church for several years. This team is as good as the best and appeals to the people in the city. Each one a specialist. Charles E. Varney has had the largest men's meeting by any one church. Mrs. Varney is the most capable woman I ever knew in the work. Oscar Marks an all round man.—S. G. Buckner.

Vincennes, Ind., Feb. 13.—Meeting four weeks old. Four hundred one additions, forty-one today, Ninety nine in last six days. Interest increasing. Greatest crowd present tonight. Wilhite laboring with increased power. Tuckerman's work more efficient every day. Mrs. Tuckerman's personal work a great factor in the meetings. Church rejoicing with great joy over the mighty victory. Men and women of all walks of life obey the gospel. City thoroughly stirred. We continue. Brammel and Gould in a meeting with the Second Church with fifty nine additions first week. They continue.—William Oeschger.

New Secretary for Ohio

Uhrichsville, Ohio, February 2, 1910.—The committee appointed to nominate a successor to H. Newton Miller as corresponding secretary of the Ohio Christian Missionary Society have been in constant correspondence since their appointment. They consist of the following: P. H. Welshimer of Canton, Dr. S. M. Cook of Weston, S. M. Cooper of Cincinnati, J. P. Allison of Cleveland, and Charles Darsie of Uhrichsville. They have been able to reach a unanimous decision, which has also been the judgment of many brethren over the state. I. J. Cahill of Dayton, is the man who has been asked to assume the duties of the office and we are happy to give his letter of acceptance as follows:

Dear Brother Darsie: I have received and considered with care and prayer your letter on behalf of the committee on nominations asking me to accept the nomination to the office of corresponding secretary of the Ohio Christian Missionary Society.

Deeply appreciating the confidence of the committee and the far-reaching importance of the work, I have decided to accept the nomina at your hands. If my brethren of the ination at your hands. If my brethren of the shall take up this labor of love with the hope that working faithfully together the Lord may find us Ohio brethren into a large service for the Kingdom. Praying for such divine leadership, I am I. J. CAHILL.

A Busy Boy.

A Salvation Army officer in London says he asked a boy what work he did to provide him with food, etc., and the reply was: "I pick strawberries in the summer, I pick hops in the autumn, I pick pockets in the winter, and oakum for the rest of the year."

National Benevolent Association

The contract has finally been let for a new building to cost about $25,000, to be used for a home for the aged, in Dallas, Texas. It is expected that this building will be completed early in the summer. It is expected that this building will be completed early in the summer. It is to be modernly equipped. It is being so constructed that each person may have his or her own room. It will be opened for the especial benefit of aged, indigent Disciples of Christ. A score or more of worthy veterans of the cross are anxiously awaiting the opening of this building.

The Christian Orphans' Home, of St. Louis, will receive $1,000 from the estate of the late B. F. Lowry, of Columbia, Mo. During his lifetime Bro. Lowry made a number of generous offerings to education. In his death he remembered the Lord's poor.

The association is prepared to furnish free a beautiful Easter cantata, prepared by J. W. Carpenter, to the Sunday-schools that will observe Easter in the interest of our benevolent work. Why not Christianize the annual celebration of the resurrection of our Lord?

The National Benevolent Association has about 500 children in its six homes at the present time. The task of feeding these children three times a day for 365 days in the year is not a small one. Every Bible-school in the Brotherhood is asked to have fellowship in this blessed work.

The Christian Woman's Board of Missions and the National Benevolent Association have decided to abandon the plan of joint Easter observance. The Bible-schools will observe Easter this year i nthe interest of the National Benevolent Association, and send their offerings directly to the Association.

JAMES H. MOHORTER, Gen. Sec.

Laymen's Convention at St. Louis

By Stephen J. Corey.

I wish you could have been at St. Louis at the Laymen's Missionary Convention. In the rally of our people there was high, sane enthusiasm. They voted to raise the offerings from $6,800 for foreign missions to $13,000. L. W. McCreary's church averaged $3 per member last year and he is out for $6 per member this year. McCreary is a prince. Yesterday J. Campbell White asked the men who wanted to do larger things to step into a side room with the coöperating committee. About twenty-four staid. He put a little proposition before them for the starting of a "One Thousand Dollar League" for foreign missions. Twelve or fourteen men pledged $1,000 or more a year for the work abroad. There was much prayer and not a few tears. One man, who gave not a cent last year, pledged $1,000, and said: "I am ashamed of myself, and that pledge will not be all." Several pledged $2,000. Then and there they started a league, which they planned to make world-wide. It was certainly a touching moment to see the business men take the thing in their hands and lead out.

Our own H. T. Sutton made one of the greatest, if not the greatest, speeches of the convention. He went on to Memphis, Little Rock, Oklahoma City, etc.

Notes from the Foreign Society

Dr. J. W. Hardy, Jr., Nashville, Tenn., has been appointed by the Foreign Society to go to Batang, on the border of Tibet, to take the place of Dr. S. F. Loftis, who died there last yeaar. He will probably start next June. The great church at Vine street, Nashville, Tenn., P. Y. Pendleton, pastor, will support him.

A Friendly Grocer

Dropped a Valuable Hint About Coffee.

"For about eight years," writes a Mich. woman, "I suffered from nervousness—part of the time down in bed with nervous prostration.

"Sometimes I would get numb and it would be almost impossible for me to speak for a spell. At other times I would have severe bilious attacks, and my heart would flutter painfully when I would walk fast, or sweep.

"I have taken enough medicine to start a small drug store, without any benefit. One evening our grocer was asking Husband how I was and urged that I quit coffee and use Postum, so he brought home a pkg. and I made according to directions and we were both delighted with it.

"So we quit coffee altogether and used only Postum. I began to get better in a month's time and look like another person, the color came back to my cheeks, I began to sleep weel, my appetite was good and I commenced to take on flesh and become interested in everything about the house.

"Finally I was able to do all my own work without the least sign of my old trouble. I am so thankful for the little book, 'The Road to Wellville.' It has done me so much good. I haven't taken medicine of any kind for six months and don't need any.

"A friend of ours who did not like Postum as she made it, liked mine, and when she learned to boil it long enough, her's was as good as mine. It's easy if you follow directions." Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," 'in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

H. S. Davenport, Fairfield, N. C., a general evangelist, looking after twelve churches, will aim to enlist all of them in the March Offering. He is helping to build three churches. He is seventy-two years of age and a very busy man. A preacher like that in every church would insure a million dollars for foreign missions this year.

Dr. C. C. Drummond has treated 10,500 patients in our hospital at Harda, India, during the past year. This is a vast work for Christ and his poor children. A new hospital building is greatly needed. Will not some friend put up a memorial? The dreadful plague epidemic has again entered Harda. We do not realize the brave fight these missionaries are making in the face of disease, ignorance and even death.

Dr. James Butchart and family have returned to China and have just reached their great hospital work at Lu Cheo Fu. This is one of the most important stations in all China.

Leslie Wolfe, Manilla, Philippine Islands, under date of January 4, 1910, reports thirteen baptisms during December. During the whole of 1909 there were 253 baptisms in the work under his charge. One chapel was dedicated at Singalon and four others in the provinces. This would be a very good year's work for a preacher in any of our states in this country. There were more than 800 baptisms in all the Philippine Islands by our missionaries during the year 1909. Do you not think something is being done in this great field?

The average number of conversions in the United States, it is stated, is about three for each Protestant preacher; but the averge number of conversions for each missionary on the foreign field is twelve.

W. H. Hanna and family have returned to the Philippine Islands and Dr. Lemmon, the new missionary, has just reached that field.

Last week one friend in Illinois sent the Foreign Society $500 on the Annuity Plan; another friend in the same state sent $100. We are hoping to receive many others in these March Offering days.

Seven new living links have been promised. Others are working in that direction. All the signs point to many more. A number of churches will become Every Member Churches. That is, an offering will be secured from every member. The Winchester, Ky., church will no doubt be in this class. In the past about ninety per cent of the membership have contributed, but they will do even better this year. The sky is all bright. Let everybody work hard. This is the time for work, work, work!

Items of American Missions

M. Pitman of New Orleans, has taken the work at Lansdowne, East St. Louis, Ill., a mission of the American Board.

Oscar Sweeney, missionary pastor at Oceanside, Cal., has a remarkable hold upon the community. He recently undertook to leave that he might take up the work at Douglas, Ariz., but the church and the entire community objected so strenuously and manifested their way in such a substantial increase in salary that he decided to remain. Methodists, Baptists, Episcopalians, Catholics, Christian Scientists—everybody placed their name upon the subscription list. The largest individual pledge was made by a Catholic. This action was taken on the ground that he is "a community man" and could not be spared from the city. He has been especially active in the endeavor to make and keep the town "dry" and temperance people think this good evidence of how public sentiment stands.

Frank Maples, missionary at Billings, Mont., reports a most encouraging situation in that far away frontier town. Their audiences are the best in the history of the church. Their finances are in good condition and men and women are added to the saved at almost every service.

Evangelist H. F. Lutz closed an interesting meeting with the Kensington Church, Philadelphia, of which Brother H. W. Cadwell is the pastor. There were thirty baptisms and six accessions otherwise. A splendid feeling obtained on the part of other religious communions in the vicinity of the meeting and the plea and position of the Disciples is better understood throughout the city.

The Kehr Street Mission at Buffalo has raised in cash and pledges $1,600 for its new building. Pastor Roy E. Deadman says that as soon as they get into the new house, the church will be regularly organized and thereafter be known as a church instead of a mission. There is a great deal in what you call a thing.

Howard Peters, missionary at Altus, Ark., does much preaching in school houses throughout the adjacent country. Recently twenty-five were received into the church from Greenwood three miles away. This builds up a great constituency for a church throughout the surrounding country.

Stacey S. Phillips of Alamogorda, New Mexico, reports a good meeting by Evangelist J. Arthur Stout, during which the forces were organized and strengthened.

J. M. Monroe, superintendent of missions in Oklahoma, reports having dedicated churches at Hydro, Wynona and having promoted building interests at Olivet, Marietta and Moore during the month of January. By obtaining possession of property in every town in this new country the Christian churches are obtaining a franchise upon that great field and in the very near future will be running well equipped solid vestibule trains over the tracks.

W. B. Young of Poteau, Okla., recently organized a new church at Red Oak.

Secretary Orilas G. White of Bethany, W. Va., and Evangelist J. A. Lord are in a meeting at Elkins, W. Va.

In Southeast Minneapolis, Minn., a church was recently organized by J. M. McKee.

Reports from the fields since the regular meetings in December show the following: Baptisms, 234; additions by letter, 131; additions otherwise, 372; total, 877; churches organized, one; Sunday-schools organized, two; buildings dedicated, one.

The following missionaries have tendered their resignations in the field where they have been laboring: W. L. Dudley, Lancaster, Pa.; Horace Siberell, New Orleans, La.; H. Gordon Bennett, Evangelist Northwest Canada.

Grant K. Lewis.

Bound By Satan

Christ Overcoming the Works of the Devil

It was in one of the synagogues of Jerusalem on a Sabbath that Jesus saw a poor woman who for eighteen years had been bent over with curvature and could not lift herself. Jesus had been teaching, and he saw the value of an illustration that would fasten upon the minds of his hearers the message he had spoken. For that message always concerned itself with the liberation of human life from the thraldom of self and the lesser good. The woman bowed in her deformity appealed to him as an object of his compassionate help.

As soon as he saw her he called her to him. She came, creeping along through the crowd. When she reached his side he laid his hand upon her, in his accustomed way, and at the touch she was at once made straight and praised God for her deliverance. When the ruler of the synagogue charged Jesus with breaking the Sabbath by this work of healing, he responded indignantly that no one of them would hesitate to deliver an animal on the Sabbath. How much more, then, had he the right to liberate this woman, who for eighteen years had been bound by Satan.

In these words Jesus referred to the popular belief that many forms of sickness were the result of possession by evil spirits. That not a few instances of healing of this character of malady occurred during Jesus' ministry is clear from the record of the Gospels. Instances in which blindness, dumbness, and epilepsy were believed to be the result of demon possession and were healed as such by Jesus, are found in half a dozen places in the synoptic Gospels.

Probably the belief in spirits rose from some primitive type of animism which viewed all events as springing from personal causes. The phenomena of nature, like storms, earthquake, and fire, were believed to be the work of beings invisible to men who inhabited waste places and brought disaster upon their victims. Such creatures had the power of entering human bodies along with food or drink or air. To get rid of such unholy and terrible tenants, the body must be submitted to the agency of magic and exorcism. In this work of expelling evil spirits, resort was had to herbs, rings or other substances supposed to possess magical property.

So common was the belief in evil spirits in the day of Jesus that their expulsion from the afflicted was a regular branch of the healing art, practiced without reproach or suspicion of being founded upon mere superstition. When the Jews charged Jesus with partnership with the prince of demons, he reminded them that they did not so think of their own sons and countrymen who practiced the art of exorcism.

The effort to explain the different forms of disease as phases of demoniacal possession was, therefore, thoroughly in harmony with the belief of the age. They did not classify all diseases as coming under this head, but there seem to have been few forms of malady which might not on occasion be so interpreted. They ranged all the way from deafness to fever and insanity. And our Lord seems to have accepted the popular view in reference to demon possession as the easiest approach to a method of healing those who were afflicted.

The more representative cases of demon possession are those in which the victim showed the ordinary signs of insanity. In comparing these cases with those cited by alienists in their study of modern insanity almost every feature can be identified. Not only was it the popular opinion that the victim was possessed by a controlling spirit, but he himself shared this view, sometimes believing himself the habitation of a company of demons. The man of Gadara said there were many spirits within him, and called himself "legion." Mary of Magdala was said to have been freed from the dominion of seven evil spirits. The oriental love of figurative language will be noted in these expressions, but behind them lay the serious conviction that malevolent intelligences were busy in the lives of these unhappy creatures. Jesus' method in his healing work among this variety of sufferers was characteristic of his attitude toward all who craved his help. For the most part he ignored the particular explanation of demon possession in those instances in which ordinary human ailments were cloaked by that term. In the case of the insane he met the sufferers with the quiet acceptance of their own view of their maladies. With that calmness and authority which made every act of his life supremely convincing and masterful, he ordered the unclean spirit to depart, complying thus fully with the principle of suggestion, and in this manner enlisting all the powers of the afflicted in their own behalf.

Even in the case of the Gadarene demoniac, the most violent case we have in the New Testament, the Saviour pursued no other course than was his custom with these people. The shrewd knowledge displayed by the insane, who were quick to seize upon those details of his character and mission which most affected their view of their condition, was an expected part of their distressing condition. All who deal with the insane know the exceptional cleverness with which they can adapt themselves to circumstances, and that in general, on all but the one fatal theme of their illusion, they may be quite normal.

What other powers Jesus exerted to calm, control and correct these victims of disease, and still more of popular ignorance, we do not know. Our knowledge even of healthy psychology is so limited that we can venture but a little way along the pathway of explanation even of our own mental states. How much less can we penetrate the tangled thicket of morbid conditions, and how shall we be able to know the extent to which the calm and masterful spirit of Jesus could balance up the unpoised and wavering intelligence of these unhappy creatures?

But our interest in the works of healing which Christ performed lies always deeper than the particular instances which are recorded. For these cures wrought by him, whether by the dominance of his personality over the minds and bodies of the distressed or by some subtler and ampler power of which we have only the meagerest hints, were, in reality, rather the suggestions of the curative work he is ever doing in the world than the finished and significant examples of physical restoration. It was doubtless worth while that Jesus should cure the few unfortunates who fell under his ministering hands, in this class—popularly known as the demon-possessed. But it is far more important that his continuous and effective healing of perturbed and disordered spirits goes on without intermission under the ministry of the Gospel throughout the world

For this latter service is going on under our very eyes. Lives that have been wayward and vibrant with human impulse are being steadied and adjusted to normal careers by the power of Christ. Minds that have been brutalized and demonized by indulgence in poisonous drink or poisonous passions are redeemed from the thrall of these noxious controls and are given the new value of self-restraint and hope. Families in which petulance, selfishness, anger and unhappiness reigned are under his touch transformed into homes of quietness, serenity and love. Communities that were the haunt of evil spirits and every vile and noisome thing are cleansed and enriched by the presence of the Christ until they are eager to sit at his feet, like the redeemed demoniac of Gadara, and listen to his word.

Here lies the true lesson of the exorcism of Jesus. He knocks at the door of men's hearts, but cannot enter while evil tenants keep possession. That he may be admitted and come to take his rightful place as Lord and Saviour is his desire, and though men in their folly would sometimes fain have him depart, as the ignorant populace of Gadara begged him to do when they lost their swine, he still waits patiently at the gates of cities, at the capitals of empires, at the portals of the human heart, with his words of entreaty, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock."

The Amazing Success of Missions

There are yet a few intellectual provincials that scoff at the missionary enterprise, but their ignorance is so coming to shame them that their dolorous and caustic voices are not often heard. No one but a moral agnostic, a medieval race hater, or a dogmatic religious quack could be cynical about an enterprise that shows such amazing success as does the missionary propaganda. Here are some figures that show the growth of thirteen years:

	1895	1909
Total amount given	$13,620,972	$24,613,075
Given by native churches	1,545,000	4,859,605
(Not included in above.)
Number of missionaries	11,765	21,834
Number of native workers	55,118	92,272
Number of stations	22,631	43,934
Number of actual church members	995,793	2,097,963
Number of adherents	2,770,801	4,866,661
Number of accessions to church in year	63,081	135,141
Number of schools	19,384	29,190
Number of pupils	786,002	1,413,995

The grand total of receipts for the great cause is seen to be a total of nearly $30,000,000, and the number of workers employed to be more than 114,000. In each case the numbers have about doubled in the thirteen years, while the number of stations has increased in a like proportion. The total of actual communicants in the churches has more than doubled, while that of the adherents has fallen but little below the same rate of increase. As the missions grow older and the life of the communities about them is elevated, the number of church members will advance in an increasing ratio over that of adherents. The total number now in the Christian communities in the foreign field now reaches practically 7,000,000.

America Does Not Yet Lead

We are rather boastful of our commercial and financial supremacy in the affairs of the world. We are the richest and most prosperous of the great Christian nations. Last year we made a considerable gain in our church membership, while Britain made practically none. Our vantage point could make us the peace arbiters of the world, but it does not, because we are holden of tradition and commercial interests. We want to be free to defend our financial interests in the face of all comers, so we do not declare that war shall cease on the face of the earth. We give more millions at home than any other people, and our philanthropy is now making some atonement for our commercial ethics. But we do not yet equal Britain in our world-wide interest in philanthropic matters. Our Christianity is yet more provincial than that of the mother country. Perhaps it is because her colonial and trade interests takes her mind across the seas more than do ours. However that is, we gave only about a million and a half more than Britain for missions, and we have almost twice the Protestant population. Our statistics include Canada, and the total is a little over $11,300,000, while Britain's is almost $9,600,000. The British missions provided twice as much on the field as did ours, and they have 9,257 missionaries to our 7,677, or almost three times as many per capita.

The Anglo-Saxon is doing the missionary work. The German societies contributed $1,870,000, the Scandinavian $485,000, the Netherlands $140,000, and the Swiss $63,000. Anglo-Saxondom furnishes nine-tenths of the money, and six-sevenths of the missionaries.

The Philanthropic Side of the Enterprise

Evangelistic statistics may be ever so gratifying, but they do not tell the success of the missionary enterprise by any means. Every mission station is a sort of Christian social settlement in the midst of a pagan community. The home of the missionary is in itself a philanthropic institution. It commends all the virtues of civilization. The missionary accomplishes a good that is worth all the enterprise costs, even though he converted none, in the uplift he gives the community and home life of the unconverted about him. The first and greatest work of missions is the evangelization of the individual, but over and above that the social worth of the work would justify the expenditure.

First, we have to credit missions with some 10,000 neighborhood houses in the homes of the workers. Then there are 400 hospitals and 500 dispensaries, where hundreds of thousands get balm for their pain. There are 30,000 schools where other hundreds of thousands obtain trained minds and where the seeds of a new government and a new civilization are brought to blossom. There are 160 mission presses, on which 400 periodicals are printed and spread far and near and the printed page becomes a living evangel of all things good. From them go not only papers and magazines and tracts and Bibles, but books on every topic that concerns the building of a new and Christian civilization. From these institutions comes the native ministry and teaching force of the morrow, and to these more and more must the missionary look for the development of the enterprise, for through the trained native teacher and pastor the Pentecosts of the future may be confidentially expected to come.

Missionaries have been made the advisors of magistrates and princes. They have established scientific schools and advised in engineering enterprises. There is no good work but that they have set it on foot and made possible its triumphant conclusion by native hands.

Rice Christians

The derisive term, "rice Christians," originated in China, where the morning salutation is not "good morning," but "have you eaten rice?" Rice stands for bread in Chinese nomenclature. It was the cynical misjudgment of the worldly. It saw the missionary feeding the hungry and making Christians of them, and straightway imputed the effect for the cause and pronounced the usual perverse judgment of the cynic. It saw the students taken from among the poor and fed and taught and straightway imputed unworthy motives to the beneficiary instead of noble deeds to the benefactor. Of course every persecution on the modern mission field gives the lie to the taunt. In Uganda, Madagascar, China and in many lesser persecutions the native Christian has proven he is of the same stuff that made martyrs in the Decian persecutions.

Today we have to record most remarkable giving on the part of the native Christians. First, let it be understood that pagan lands are not rich like Christian nations. They are deprived of those modern inventions and that Christian ingeniousness that overthrows ancient custom and dares for new things. Not only are the nations poor but the Christians, as they have in all history, come from the poorer of the people. Wages in mission lands are but from one-fifth to one-fifteenth what they are here. Yet last year the native Christians gave nearly $5,000,000 through our societies alone. This does not include a larger sum that they gave for their own work in their own way. This $5,000,000 would represent at least $30,000,000 in our money, and implies greater giving than our church people at home show.

In Korea the Christians build their own churches and schools. In many fields they now have native churches supporting their own pastors. The Bolenge Christians send out from one in every ten to one in every seven, and other fields are known that do the same. In Japan there is a foreign society with stations in China and Korea.

A Federation of Men's Clubs

In Irving Park, Chicago, is an organization that is full of potential possibilities and prophetic of what might well be the next great movement in the men's clubs of the churches. It is a federation of the eight clubs of the local churches and includes not only the Episcopalians, the English and Swedish Lutherans, as well as the evangelical churches, but even the Catholics. The idea was worked out by Mr. H. W. Hunter of the Disciples' club, and is an example of what Disciple clubs ought to be foremost in doing. It is a practical way to exploit the plea for union.

An example of the effectiveness of such an organization in a social way was given on Lincoln's birthday, when two hundred and thirty-five men sat down to a banquet, their numbers being limited by the size of the room only. They were afterwards addressed by Lawrence Y. Sherman, one of the stalwarts among those who stand for plain speaking and clean acting in politics. The stage of comity is already successfully reached at the end of the first year of their existence. Last summer the federation arranged for three Sunday evening union meetings, one of which was addressed by State's Attorney Wayman, and held in spite of the protests of all the pastors with a single exception. This protest was made because Mr. Wayman had not been considered the best man for the office and had had the support of the saloon keepers in the primary, in which his opponent had had their bitter opposition on account of his activity in trying to close Sunday saloons. Mr. Wayman is attempting to clean out the grafters and the men thought it fair to offer him support and not hold him at arm's length and refuse him the only sympathy that a man on a big job of cleaning up could expect.

Christian Men United Against Graft

Judge MacKenzie Cleland was greatly pleased with the Federation idea as set forth in this organization. He said the saloon crowd simply had the decent voters "bluffed" because they had a strong organization in the "United Societies," and that if the men's clubs in all the churches in the city were so organized, they could "call the bluff" and clean up the city. Right here arises the vital issue. Will federation go beyond comity and advance to the stage of action? In a city like Chicago the great motive and program for action is offered that the leaders in men's club work, all acknowledge, must be afforded if the movement is to be perpetuated. A "Man's Job" will not rest on banquets nor stop with Bible classes. It will use both of these as an approach to a vital issue in which masculine action is demanded. The civic issue is the most vital issue that could be proposed because it concerns the life of every man's neighborhood and challenges the conscience of every church member. Will partisanship or business considerations obstruct this clear pathway to usefulness and clear call of Christian conscience? Will the cry of "keep politics out of the church" prevent the men of the church from taking their Christianity in an effective way into politics? This sort of united action will not take "politics into the church," but it will take the saloon out of politics as the overlord of our civic destinies and inject the civic conscience of an active Christianity into them. It will take partisanship out of city politics; and until we quit settling local civic issues by the party lines of tariff and state politics and other things that divide the clean vote while it leaves the machine united to sweep in and divide the spoils of office, we may expect to have the rule of the machine with its harvest of graft. Let the men's clubs of a city unite on the civic issue as the churches have united on the saloon issue and graft will accompany the saloon on its road to hades.

Roosevelt or Taft

The Chicago Tribune has taken a poll of the Republican and Independent editors of the middle west on three questions. It asked (1) whether they favored Cannon, (2) what they thought of the Aldrich-Payne tariff law, and (3) who they would favor for president if allowed to vote now. Out of some 3,000 replies, the vote against Cannon was five to one, and that against the present tariff law four to one, while Roosevelt was the favorite over Taft by a majority of almost 300. The president received but 1,093 votes out of the 3,000 odd. La Follette received votes in every state, and is third in the poll. Cummins and Pinchot also are in the list, and Hughes is fourth.

If the editors reflect the feeling of their readers, the aggressive wing of the G. O. P. is not inclined to accept the president's manner of carrying out the Roosevelt policies with much confidence. It is not a question of his integrity, but of the efficiency of his plan that they question. Mr. Taft's honesty is not questioned, but it is not difficult to see why those who grew to admire Colonel Roosevelt's strenuous manner of getting things done and his issue with men like Aldrich and Cannon grow restless over Mr. Taft's attempt to use these same instruments of reaction from Rooseveltism. They think they foresee failure for him and thereby a menace to the party.

It has brought the bogey of Roosevelt before many a politician. It may be fairly safely guessed that when the ex-President returns from Africa he will either keep out of the game or take another long trip or, what is more probable, that his none too composed temperament will swing the "big stick," and if he does, you may be assured it will be with a mighty blow for the man he made president. Then there will be a scurrying to get into the camp from some quarters and a dread alarum of war from others. If this happens, the most interesting feature will be to see how the great independent thinking majority will receive Mr. Roosevelt's written enunciations and spoken word after it is deprived of the dignity and prestige given them by the presidency. The mighty force back of his ability to initiate and accomplish things is his egoism. What will be the effect of it upon the thinking mind of the republic when it is unclothed of the robes of office and speaks on public matters with official force, but without official authority?

It is to be hoped the ex-President will studiously keep out of the partisan game. His great powers and prestige should be devoted to things greater than party. After a man is twice president he should be above party and for all, regardless of partisan lines. There is enough of that kind to challenge his attention especially in this age of growing independency.

Baptists and Disciples Drawing Together

It is greatly encouraging to hear from the different churches, Baptist and Disciple, that are working at the problem of unity in their local fields. Within the past few days a number of such communications have reached us, bearing witness to the fact that the interest in this problem as practical and pressing grows continually. In some instances the two churches, Baptist and Disciples, are struggling to maintain themselves in a community where one united church could far better serve the needs of the town. In other instances one or the other is declining in strength, and the question is asked whether it would not be better for the Disciples to unite with the Baptists, or the Baptists with the Disciples, than for either to die. We believe that in every such instance, wisdom and patience would work out a plan of union that would conserve every element of testimony, both of Baptists and of Disciples, and would result in an organization of far greater strength and aggressiveness than either one could become alone. The example of several churches of this type, of which, perhaps, the Memorial Church of Christ in Chicago is a fair example, makes clear the utility of the plan. At the same time it is well to keep in mind the need of constructive and patient work in bringing about such union. It ought never to be forced or hurried. It is better to safeguard every point before completing the plan, in order that no one may feel that undue advantage has been gained by either group in the union. It would be better to wait until sentiment has taken firmer hold than to rush with undue haste into the enterprise. We give this counsel chiefly to avoid the possibility of reaction after such a union has taken place. We believe that such efforts will be increasingly the order of the day, and that Baptists and Disciples as two bodies of Christians will come together sooner than might at first seem likely. They will unite, however, at first as individual churches and without formal platform declarations or resolutions. We hope our people will promote such efforts wherever they seem practicable.

The Dollar the Test?

Mr. Richard T. Crane, a wealthy manufacturer of Chicago, has had a good deal to say of late regarding the uselessness of collegiate education. He thinks the colleges and universities of the country are unnecessary and consume an immense amount of money that might be spent in a more serviceable way. His clinching argument is found in the question, Why, if two thousand dollar professors are able to educate young men so that they can earn from five to ten thousand dollars a year, the professors themselves do not get out and earn that amount of money? There could be no more appropriate commentary upon the type of mind Mr. Crane represents than this same question. It reduces the values of life to the dollar basis. It is one of the glories of the ministry and of the teaching profession that they include large numbers of men who have proved their ability to earn far more money than these vocations can yield them, but are unwilling to put their lives upon the level of financial consideration. This does not mean that they condemn the earning of money, but they regard it as only one of the desirable things to which life may be devoted. It is said that Mr. Crane employs only non-college men in his elevator works. This fact makes all the more striking the steady increase in the number of commercial and industrial plants in which employment is given only to men who have received collegiate education. It is worth while to have the bald materialism of Mr. Crane's type presented now and then, if only to enforce the lessons regarding the value of the higher life which it makes so plain.

The Mayor and the Federal Council

The Church Federation Council of Chicago and vicinity has proved itself a useful organization during the past year. It has held several union meetings of the Ministerial Associations to discuss important questions, such as the war against the saloon, and the white slave traffic; it has undertaken important investigations regarding several questions of moment, among them advisable modifications in the present law requiring a fixed amount of temperance instruction in the public schools; the need of municipal lodging houses for women, and the maintenance of a Protestant representative at the city Juvenile Court. The Federal Council has supported Mr. E. R. Colby in this latter position during the past six months, with the best possible results. It is probable that in the near future a secretary will be secured who can give all his time to the work of the Council in Chicago and vicinity. As the result of a union conference of ministers and others called by the Federal Council to consider the problem of the white slave traffic, the "red light" district in Chicago, and other related themes, an important series of resolutions was passed which has already produced interesting results in the activity of the police and the interest secured at the City Hall. One of the resolutions called for the appointment by the Mayor of a commission to report upon the social evil in Chicago with such recommendations as seemed advisable. The Mayor has consented to appoint such a commission, and has manifested marked interest in the effort. There is a work of large significance before the Federal Council if it can secure proper executive force.

Dr. Gates' Criticism

Professor Gates devotes his department, "The Religious Outlook," this week to a frank criticism of one of The Christian Century's recent articles on baptism. The sum of our contention in that article was that the baptism question is to be settled, if at all, on a basis of love, not on a basis of dogma.

We pointed out the futility of continuing the controversy; the argument is in a deadlock and has been so for many years. It is our conviction that to make Christian union wait until this dogmatic deadlock is broken is simply wicked, and a dishonor to Christ.

Somebody must take the initiative to reunite the broken church. So long as the immersionists believe that the Bible commands the church to practice immersion only, they are in conscience bound to sanction the practice of nothing else. No Christian union initiative can spring from them.

With the optionist the case stands differently. He does not believe the Bible commands sprinkling or pouring. The practice of neither of these forms is a matter of positive conscience to him or his church. It is a matter of liberty. On the other hand, he has no conscience against the practice of immersion. As a matter of fact, he administers baptism by immersion whenever the candidate requests it.

It is, therefore, in the power of the optionist to take the initiative in bringing God's people together, by leaving off the practice of sprinkling and pouring and continuing only the practice of immersion. This, of course, the optionist will not dream of doing unless he is urged from within by a strong sense that denominationalism is a sin and that every possible concession (not involving his duty), should be made to bring about the union of Christ's people.

As an illustration of the principle of love upon which the optionist should act, we referred to the eighth chapter of I Corinthians, in which Paul counselled the brother who could eat idol-meat without violating his conscience, to forego his freedom in this particular for the sake of the brother whose conscience did not allow him this freedom. We by no means assumed that the Corinthian case was parallel in all respects, or in many respects to the Christian union case. Therefore we regard Dr. Gates' analysis of the Corinthian case as irrelevant, and we need waste no words with him in those details.

Our only use of the narrative was to illustrate the principle of love in solving differences involving the welfare of other persons or the interests of the Kingdom of God.

Instead of proposing to solve the baptism question on the basis of the "weak brother's" conscience on immersion, as Dr. Gates interprets us, our proposal was to solve it by the free brother's strong conscience on Christian union.

The crux of the whole problem is in the awakening of this strong conscience on Christian union in the souls of Christian people. What Mr. Rice says on this point on another page of this paper is the essential truth. And this is where the Disciples of Christ come in.

Dr. Gates objects to our use of the Corinthian case, chiefly because it puts him and the Disciples in the positon of the "weak brother"—a position he naturally dislikes to occupy, and especially when from this positon he is asked to make an appeal for considerate treatment from his optionist neighbor simply because he has a "weak conscience"! The Pauline plea, he says, "was never made to be put into the mouth of the weak brother to be used on his own behalf. It always sounds better and is more effective when it is used as a plea on behalf of others."

This discloses how completely Dr. Gates has missed The Christian Century's point and the Disciples' essential plea. Our main purpose in writing the article in question was to say that the Disciples, as such, are not partisans in the baptism controversy. They stand outside of the dogmatic dispute and plead for the disputants to settle their differences on the basis of love.

The baptism controversy is not our controversy. It was in existence before the Disciples came upon the field. The Disciples were born to plead for Christian union and to point out an undogmatic basis on which it could be achieved. The baptism dogma is in the way of Christian union. The Disciples propose to get it out of the way—but not by becoming a party to the old controversy. Their way of solving it is not as the Baptists have been trying to solve it—by arguing that the Scripture demands immersion and nothing else. There are two sides to that argument—two such strong sides that through the last one hundred years no signs of victory are in sight for either side and the controversy is now in a deadlock.

The Disciples are not Baptists. They are not champions of the Baptist argument. As a people the Disciples are neither immersionists nor optionists. They are Christians only. They stand outside of all the contentions over creeds, as Paul stood outside the controversy over eating idol-meat, and, like Paul, they say, "Brethren, we beseech you let there be no divisions among you!" Let love reign. Let him whose conscience is free consider him whose conscience is under obligations, and avoid those things which make schism between you.

It is because we, the Disciples, talk this way to the Christian world that we speak of "our plea." We are not trying to impose our dogma, our creed, our particular understanding of the Bible upon the church of God. Nor are we begging for especial consideration for our dogmas at the hands of those who do not believe them. We are content for every man to understand the Bible as his mind compels him to understand it.

Only we desire to be united with him in love and in the service of Christ. And it is the faith that this wide liberty in the field of doctrine is compatible with the unity that love brings that distinguishes the Disciples from other Christian bodies.

As to the dilemma with which Dr. Gates concludes his article we have only this to say, that if the Disciples, facing such a choice, decide to hold fast their union conscience they will have yet stronger and more consistent reasons for practicing immersion only. If any one can show how the Disciples' adoption of the optional procedure in baptism will foster Christian union, we are sure our readers will be glad to hear from him.

For The Christian Century we may say that in our judgment the practice by the Disciples of anything save immersion would mean the surrender of one of the strategic points of our unique opportunity.

Jesus the Life of World

If some philosopher or scientist would construct a satisfactory definition of life, the discussion of the relation of Jesus to the life of the world might be made more profitable than it is likely to be in many of the prayer meetings. It is doubtless vain to ask for such a definition. The philosophers and scientists would gladly furnish it if they could: they need it as much as we do. But even without the definition, we can try to avoid the vagueness that so often characterizes discussions of this sort. We can quit using phrases inherited from mysticism and meaningless to us.

The statement that man is what he eats will give us a start. The body is a part of the material world. Its vigor depends upon the food that it receives. If food is not supplied to it, it wastes away and dies. The child cannot grow unless it is fed with wholesome food. Disease and hunger flourish together. Physically, man is what he eats. May it not be said that he is mentally what he eats? The mind grows by what it feeds upon just as the body does. The boy who hears nothing but the senseless talk of loafers has a poor chance of developing the mind of a statesman or a master of business. The girl who said it was her ambition to be as good and wise as her grandmother, a woman of unusual moral and intellectual power, did not get her ideal from the small talk of women whose highest aim is to win the prize at a card party and who do not object to cheating a little in order towin.

Speaking in the fashion of orientals, Jesus said, "I am the bread of life, he that cometh to me shall not hunger, and he that believeth on me shall never thirst." To take his words about bread literally would be to pervert them. But to understand them in a figurative sense is not to weaken their force. For complete living men need the grace and truth manifested in Jesus. When these are brought to the mind of the child through the example and instruction of those upon whom he depends it is possiple for him to grow to the stature of a full man and escape the vices that weaken and deform character. The same grace and truth restore to health the spiritually sick. To be one with Jesus in love and service is to have the truest life.

The lower forms of life have a very limited environment. The higher the form, the wider is the enviroment. Man is living in a world which his animal friends share only in part. The most intelligent dog and horse are shut out from the intellectual experiences of their master. Then there are differences among men. Some men are almost as poor in intellectual and emotional equipment as the lower animals. They live almost wholly in the present and on the level of sensation. They have neither memory nor hope of sufficient strength and richness to ennoble life. Over against these are those whose thought sems to have no bounds of time or space. For them there is meaning in everything. A trifling incident, like the falling of an apple, is seen to be an illustration of a law that operates in every part of the universe. We may think of Jesus as giving life to men by bringing them into a wider environment. The spiritual world is the world of widest meaning. The life of sin is the narrow life. It receives help from too few sources and they are of the wrong kind. "Lord, thou hast been our dwelling place," cried the psalmist, and he felt that all was well. God is the home of the soul. Its life is from God. In finding God it reaches the extreme limits of possible experience.

The life that comes from Jesus belongs to the present. The teachings of the past and the hope of the future are brought into the present, but the Christian life is neither a memory nor a dream. When Christ gives life, men cease to fight the battles of the past. They have no interest in defending the church against the attacks of men that have been dead for years and whose ways of thinking have passed from the memory of all the living. They do not try to keep up old ecclesiastical feuds. They seek for present causes of division, not for the ancient causes. They see no sense in refusing to have fellowship with a man because their grandfathers and his grandfather could not agree. If there is present agreement, they are glad to find a co-worker. They defend their faith by their works. If the church does its duty, it will have power. If it neglects its duty, all the logic and eloquence in the world cannot save it from weakness and disgrace. Pioneers days are gone. The city with its problems is here. There is not much of the life of Jesus in a church that remains igorant of the change.

Biblical Problems

By Professor Willett

Some editors claim there are but two cases of Holy Spirit baptism—Pentecost and the house of Cornelius. This leaves Paul out. There is something wrong with this theory. Is not the Holy Spirit baptism, symbolized by water baptism, continued throughout the Christian dispensation? Is miraculous power essential to the baptism? S. C. P.

The various theories regarding the baptism of the Holy Spirit derived, of course, from John the Baptist's use of the phrase, "He shall baptize you in the Holy Spirit and in fire" (Matt. 3:1), and the words of John 1:33, "The same is he that baptizeth in the Holy Spirit." These statements of John are quoted in Acts 1:5 and are applied by Peter to Jesus also in Acts 11:16. The significance of the expression does not lie in any miraculous result incident to the baptism of the Holy Spirit. The expression refers to the spiritual renewal which is wrought by entrance upon the new life with Christ as over against a mere external rite such as John administered, which can, at the best, be only the outward sign of an inward grace. The apostles were not distinguished from other Christians by the "baptism of the Holy Spirit," for all alike who are obedient to the Master and submit themselves to his leadership may claim this divine gift. The attempt to distinguish between the Spirit's indwelling and the baptism of the Spirit is misleading and unfounded. The one is merely a stronger expression than the other, denoting the completeness of spiritual possession, the overwhelming character of the new relationship. In neither case do the expressions imply miraculous gifts, though miracles were sometimes wrought. Any follower of Jesus may receive as fully as he will the gift of the Spirit. Whether the degree to which one is willing to pay the price of this holy relationship would entitle him to use the strong term "baptism of the Spirit" in reference to himself would depend upon the fullness of his surrender to the spiritual mastery of the Lord.

Why is Sampson considered as being one of the judges of Israel? His life, so far as it is recorded, seems to have been only a series of selfish exploits. Yet the statement of Judges 16:31, "He judged Israel twenty years." H. O. K. Chicago.

The judges of Israel were the men who, in the various localities of Palestine, arose as local champions and deliverers of their people during the period between the occupation of Canaan and the establishment of the monarchy. Of these men the least responsible seems to have been Sampson. The record of his life is chiefly interesting as an example of the personal prowess and exploits which the Hebrews loved to recall at the expense of their enemies. Far from being an exemplary character, Sampson appears to have been a lawless, vagrant, wilful and wholly undependable man, incapable of leadership, and with only his unusual physical strength to recommend him to any consideration. So far as we are able to learn, he never ruled anybody, not even himself. It is only in the general sense of the time during which he performed his exploits through the region of Dan and Philistia that it can be said he "judged Israel twenty years."

Temperance Notes

Ontario is fast becoming local option territory. Almost one-half her municipalities are now "dry." The number of licenses has decreased from 6,185 to 2,432 in the past thirty years. In the recent election, seventy-seven places gave a clear majority for prohibition, while but nineteen went the other way. Of these seventy-seven, only nineteen obtained what the majority favored, because the Canadian law requires a three-fourths vote. Attempts to go from "dry" back to "wet" were successful in only two places out of ten that tried it.

Here is the advance made by "The Great Reform" in 1909: Four states became prohibition territory; four states adopted local-option laws; twenty-eight states adopted advanced temperance legislation. Thus thirty-six states made progress. Then 200 counties voted "dry" and thousands of townships and small cities did the same, their host was almost too great to name, and many cities of from 5,000 to 70,000 did the same.

For 1910 some great things are in store. It will be a testing year and the shout has gone up that "the reaction has set in." Some of the high-tides may recede, but depend upon it, the mighty currents will sweep right on. Florida and Arkansas, and perhaps Virginia, may be counted upon as joining the prohibition column. Michigan and the great Northwest will whiten a large part of the map, and other hundreds of counties and municipalities will join the honor roll.

Look at this picture and then at that. It is the story of two counties in southern Illinois. Edwards County is "dry," and Alexander County is "wet." The "dry" county has one-half more children in school per capita and collects less than one-half as much tax per capita. Her percentage of jail inmates for a year was but one to the other's thirty-four. She has no one in either the state penitentiary or reform schools, while the other had one of the largest populations in those places on record. Her insane and poverty-stricken number but two-thirds as large for the population. Edwards county has been prohibition territory for years, while Alexander is notoriously saloon. But for local option, Edwards would have had saloons also—would Bro. Chafin have it so!

The City Fuel Company, of Chicago, one of its great concerns, gave an annual dinner to all its employes. This year no liquors were allowed, and the President, Mr. F. S. Peabody, announced that hereafter no drinking man would be employed by the company, for the reason that "a brain befuddled by intoxicants is less valuable than one kept clear."

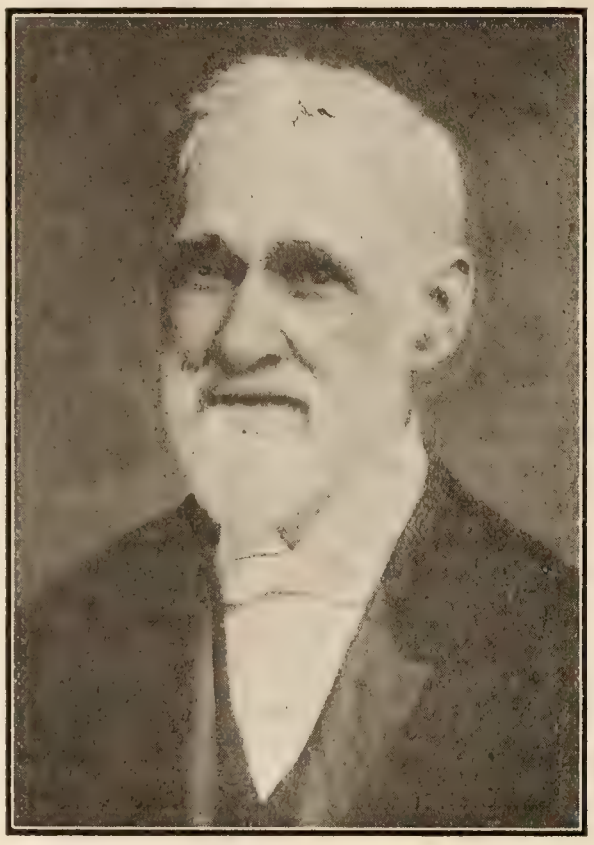
The horrible tale of Kansas—ruined by prohibition; fewer insane patients than the city of Chicago alone; four-fifths of her counties without an insane person in them; twenty-eight counties have no inmates for their poor-farms; twenty-one counties sent no convicts to the penitentiary last year.

Chicago has 7,200 saloons. They are assessed an average of $3.06 each. They are great business assets to the city. (?)

The Record-Herald of Chicago recently contained a full-page advertisement for which $500 was paid, and which was devoted, not to exploiting a certain brand of grog, but to a "Solution of the Drink Problem." It recounted various defeats of the "dry's" and fills the center of the page with a synopsis of an opinion given by a Dr. Bowditch (in 1870) which concludes that alcohol is not always a poison and that all drinking is not evil. A careful reading discloses the fact that the Doctor finds exceptions to what is acknowledged to be a very bad rule. Of course later investigators fail to find an exception even.

L. L. Carpenter

Pastor Emeritus, Wabash, Indiana—Premier Church Dedicator of the Nation



By Rev. E. F. Daugherty

Pastor, Wabash, Indiana.

[EDITOR'S NOTE.—The telegram announcing the death of the beloved L. L. Carpenter came to The Christian Century last week just as the press wheels were ready to turn. We were able to insert the bare news without comment. His pastor, Mr. Daugherty, has at our request given us a characterization of this great-souled leader of the Disciples. The funeral service called out a prodigous throng of citizens, many coming from distant cities to Wabash to participate in the funeral exercises. Four sons and two sons-in-law were active pall-bearers. Honorary pall-bearers included representatives of Wabash ministers, of the deacons and elders' boards of the Wabash church, of the churches at large, of the State Missionary Board, and of the Republican party. A peculiarly touching tribute was that paid by Rev. Dr. Charles Little, for thirty-seven years a Presbyterian pastor in Wabash, and who with Father Carpenter and Rev. Dr. W. J. Vigus, a Methodist, had entered into a compact to speak at the funeral of the ones first to be taken away. Dr. Vigus fell asleep seven days before his friend, Mr. Carpenter, leaving Dr. Little to speak for both. The hymns sung were James Montgomery's "Servant of God, Well Done!" "Asleep in Jesus" and "Rock of Ages." Mrs Daugherty, wife of the pastor, sang "There's a Beautiful Land on High." Rev. C. H. DeVoe of Peru, Ind., and Rev. Elmer Ward Cole, of Huntington, Ind., assisted the pastor in the service. Mr. Daugherty's address treated the deceased as the most distinguished citizen of Wabash, and a leader among the Disciples. He noted that Father Carpenter was possessed of the genius of appreciation, the saving grace of humor, the fadeless charm of a youthful spirit, the mind of the Master he served, and that he moved in the contagious atmosphere of optimism. Let his pastor speak to the multitude of readers of The Christian Century whose churches and whose personal lives have been blessed by the benedicttion of this man of God.]

Three things throughout his long life were the passion and pride of Leewell Lee Carpenter; he called them his "specialties," and they were: (1) Intense loyalty to Christ and his church; (2) great devotion and love for his family; (3) his desire to square all his debts. His own self-analysis made these the three pre-eminent things in his career and any thoughtful appreciation of the man must have recognition for his "specialties."

In loyalty to Christ and his church his record is of surpassing interest. On August 14, 1853, when twenty-one years of age he "put on Christ," being baptized by Elder A. B. Green, at Norton, Ohio, and waged until his life campaign was done, a faith fight of royal quality. His schooling was obtained in Sharon Academy, Mt. Union Seminary and Bethany College. At the latter place he was a student under Bishop Alex Campbell, whom he enthusiastically believed to have been the most masterful intellect in America. While elected treasurer of his home county in Ohio, Fulton, he yet preached every Sunday during his four years of civic service and held many meetings, baptizing a thousand converts in the county and organizing seven churches during those four years. In 1868 he came to Wabash, Ind., as pastor of the congregation there, until chosen state evangelist of Indiana, in which position he became largely responsible for the present strength of the Church of Christ in the Hoosier State. He had helped organize the Sunday-school Association of Ohio and was its first president, as he was first president of the Indiana Association. He helped organize the F. C. M. S., and was its first life member, and was either a director or life member of every missionary organization of the Christian church. He was one of the organizers of Bethany Assembly and through many years until his death, its president, and there became endeared as "Father Carpenter" to all the loyal hosts of the Bethany Assembly family. The last quarter century of his life was devoted to church dedications and during those years through all the states he traveled in the consecrating of 759 church buildings, whereon he raised above two million dollars in the dedicatory services. His chief reward in all the work of all those years he regarded as "the riches of Christ's grace" of which he loved to talk and press upon men's acceptance. The Wabash congregation in 1905 made him their pastor emeritus in recognition of his years and honors and faithful devotion to the local church as well as to the brotherhood.

In devotion to and love for his family he was a master Christian. His father was a York state native, Richard Carpenter, a soldier of the war of 1812, and his mother was Sarah Ritchey, a Pennsylvanian. To their union eight children were born, Leewell Lee being the seventh son. He was married May 16, 1861 to Mary Eve Funk, and his genial family pride found frequent expression in the words "no preacher was ever more fortunate in the selection of a wife." Seven children were born to them, the youngest dying in infancy. William Hodsell, the eldest, with Errett L. being hardware merchants in Wabash; Arthur Bliss, the photographer of Wabash; Frank Garfield, prosecuting attorney of Wabash C. C.; Rhea Elizabeth Hoke, wife of Dr. George Hoke, of Oxford University, and Mary Inez Blue, wife of George Blue, Kansas City, Mo. He was happiest, most genial and interesting when in the midst of his children and a marvel of devotion to his grandchildren, to whom when at home he invariably made daily visits, for his was the child spirit in kindliness, and children loved him as a comrade. He was righteously proud of his children, and with good reason, for they came up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord and are individually a credit to their father. It was easy and natural for friends and neighbors to call him "Father Carpenter," for so he was called in his family and his fatherly interest embraced all.

In the matter of paying his debts, his third specialty, had its basis in the apostolic injunction "Owe no man anything save to love one another." His conscience was almost over-developed on the matter of being straight financially; but in the larger reach he considered himself "debtor to all men" in spreading the love message of the Christ his Lord and companion. So, his energy, vitality and activity were tremendous in passing on to others the riches that he had received in Christian experience. He called himself "an optimist of optimists," and with a smile often reiterated his faith that "every day in the world's life is a better day than the one before."

If despair ever had a place in his heart, his soul was too full of smiles for the world to see it. He had the saving grace of humor; with his smiles and his jokes he has cleared many a sky and lightened many a heart. Even against matters of conduct and principle which his stalwart, righteous soul found it necessary to oppose, his opposition, or criticism was invariably rational and kindly, though none the less incisive and final. To know him was to love him, because he aroused in every one he met the impression that he himself was a lover of men. The pride of his latter years was in growing old gracefully. Querulous never; patient always; the "golden days" of his faith were not in the past but in the future, for his face had the forward, upward, onward inclination which befits the normal, healthful Christian, and such a Christian—whether measured by theological or practical tests—was L. L. Carpenter. The delights unto which he looked forward in the larger, better home of the redeemed in heaven, were just as real to him as those of his own beautiful earthly home—of which he delighted to talk. The world is very largely better for having known him, in the simple, steadfast, dependable, fighting quality of his faith.

The Heavenly Home

Celesta Ball May.

"In my Father's Universe are many worlds; if it had not been so I would have told you.

I gaze with awe far in the starry sky,
And wonder which of all will be my home.
Will it be one of those the nearest by,
Or one far off within the vaulted dome,
Where I shall find the home prepared for me,
When at the rosy dawn of some sweet day,
After a night of pain that sets it free,
My weary soul will gladly wing its way?

O this I know that it will please me quite;
For Christ, Himself, is fitting it for me.
He knows the love and beauty that I need
To mold the soul to glory; and will speed
The plans He long ago had laid; and see
That each redeemed one is homed aright.

Christ and the Twentieth Century

"His name shall be called Wonderful"

By Rev. Bruce Brown

These words were written as long before the birth of Christ as it has been since William of Normandy landed on the shores of England and yet no better nor briefer description of this great life and character could be written to-day. A carpenter's son has become the central character in history. One who never raised a hand in his own defense has become the leader of the greatest army the world has ever known. Compared with the man of Nazareth no other man is wonderful.

There is a tangible reality in religion. The man who is distracted by the endless conflict of contending theological systems often loses sight of this fact. He hears ministers of rival denominations belaboring each other with arguments drawn from the same Bible, and history tells him of an unending strife. The Liberal denies what the Orthodox declares to be eternal verities and the integrity of the Bible itself is assailed within the bosom of the church. The tenets of the Christian religion are held by only a small portion of earth's unnumbered millions and the casual observer of ecclesiastical evolution does not hesitate to declare that there are as many religions as there are individuals and that there is not one immutable element common to all. But the man who will make a careful examination will discover that there is at least one reality that is treasured by Catholic and Protestant, Unitarian and Trinitarian, Baptist and Paedobaptist, and that reality, changeless and tangible, is the peerless character of the Son of Man. He monopolized the name "Wonderful" by his singular method of teaching the truth by living the truth and in my humble judgment the Christ life is the sum total of all religious thought and action and ordinances. There is nothing important in church or creed or ritualism except that which ministers to this end.

The character of Christ is wonderful in its opposites. Angels were the heralds of his nativity but humble shepherds were his attendants. The throne of David was his heritage but a manger was his cradle. He was the King of Kings yet he took upon himself the form of a servant. All power in heaven and earth was his yet he washed his disciples' feet. He was "Almighty God" and yet "Unto us a child is born." He was the "Everlasting Father" and yet "Unto us a son is given." He is as the "Lord of Hosts" and the "Prince of Peace." He was the Creator yet he had not where to lay his head. He was the Son of God and the Son of Man. He was rich yet for our sakes he became poor. As a sheep he was dumb before his shearers yet he spake as never man spake. He had twelve legions of angels waiting for his call yet he was despised and forsaken. He was the Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the Valley and a root out of dry ground. He was the fairest of ten thousand, the one altogether lovely and yet it was said, "When we shall see him there is no beauty that we shall desire him." It is small reason for wonder that he was rejected by men who could not understand all these differing prophecies. He was misunderstood two thousand years ago and his wonderful character is not understood today.

Jesus was the world's most wonderful preacher. His pulpit was a mountain side. He sat as he spoke. With no art of the elocutionist he simply "opened his mouth and taught them." Yet that sermon, fifteen minutes in length, has become the theme of the ages. Every syllable is familiar to all the little children of Christendom and yet it is the constant study of the greatest living thinkers. A thousand times a thousand men are trying to preach that sermon today. Christ made all nature vocal with his simple and yet transcendental message. Every stone reminds us that he is the Rock of Ages, and every flower that he is the Rose of Sharon, every stream that he is the Fountain of Life, every gem that he is the Pearl of greatest Price, every star that he is the bright and morning Star, every Sun that he is the Light of the World, every leaf that he is the Bread of Life, every path that he is the Way of Life, every building that he is the Chief Cornerstone, every pain that he is the great Physician and every weary hour that he will give us rest. It is a very remarkable fact that the denominations are not at war over what Jesus taught but over what he did not teach, in other words they are not divided over what is in the teachings of Jesus but over what is not in his teachings. Probably no question has been discussed more bitterly than the mode of baptism and this will serve as an illustration of this truth. The churches are divided over the forms not found in the Bible, but a burial and a resurrection is accepted by all. What is true in this case is true in all others.

The wisdom of Christ is the wonder of the world. He discussed the most abstruse problems and answered the most difficult questions yet he was the only man who never expressed a doubt. He lived in the twilight of two thousand years ago yet he is the one authority in ethics and religion in the light of the twentieth century. He was the only man who never made a mistake and never expressed a regret on account of his own conduct. The parables he spoke are the best description of modern conduct there is in existence. The story of the Prodigal Son is the tragic history of many a life in every great city at this hour. The parable of the mustard seed is an accurate description of the growth of the kingdom of heaven as we see it in the busy life of our great cities and in the darkness of far away lands. The parable of the sower is a perfect picture of every church service.

Christ was most wonderful in his plans. He proposed to found a universal kingdom without money, armies, influence, territory or statesmanship. His plans were so wise that his kingdom has endured while the mightiest monarchies of his time have disappeared. For his cabinet he passed by men of wealth and honor and education and selected a few poor and friendless fishermen because they had pure hearts. He proposed to free all mankind, not by armies or legislation, but by preaching the truth.

Christ is most wonderful in his influence. In his honor the Sabbath was changed and with him time began anew. The dream of every artist has been to paint his face and the noblest architecture of the world has been dedicated to his name. He glorified the cross, the emblem of shame and it now appears either in single or double form in the center of every door in every home. The untutored Nazarene has become the center of all literature. If the name of the toiling carpenter were cut from your public library ninety per cent of the books would be mutilated. What the armies of the greatest nations have failed to do he has accomplished by the love and hope of his glorious message. The mightiest problems that confront us today must be solved by his influence. Labor and capital can never be reconciled by law. The day is dawning when they will meet as brothers through the influence of his teaching. Better than single tax is the simple honesty of his gospel. Reciprocity is only a foretaste of the brotherhood of man. The hope of a better day is centered in the one who lived in a day long since gone. The need of the twentieth century is a message told by a crucified Jew.

Heroic Giving Required by the Great Task

By Ira L. Parvin.

Man has ever prided himself on this conquest of nature. He has gone into the jungle where the deadly cobra rears his hooded head and the man-eating tiger waits his prey and brings them forth as trophies of his power. He has wrestled from earth her richest treasures and from the soil her choicest fruitage. He has redeemed the arid waste and literally made the solitary places glad and the desert to rejoice and blossom as a rose. He has harnessed the forces of nature and made them bear his burdens. But there is one task not yet accomplished. He has conquered nature, but not human nature. He has tamed the beast of the jungle, but not the man of the jungle. He has redeemed the barren soil, but not the burdened soul. Yet this is the greatest task to which he has been called. To it he has been assigned in a supremely special way. In it he is permitted to join hands with God in recreating God's greatest creature.

Startling must have been the declaration of Jesus to a handful of disciples from the humblest walks of life that they were to conquer all the world for His kingdom. Beside such a task the labors of Hercules were child's play. Yet they did not question, they went. History has nothing more thrilling and heroic than Paul's determination to plant the cross of Christ upon the seven hills of proud, idolatrous Rome and take for Him the mightiest empire the world has ever known. This is a chance to do big things. A man of giant mind takes his pencil and a map of the United States and outlines a plan whereby he will be able to control the markets of the entire country for some particular commodity such as oil, copper, steel or meat; and the world exclaims: "What a great man!" But our work has no national boundary lines; it is a world-enterprise. It is to turn countless millions from their customs, traditions and idols to the living and true God. Archimedes said that if he had a fulcrum and a lever long enough he could raise the world. Our lever is the gospel; the fulcrum is the cross; and God expects us to raise the world in this generation. God has plenty of time; he works through the centuries. But we have not; if we are to have a part in this great work, we must take it now or never.

This stupendous task can never be done except by giving what is in some degree commensurate to the task. In the past our offerings as a people have been pitifully, shamefully small. The three cents per month that we average makes our efforts appear childish. In the light of this it is difficult to think that we really believe what we profess. Imagine the impression on the heathen if our missionaries should tell them that God so loved them that He gave His only begotten son that they might be saved; that the Son so loved them He gave his life for them; and that we, his representatives, so loved them that we give the enormous sum of thirty-five cents each per year for the same purpose. On a dry summer day when the garden is scorched and dying, we take a sprinkler and try to revive it with a few quarts of water; but the thirsty earth drinks it up almost before it has fallen. Soon a great cloud spreads over the sky, the windows of heaven are opened and the earth is drenched with a torrent of rain and the garden is saved. That is the difference in the way man and God give the water of life. If we expect to draw all men unto Him we too must be lifted in sacrifice. When the two disciples went into the village to get the young colt and the owners started to refuse, they said: "The Lord hath need of him" and without a question further, the owners let it go. That should be the last word—The Lord hath need.

The Religious Outlook

By Dr. Errett Gates

"The Baptismal Deadlock"

I find it increasingly difficult to agree with The Christian Century's settlement of the "baptismal deadlock" on the ground of a "weak brother's conscience." At first it looked like a hopeful solution; but the more I tried to justify the position the less was I able to do so.

I began to dislike occupying the position of the "weak brother"; I found no other reason for claiming the considerate treatment of my pedobaptist neighbor than that I had a "weak conscience." Then, too, it did not seem to me to be a correct description of the "baptismal conscience" of the Disciples. If anything is clear in reading the history of religious thought and controversy among the Disciples it is that they have not a weak but a strong baptismal conscience—one which they have fortified not merely behind the argument of New Testament grammar and lexicon, but of New Testament authority.

Reflects Upon the Disciples.

When I began to analyze the nature of the original weak conscience case of the apostle Paul I was less and less pleased with the position in which it placed the Disciples. Those who possessed the weak conscience were clearly the ill-informed, unspiritual and unfree; they had scarcely cracked the shell of their heathenism. They still regarded idols, which they once worshipped in fear, as possessing a real existence and as endowed with the power to help or hurt them. Paul and those whom he counseled to forego their liberty to eat meat offered to idols, had risen above the weakness of respect for them, and evidently expected those who were still weak to rise above their weakness, into the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free. Paul as much as says to them: It is unfortunate that you have such a conscience; as Christians you have no business with it; but since you have it, we must make the best of it, lest you fall into a worse estate.

What the weak were needing was more instruction, to deliver them from the surviving fear of pagan idols. As for Paul and the others, they knew that an idol was nothing, and that there was but one God; and they had learned that what they ate made them neither better nor worse in the sight of God. Not so the brother with a weak conscience.

It is clear, therefore, that Paul looked upon this weakness of conscience as a temporary, passing stage in the religious development of a pagan. It was not a permanent but a transitional conscience. He was anxious to restrict it through considerate treatment, and not extend it through needless excitement. Until it was outgrown liberty should wait upon love. Paul never contemplated the universalizing of the weak conscience.

But the weak brother did not look upon his conscience as weak. To him it was very real and very strong. It would be more proper to call his conscience a strong conscience on a weak subject, rather than a weak conscience. And he was not the one that pleaded the principle on his own behalf. To have done so he must have shared the higher knowledge of the apostle, and that would have been the transcending of his weakness.

Anti-Missionary and Anti-Organ Conscience.

As a matter of fact the principle of a weak conscience never has worked as a peace program. It did not work in Paul's time. The strong never have borne with the infirmities of an immature and weak religious culture for a longer time than was necessary to overcome it with instruction. The principle of edification is as binding as the principle of forbearance. It failed in the organ and missionary society controversies among the Disciples. If the Disciples as a whole had listened to the argument of a weak conscience they would now be pitching their tunes with a tuning fork, and carrying on missionary work without a missionary society. On this principle the slowest is able to set the pace for the fastest, and the enslaved fix the bounds of liberty for the emancipated.

As a consequence it has chiefly been used as a check to progress, and as the last argument of an expiring cause.

When the anti-organ and the anti-missionary party among the Disciples failed to win support on the ground of their appeal to the precepts and precedents of Scripture, they turned at last to the argument of a weak conscience. The argument was never made to be put into the mouth of the weak brother to be used on his own behalf. It betrays too much self-consciousness. It always sounds better and is more effective when it is used as a plea on behalf of others. When the weak conscience knows itself to be weak, it already knows too much to defend itself.

The possession of a conscience is never in itself a reason for holding it. Conscience can not be dealt with as reason, but only as result. The reason is not in the having of the conscience but in the conditions or causes that have produced it. A conscience may be either rational or irrational, pagan or Christian, benighted or illuminated. We come to have respect for an English title, or a literary degree, or a hornet's nest, as such, only after we have ascertained what is back of it, or how it was obtained, or what it is filled with.

The Abandonment, Not Adoption, of a Course.

Another reason why the Pauline principle does not apply to the "baptismal deadlock" is because it was not and can not be used as a reason for the adoption of a course of action, but only for the abandonment of one. Paul did not set up the brother with a weak conscience on idol-meat as an example for imitation; he was more of a warning. Paul never dreamed of fastening the superstitious fear of idols upon the Corinthians. The spiritual liberty of those who could eat meat or refrain from eating without injury to the conscience, was a far more desirable condition in Paul's estimation. The utmost that Paul could be made to declare with reference to the "baptismal deadlock" would be: Wherefore if sprinkling causeth my brother to stumble, I will sprinkle no water for evermore, that I cause not my brother to stumble." This attitude, however, would not obligate him to go on to the practice of immersion, which would be just the weakness to be avoided and overcome.

Then again, as applied to the immersionist position, the principle overreaches, is turned against it. Paul represents the man with the meat-conscience as "perishing" when he sees one having knowledge sitting at meat in the idol's temple. Has an immersionist ever lost his soul when he has seen a baby sprinkled? Is he immediately seized with a passion to have all of his own children sprinkled? If anything he is strengthened in his opposition to it. But the man with the "weak conscience" in the Corinthian church was weakened in his opposition to idolatry. If sprinkling does not hurt the immersionist the principle has no application to the case.

The Appeal Out of Date.

Another objection to the principle is that the appeal which it makes is out of date. Causes stand or fall in the modern world on their strength, not their weakness; on their merits, not on their immunities. And if the immersionist has nothing more to plead in defense of his cause than the sanctity and inviolability of his conscience, he is in a bad way in this generation. Is it at all likely that the pedobaptist will surrender to the immersionist conscience, when he has refused to surrender to the immersionist argument? If he is a modern man you will be far more likely to reach him by showing him the spiritual values of immersion. It seems to me that this is the "new level," the "higher ground" on which the immersionist should plant his defence. Immersion will stand or fall, ultimately according to its religious worth. If it is indispensable, it must be indispensable to richer fruitage, more abundant life, and closer fellowship with Christ. Does the immersionist produce better and larger results than the affusionist? When all other arguments fail, this one will still be sound, that immersionist bodies are converting so many more persons to Christianity, and are producing so much finer Christian lives, that it is safe to believe that the future of the church on earth lies with them. Christ is supremely interested in the fruits of devotion to him: "By their fruits ye shall know them." "I have appointed you, that ye should go and bear fruit." "Herein is my father glorified that ye bear much fruit."

But what is this all about—what is the use of disturbing the pedobaptists in their practice of sprinkling, or shifting the argument of the Disciples from grammar and lexicon to conscience?

It is this—the Disciples have a union conscience as well as a baptism conscience, and they do not seem to pull together. The union conscience pulls toward fellowship with all the children of God, while the baptism conscience pulls away from some of them. So far in the history of the Disciples the baptism conscience has outpulled the union conscience, and carried the body, with its union conscience, struggling for release, into the wilderness of separation and estrangement from other religious bodies.

The problem which confronts the Disciples at the present time is the apparent antinomy between the two principles of the movement, and it devolves upon them to choose between them. They must settle with themselves what they desire to do—give up their union conscience and have immersion, or give up their immersion conscience and have union. That they can not keep both is becoming clearer every generation. And in the settlement of this question they must decide which is worth more to the kingdom of God—which is more pleasing to Christ: A united church, or an immersed church.

By Leslie W. Morgan

The battle is over. It only remains to divide the spoils of victory and bury the dead. The only trouble is this, that if one reads the papers of all parties it is difficult to tell between whom the spoils are to be divided, and on the other hand who are really the dead. In other words every body claims the victory. Lloyd George has been asked what is the most surprising thing that has resulted from the election, and he replied that it was that the opponents of the Government could have the effrontery to claim that they had won the victory. There has been more juggling with figures during the past few days than ought to be enough to satisfy statisticians for a generation. And only second to the doubt that seems to be in some people's mind as to who has won, is the doubt as to what has won. Some say it is the Budget, and that only; some say it is the campaign against the Lords, and some that it is the principle of free trade. Others say tariff reform has really won, and that had it not been for the mixed issue the Government would have been turned out. But in the midst of all the discussion, every one can see, whether it is admitted or not, that the Irish hold the whip. It remains to be seen what they will be able to do with it.

The great query just now is as to what the Government should do first. Their strong supporters are urging them to carry out their pre-election threat and not take office till they are assured that the Lords' veto shall be done away. The Conservatives, however, are anxious that the Budget should be dealt with first, as they are suddenly getting very concerned about the financial position. The real secret is that since the people have given their decision and they see that the Budget must go through, they are anxious to pour oil on the troubled waters by allowing it to pass through the Lords, with a bland smile and a gracious bow to "the will of the people."

Plural voting very largely influenced the election in many quarters, and had it not been for the plural, or out-voter, the Liberals would have gone back with a much larger majority than they have. The plural voter is an owner of property in one or more constituencies outside the one in which he lives, and the property owner is not noted for his liberalism. This matter will be dealt with at an early date—at least at an early date after the question of the Lords' veto is settled.

Intimidation has also played a large part in the present election. More so than usual, because it is in the country where this sort of thing takes place, and the country regions are effected by the Land Clauses in the Budget.

"There's master and there's parson, and there's agent and there's squire,
And him who lives beneath 'em—why he lets his soul on hire."

An important step was taken last week in the opening of the Labor Exchanges for which the Government has been planning for the past year or more. Seventy-eight of these have been opened in various industrial centers throughout the country. It is an ambitious scheme for bringing the employer and the unemployed together. The United Kingdom has been divided into eleven districts, with a clearing house in the chief city of each division, with a divisional superintendent at each place, and under a head director in London. There are to be first-class exchanges in thirty towns of 100,000 population and over, with thirty second-class ones in towns of 50,000 to 100,000, with numerous third-class exchanges in smaller places, and branches from these in country regions. Next year it is planned to begin the erection of permanent buildings for the housing of exchanges, and these will be gradually erected during a period of ten or twelve years. These will be used exclusively for business purposes, there being no refreshment bars, baths, etc., as in Germany. The success of the scheme will depend upon the interest which employers of labor take in it, or at least this will be only second to the demand for labor itself. Early success augurs well for the future, as many applicants were placed in positions at once, as for example, at Plymouth, where no fewer than 300 were found employment on the first day. The system has been instituted by Mr. Winston Churchill as President of the Board of Trade, and if it is a success will be another feather in his cap. One of the great points made against the Government in the recent campaign was what they had not done for the unemployed.

There is rejoicing in Free Church circles that Rev. J. H. Jowett has refused the call to the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, and rejoicing also in the same circles, but in somewhat different quarters, that Rev. G. Campbell Morgan has refused the second approach for him to take up the work. The leading English preachers belong to the whole country in a sense that even the most prominent preachers in America do not, hence they are missed by the country, quite apart from the individual church they serve, when they go to foreign parts.

Congress of Disciples

Appetizing Program Announced for Always Interesting Gathering

DATES—MARCH 29-31.

The eleventh annual Congress of the Disciples of Christ will be held at Bloomington, Ind., March 29 to 31, 1910. Below is the program in full of the sessions of the congress. The Bloomington Church will furnish lodging and breakfast for all who attend. Those purposing to attend should send their names as early as possible to Rev. J. C. Todd, pastor, who will provide for their entertainment. We anticipate a large representation of our ministers at the meeting this year as there was no congress last year. Bloomington, Ind., is central to a great part of our brotherhood; it is the seat of the state university of Indiana. The arrangement of the program this year will, we believe, stimulate interest to a higher degree than those of former years, especially in that provision has been made for a full discussion of the various subjects by the members of the congress. A full half day is devoted to each topic, which will allow a full hour for general discussion after the papers and written reviews. The evening addresses will not be discussed and the address by Mr. Hudson the last afternoon will not be discussed. The open parliament of the "unification of our missionary interests" and "our brotherhood publication society" will be presided over by Rev. A. B. Philputt, who will not deliver an address, but will simply introduce the subject. The purpose of this parliament is an inter-change of views upon these two great vital interests of our brotherhood. It should be a very profitable feature of the meeting. The congress does not need "boosting." This year it comes the week after Easter, just when the preachers can get away for a few days and when they need a few days' rest. Make your plans to attend. Take an extra dollar with you for dues, which is the only revenue of the congress. An important feature of this year's meeting will be the report of the committee on the union of the Disciples' and Baptist Congresses. Rev. I. J. Spencer is chairman of this committee. Sentiment seems to favor a joint meeting of the two bodies on alternate years.

PROGRAM.

Tuesday 7:45 p. m.

Devotions, led by Rev. J. C. Todd, Bloomington, Ind.

Welcome, President W. J. Bryan, Indiana State University.

Response, Rev. F. W. Burnham, Springfield, Ill.

Addresses, "Education and the Initiative." Prof. E. S. Ames, The University of Chicago.

Wednesday, March 30, 10 a. m.

Address, "Our Plea for Union and the Social Movement," Rev. A. W. Taylor, Chicago.

Written Review, Rev. Edgar De Witte Jones, Bloomington, Ill.

General discussion opened by Rev. E. F. Daugherty, Wabash, Ind.

Afternoon—2 O'clock.

Address, "The Church and Men," Rev. W. S. Lockhart, Fayetteville, Ark.

Written Review, Rev. O. W. Lawrence, Decatur, Ill.

General discussion opened by Rev. T. W. Grafton, Anderson, Ind.

Evening—7:45 O'clock.

Address, "The Psychology of the New Thought Movements," Prof. E. H. Lindley, Dep't. Philosophy, Indiana State University.

Thursday, March 31, 10 a. m.

Address, "The Increasing Faith of Modern Religious Thought," Prof. Errett Gates, University of Chicago.

Written Review, (Reviewer yet to be selected).

A STORY OF THE TRUSTS

BY JANE RICHARDSON

CHAPTER XV (Continued)

This happy culmination to Teddy and Mary's affair was a wonderful incentive to his recovery; he mended rapidly from that day.

Randall, who was always kind and thoughtful when his men met with accidents or were ill, came to see Teddy, privately paid his doctor's bill, and best of all, did not stop his wages. This was of paramount importance to the lovers; for they had decided on being married and going into a home of their own, early in the spring. Susan, as their oldest friend, stipulated that the wedding should take place at her house.

The first day that Teddy joined the family at dinner was a bright Sunday in December, and Mary was present in honor of the event. She sat beside him, prettier than ever, demure and dignified as became a prospective bride.

In the afternoon the members of the Neighborly Club, and Teddy's own chums came to tender their congratulations, both upon his recovery and his engagement. It was a severe trial to his strength and left him very tired, but happy.

"It's worth knowing how kind and good felows are, and how nice Mary's friends are too," he said rather faintly as he went back to his room.

The next week he returned to the Works, much sooner than Randall thought prudent, but Teddy had an incentive now, and would not hear objections.

Teddy and Mary began their preparations immediately. Mary to provide her modest trousseau, and Teddy to lay by funds for their future home. Eleanor helped Mary select her gowns and also offered to help make them. Her own newly awakened feeling made her even more than ordinarily sympathetic and she rejoiced at the girl's escape from what might have been life-long misery.

After Billy Mullins' flight Mag Lewis disappeared from her old haunts and it was supposed that she had followed him. Mary regretted this, for she could guess the woman's misery and poverty, and in gratitude for Teddy's escape she hoped to do something for her. She did not speak of her intention to Teddy, for she knew well that he would strongly object to his future wife being brought into contact with a woman so dissolute, notwithstanding he acknowledged his great obligation to her.

It was not the hand of a woman that was raised in the presence of the Master, to cast the first stone.

Eleanor to whom Mary broached the subject was entirely of her opinion. She said:

"There's no doubt that the poor unhappy thing saved Teddy's life. It is not an easy matter to reach such women, and you, Mary, I'm afraid could do very little. But Susan or Miss Abigail or I might, in some way, and you shall help her, through us."

Eleanor surmised that, broad-minded and generous as he was, Brainard, too, would object to any efforts that she or Miss Abigail might make in Mag's behalf. Though he himself, might help her in all practical ways, he could not rise above inherited prejudice.

Eleanor had no notion of becoming a mere echo of any one in such a case, and she believed that befriending Mag Lewis was an instance where she required no advice and no guidance beyond that of her own conscience.

Accordingly she and Susan went to Mag's former lodging, a wretched tenement in the poorest quarter of the town. The scowling woman who answered their knock, her sleeves rolled above her rough, red elbows, the front of her untidy dress wet with the suds of the wash-tub, muttered something about "being bothered with folks she didn't want."

"Well, you might try to be a little bit polite," said Susan testily.

"I don't have any call to be polite," the woman replied sullenly. "I don't go pushin' myself into your houses, so I don't see why you come here."

Interposing before Susan could answer her, Eleanor said in her sweet, courteous way: "You are perfectly right, but we wanted to see Margaret Lewis and have not been able to find any trace of her. We feared that she might be ill, or in need—she and her little child—and we thought, since she lived here once, that you might know where she is.

"No, ma'am, I don't," said the woman, moved to respect by Eleanor's example. "She left secret like, without tellin' anybody goodbye. Her rent was paid up three months, too."

"She saved Mr. Wilkin's life, as you probably know, and we are all anxious to help her."

"Yes I heard something about that," the woman said, and thinking that she saw a chance to profit by Mag's good fortune, she finally admitted: "I heard—but I can't say how true it is—that she took the young'un and has gone to Chicago. They say she's got a job of work in a restaurant. Mebby she'll write about her things—they're all in her room yet. If she does I'll tell you."

"We will make it worth your while to do so," said Eleanor, and turned away with a pleasant good-morning.

Eleanor was convinced that she should hear from Mag, and returned home very content with the results of the investigation. Susan was not so well satisfied. She resented the womans rudeness to them and regretted that she hadn't a chance to give her a piece of her mind. "But, la me!" she soliloquised, as stepped briskly about her shining kitchen, setting the table for supper, "If I was no better off than that poor ign'rant thing and hadn't no more sense, and nothin' better ahead of me, and had to work so over the wash-tub, mebby I'd be a sight worse. It hain't no credit to me if I do half way right with such a home an' children an' husband as I've got." And tears of gratitude sprang to her eyes.

CHAPTER XVI.

The Dark Horse.

The time had come at last, toward which the schemes of Mullens and Bannister had pointed for the last four months. The Legislature of Indiana, as a body, had never been purchasable, and it was this day called upon to choose a representative to the United States Senate.

The morning dawned propitiously. The sun shone dazzingly upon a slight sprinkling of fresh snow. Above on the lofty, springing dome of the State House the flag streamed free, every fold stretched straight before the gentle breeze, every star visible in the clear blue.

Within the capitol an air of keen expectancy prevailed. There was little or no noise, no loud laughter echoed in the long corridors, no questionable stories were related in the offices. The time for frivolity was past. An earnest, high duty confronted the representatives of the people. Their choice must do credit alike, to the state and to the nation.

It was a crisis of paramount importance to Mullens and his henchman, Bannister. It had not been as smooth sailing as Mullens—the autocrat of the machine in Carlinville—had expected. In common with men of his type, he imagined that his local authority extended to the uttermost quarters of the State, and it galled him not a little to find himself pitted against others of his ilk, as ruthless, conscienceless and determined, and as generous in the matter of bribes, as himself.

These rivals were openly contemptuous of him and his ambitions, and they intrigued against him with unremitting vigor. The preliminary lobbying had been carried on with fierce and tireless energy, and meaner tools had come to blows. In the very chambers where laws were made that order might prevail, undignified quarrels had ensued and unseemly scenes had been enacted. In secret places the "Barrel" was potent—a blow to Mullens, whose blatant self-confidence had never let him anticipate such a thing—of greater capacity than his own. He was keenly hit in his most vulnerable point and suffered as much as one so thick-skinned could suffer, at seeing men on whom he had relied brazenly, desert him for the highest bidder.

Brainard too, was there, heart and soul of a coterie of honest men with the honor of the State at heart, and who realized that treachery was to be met and decisively dealt with.

The Assembly was called to order, the customary routine of opening was gone through with as on other less important days. But beneath the outward calm there was a suppressed excitement of which even the most phlegmatic was conscious. The hour was come, both bodies of the Assembly united in joint session. Buffoonery and frivolity were laid aside. Men turned pale, drew their breath sharply, and hung upon the words of each speaker. In the caucuses of the night before there had been stubborn disagreement among the many factions of the party in power, and it was realized that the unexpected would happen, that the choice would probably be made in one of those fortuitous moments that change the whole aspect of a situation.

It was realized that the failure or success of arrant jobbery, the downfall or triumph of venal demagoguery, almost that of the Government itself, depended upon the nomination. Would the Assembly prove worthy of the trust committed to it, or would it trifle with honor and become the tool of corruptionists?

Several names were placed in nomination, with convincing oratory, but the vote gave no result.

A week of bitter contest followed and the choice narrowed down to two men, each of whom might have been regarded as a choice of evils. Each held his ground refusing to yield, though conscious he was merely an obstacle in the way, prolonging the futile strife. From stubborn folly the costly deadlock continued for ten days. But the end came at last. Men were exhausted, their nerves strung to irritable sensitiveness. The afternoon lagged, daylight failed and suddenly myriads of lights leaped out dotting the walls and ceiling with dazzling points of flame. As if the minds of those who had battled so long had received a sudden illumination as well, a man whom few had regarded, and who had done little else than vote during the ten interminable days, rose in his place far back in the corner of the chamber, and in a suave ringing voice, he quietly addressed the chair and was recognized:

"Mr. Speaker," he proceeded, "It seems that we are unable to reach a choice approved by the majority. While no fault can be found, personally or politically with the gentlemen whose names are before this body, it is apparent to most of us that neither faction can or will yield. Their friends and supporters have kept their pledges and have vindicated their loyalty, but time is passing and our duty is yet unperformed. A new departure must be made! This we owe to our constituency throughout the state. Therefore I put into nomination the name of a man whom we all know, who is above the reproach of political trickery; whose private and public life is without reproach. Gentlemen, I present to you the name of ———."

He paused for effect, and curious members turned to look at him while the servile tools of the warring factions stared questioningly at their bosses, who in turn glared vindictively at each other. Not a word broke the silence. Slowly the speaker continued..

"I present the name of—Robert Brainard!"

The name was received in utter silence—in hushed surprise—when even breath seemed suspended; then a shout went up from the assembly. They now felt that they were relieved from pledges that had grown irksome, whose uselessness had been proved. They were free to follow their own behests, and to exercise the privilege of true and unhindered citizenship. Differences were forgotten, the dead lock was broken. The nomination was seconded with enthusiasm, a vote was taken and Brainard was chosen by an overwhelming majority.

Our Readers' Opinions

In Complimentary Vein

Dear Christian Century: The best Sunday school lesson I get from anywhere is yours. The daily Altar is just our need. May your work prosper. Don't please, ever give up the Sunday school department. Yours in earnest. LATIVIA L. CRUM.

Editors Christian Century: The Christian Century is a remarkable paper. Its various departments are a real contribution to the periodical literature of the subjects dealt with. I find the local interpretations by A. W. Taylor, quite equal to the very best editorial comment to be found in the larger magazines. The work of Professor Willett is unequalled in its line in all the history of our literature. The editorials serve the purpose of editorials,—they challenge, provoke, interest and inform. Recently the contributions have been of unusual worth, especially those of E. M. Todd and Frank E. Boren. It gladdens my heart to read the virile words of these sons of the prophets, who have the very non-conformist spirit that animated the fathers themselves. Such men are the life of the movement.

I do not mean by this to include an endorsement of the positions set forth in all respects. That would be poor appreciation indeed, that accepts the accident of agreement as the norm of approval. Rather, I find the mentioned articles and others of their class to be alive, fresh, opposite,—in short seasonable. They have thus the stamp of the prophetic. Tney savor of the things of God. Their discussions are so many beacons, proclaiming to a somnolent church that brave souls are awake. The lovers of the light will see to it that these guardians are not merely lighting the fires of their own martyrdom,—but are rather the heralds of a day of fuller freedom of inquiry,—of larger toleration in the quest of truth.

Sincerely yours,

Everett, Mass. WILLIS A. PARKER.

Sectional Conventions Needed

Editors Christian Century: I am in hearty accord with your editorial "The New Order of Conventions." Not only sensible and deliberate transaction of business, but justice to the far away church require the adoption of the delegate business session. "Living Link," San Diego, Cal., should have equal vote with "Living Link," Indianapolis, Ind.

I also believe that our annual national convention should give place to a triennial or quadrennial convention, properly delegated and made great and impressive; that the great sections, made so by natural geographical boundaries should be gathered into annual conventions, delegated and prepared to discuss the problems of the church in respective sections; this annual convention to adjust itself in point of time and place to the interested state conventions. I forbear for lack of space to discuss the questions suggested. W. E. CRABTREE.

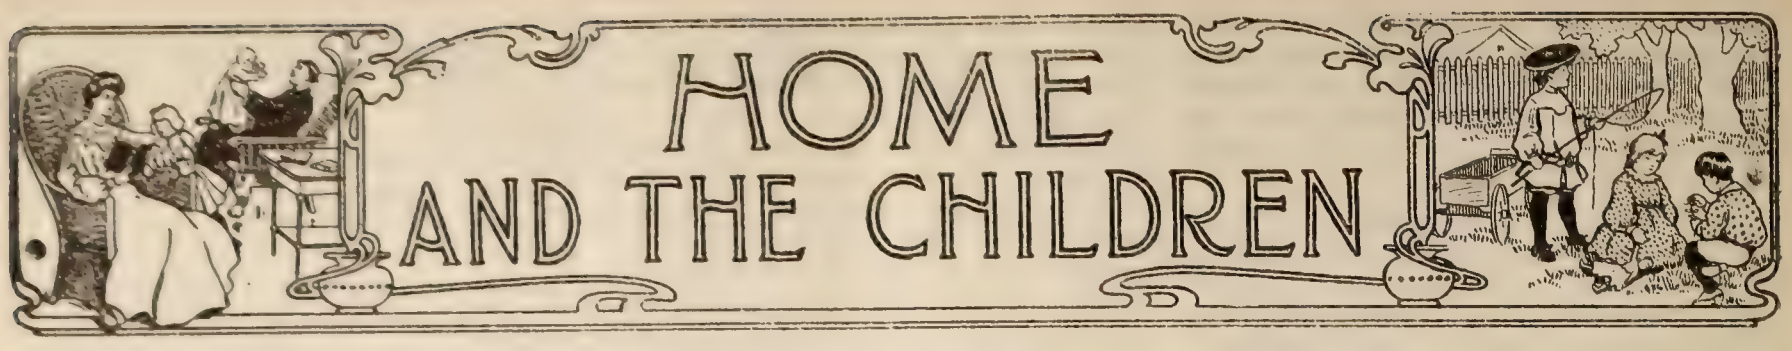
A Baptism Conscience and a Union Conscience

Editors Christian Century: It is interesting to observe that however hard one tries to emphasize the vital and essential things in Christianity, the formal things, so definitely interwoven with the churches' thought of Christianity will come to the surface.

Here is The Christian Century giving more attention to the question of baptism than any other paper among us. This is not a criticism. It is only a meditation. It is ever so. Col. Church's effort to get at the vital things has resulted in turning attention to the very thing he would abrogate or at least subordinate. It is interesting indeed to witness the tenacity of the old controversy. Some years ago a contemporary of mine in the city where I was pastor wrote a book entitled, "The Question of Baptism Forever Settled." He was a Lutheran. He was tried for heresy and convicted. He settled nothing except himself, in oblivion. The question of baptism goes marching on. I wonder if it will ever be settled. Two years ago I wrote some articles for the Century and discussed baptism among other things. I contended that immersionists had settled it and that the people who practiced other forms of baptism are responsible for the divisions it has caused. I said: "Pedobaptists and not immersionists must shoulder the responsibility for this prolonged war of words within the church. It would seem that in the interest of peace and union, if for no other reason, the use of these substitutes might be discontinued." I also said: "It is well to remember that there is a position with reference to the ordinance of baptism which is not in dispute and those who hold that position need only abide the time when others will be willing to accept it."

Now, pardon me, your argument sounded good to me at first, but I am not so sure now that it will hold. You disposed of the "feet-washing conscience" argument pretty well, but suppose you try the same line of reasoning on the "Episcopal conscience." Episcopal consciences are not few. Why not say that out of deference to such a "conscience" and for the sake of man we should all become Episcopalians? Those who are not, have no more conscience against it than pedobaptists or optionists have against immersion.

After all I am of the opinion that the vital trouble lies deeper. The churches have a conscience about a lot of things doctrinal and formal but they haven't as yet developed a conscience on the union question. With all the advance that has been made in the direction of union there is mighty little deep concern, even among "us," that union should actually take place. When the church once gets herself really to realize the sin and shame of her divided condition, when once Christians feel the humiliation they ought to feel over the churches' unhappy strifes and petty divisions over her failure to really face the problems of human need, material and spiritual, their consciences on the question of baptism and feet-washing and a lot of other things will be far less sensitive.



In the meantime I am of the opinion that we should avoid stirring up the baptism conscience too much and devote ourselves to the awakening of the consciences of our people on the more vital and important question of union as it affects the speedy evanagelism of the world. But I surmise that even this opinion if it were very loudly expressed would somewhat agitate the "baptism conscience."

You are giving us a splendid paper and I am sure you are headed in the right direction.

Sincerely yours,

P. J. RICE.

[Mr. Rice has struck center in his observation that the fundamental need is the existence of a union conscience in the church. Without this earnest desire for union no argument on a dogmatic question will ever bring a union that is worth anything. If all the sects were converted to the immersionist dogma today, and united upon the basis of their agreement on that dogma, it would not be a Christian union. There would be no principle of permanency in such a union. Differences of a dogmatic sort would be bound to arise tomorrow. These differences might be over baptism or any other Scripture teaching; and a new process of sectarian divisions would again be begun. There is only one principle of union that is adequate: that is love—a love that is big enough to include differences of understanding as to what the Scriptures teach and considerate enough to avoid the doing of those things which divide. As to the differences between the Episcopalians and the rest of us, these will be resolved by love and the union conscience or not at all. Just what results the application of this principle to the episcopal controversy will bring would be an interesting study for some reader to present in an article in our columns. Meantime what we have been urging in The Christian Century is that it is the Disciples' business to be creating a union conscience in the whole Christian world. That we have not been working at that business no one will dispute. That even we ourselves possess a union conscience not everybody will affirm. —Editors.]

Fred's Puzzle

BY ANNA D. WALKER.

"Put your best foot forward, Fred!"
My father said to me.
His hand was resting on my head
In love, all tenderly,
And then, to business off he went,
And left me puzzled quite;
I could not tell which foot he meant,
The left one or the right!
I looked them over then and there,
To see if I could find
Which was the best one of the pair,
That I might try to mind.
But now to you, dear friends, I say,
Until I find this clew,
I cannot father's word obey,
I cannot, sure, could you.

The Old Valentine

BY MISS Z. I. DAVIS.

"Another valentine for you," smiled the mail carier, giving Bessie her fourth package that day. "I think you are getting more than your share," he said good naturedly.

Bessie smoothed back her brown waves, and lifted her silken lashes from the gray eyes that sparkled with merriment. "I guess you would think so if you saw them, for they are all alike. I do wish I could get one that was different from the others," she said.

That day at lunch Bessie found a packet under her plate. "A valentine," she exclaimed and "another heart, the fifth one I have received today."

"That means," teased papa, "that you are never to lose heart, but be brave and have courage." Turning to her mother, the doctor continued, "Would you like to go to Jonesville? The leading physicians of the state are to meet there today."

"Can you keep house this afternoon, dear?" smiled Mrs. Lane. "Remember all callers that come. Kathie will help you serve them with hot chocolate and wafers. We will be home for dinner at six o'clock."

"Yes," was the cheerful reply. "It will be great fun."

Shortly after Bessie's father and mother drove down the lane, it began to storm. At first the snow fell leisurely in soft large flakes like feathery down. Then it began to grow colder and the wind moaned dismally around the corners and through the trees.

Bessie, seated in the cozy corner by the register with a new book, did not notice the change in the weather until a tapping at the window aroused her. Glancing out, to her amazement, a beautiful homing pigeon was looking straight at her, with a mute appeal for entrance.

She raised the sash, and the graceful creature flew in and lighted upon her arm. "Kathie," she exclaimed in delight, "just come and see what has happened."

"Sure now," beamed the girl knowingly, "don't you be after remembering it? Look under its wing. It is like the one I gave the Grahams."

"Here is a tiny valentine," she smiled and opening its center there lay a note written on wax paper. It read, "Dear Besie, I send my love to you. Baby Dennis has just been taken with spasms. Mamma has done everything for him that she knows, but nothing seems to help him. Tell your father to come as quick as he can or it may be too late. Papa is away with the horses so I had to send it by pigeon Dick. I hope you will get it all right. He was there a long time before Kathie gave him to me. If ever I wished for a telephone it is today, but I am praying that God will save my precious baby brother. Lovingly, Elsie Graham."

"Please answer the phone," requested Bessie as she tried to think what to do in her father's absence. "Is something wanted?" she asked as the maid put up the receiver with a troubled air.

"Sure it is too bad, my lamb, that your papa and mamma will stay over night for fear the poor lady will have neuralgia, again."

"Something must be done as quickly as possible for this sick baby," she declared in a disappointed tone. Stepping to the telephone, she decided to call up her father, only to find that the wind had just blown down some of the poles and it would be impossible to communicate with him until the damage had been repaired.

Live Words by a Dead Queen

Just three hundred and fifty-six years ago the 12th day of this month (February 12, 1554), Lady Jane Grey, England's nine days' queen, was beheaded. One of the most popular heroines in all history, this poor little girl of seventeen, although born a Catholic, went to her death a Protestant, refusing steadily to recant in spite of tremendous Catholic influence. Born the granddaughter of the youngest sister of that most brutal ruler, Henry the Eighth, this young woman, whose ability was great in spite of tender years, became the victim of most unfortunate circumstances. The dukes who raised her to the throne were not men of sufficient strength to carry their poor little puppet Queen along to the high hills of success, the backing they expected from France did not come, the people turned upon them and the young woman who might have been England's first Protestant Queen went to an untimely death. On the day before her execution the unfortunate girl whose rule was so short wrote to her sister a letter that will live long as a sermon, for the words are as live today as they were centuries ago. The writer, in speaking of the greatest and most wonderful of books, which, authentic or not to the living, is a flash of hope and an everlasting joy to dying eyes, says:

"I have sent you, good sister Katherine, a book, which, though it be not outwardly rimmed with gold, yet inwardly it is more worthy than precious stones. It is the book, dear sister, of the laws of the Lord; it is His Testament and last Will, which he bequeathed unto us wretches, which shall lead you to the path of eternal joy, and if you, with a good mind, read it, and with an earnest desire follow it, shall bring you to an immortal and everlasting life. It will teach you to live and learn you to die; it shall win you more than you should have gained by the possession of your woeful father's lands. for as if God had prospered him, ye should have inherited his lands, so if you apply diligently [to] your book [i. e., the Bible], trying to direct your life after it, you shall be an inheritor of such riches as neither the covetous shall withdraw from you, neither the thief shall steal, neither yet the moth corrupt. Desire, sister, to understand the law of the Lord your God. Live still to die, that you by death may purchase eternal life; or after your death enjoy the life purchased [for] you by Christ's death; and trust not the tenderness of your age shall lengthen your life, for as soon, if God will, goeth the young as the old; and labour always to learn to die. Deny the world, defy the devil, and despise the flesh. Delight yourself only in the Lord. Be patient for your sins, and yet despair not. Be steady in faith, yet presume not, and desire with St. Paul to be dissolved and to be with Christ, with whom even in death there is life. Be like the good servant, and even at midnight be waking; lest when death cometh and stealeth upon you, like a thief in the night, you be with the evil servant found sleeping, and lest for lack of oil ye be found with the first foolish wench, and like him that had not on the wedding garment, and then be cast out from the marriage. Resist [sin] in ye [yourself] as I trust ye do, and seeing ye have the name of a Christian, as near as ye can, follow the steps of your master Christ, and take up your cross; lay your sins on His back and always embrace Him; and as touching my death, rejoice as I do, and assist [perhaps, 'consider'] that I shall be delivered of this corruption, and put on incorruption, for I am assured that I shall for losing of a mortal life find an immortal felicity. Pray God grant you [and] send you of His grace to live in His fear, and to die in the love [here is an illegible passage, perhaps made so by fast falling tears], neither for love of life, nor fears of death. For if ye deny His truth to lengthen your life, God will deny you, and shorten your days; and if ye will cleave to Him, He will prolong your days, to your comfort and His glory, to the which glory God bring mine and you hereafter, when it shall please God to call you."

The Cause of Her Death

Here lies a poor woman who always was busy.
She lived under pressure that rendered her dizzy.
She belonged to ten clubs and read Browning at sight,
Showed at luncheons and teas, and would vote if she might.
She served on the school board with courage and zeal;
She golfed and she kodaked and rode on a wheel;
She read Tolstoi and Ibsen, knew microbes by name,
Approved of Delsarte, was a "daughter" and "dame!"
Her children went in for the top education;
Her husband went seaward for nervous prostration.
One day on her tablets she found an hour free—
The shock was too great, and she died instantly!

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 27.

Theme—The present Christ.

Scripture—Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world.—Matt. 28:20.

No fable old, nor mythic lore,
Nor dream of bards and seers,
No dead fact stranded on the shore
Of the oblivious years,—

But warm, sweet, tender, even yet
A present help is he;
And faith has still its Olivet,
And love its Galilee.
—Whittier ("Our Master.")

Prayer—We bless Thee, O Lord, for Thy mercy to us on this good day. Thou holdest our souls in life, and art ever ready to hear our prayer. May the voice of thanksgiving rise today from the souls Thou hast delivered from sin. Let the music of the sanctuary be heard on all shores. May the presence of Christ be very evident to his people, and may the gospel be preached with power from on high. Far and wide in human hearts may praise abound and faith prevail, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 28.

Theme—The sheep that must be gathered.

Scripture—And other sheep I have which are not of this fold: them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice, and they shall become one flock, one shepherd.—John 10:16.

Saviour, gather many nations;
Fruitful let Thy sorrows be;
By Thy pains and consolations
Draw the nations unto Thee;
Of Thy cross the wondrous story,
Be it to the nations told;
Let them see Thee in Thy glory
And Thy mercy manifold.
—Arthur C. Coxe ("Saviour, gather many nations.")

Prayer—Father of all mankind, we hail with gladness the signs of Christ's advancing kingdom. Not till all the nations know and love him shall we be satisfied. The promises of Thy word are very precious to us, and they assure us that every knee shall bow to him. Give us a share, we beseech Thee, in this great work of world-wide evangelism. Fill our souls with the broadening and enriching purposes of the cross. May nothing less than the best we can do for the advancement of the great cause satisfy us. In Jesus name. Amen.

TUESDAY, MARCH 1.

Theme—Son of Man and Son of God.

Scripture—We have found him of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph.—John 1:45.

Thomas answered and said unto him, My Lord and my God.—John 20:28.

If Jesus Christ is a man,—
And only a man,—I say
That of all mankind I cleave to him,
And to him will I cleave alway.

If Jesus Christ is a God,—
And the only God,—I swear
I will follow him through heaven and hell,
The earth, the sea, and the air.
—Richard Watson Gilder ("The Song of a Heathen.")

Prayer—Our Father, we thank Thee for Jesus, who has lived with us as a true Son of Man, sharing all our human estate. In his daily tasks in his love of his family and his friends, and in his faithfulness to all the duties of life, he has set before us a noble example. But most of all we thank Thee that he has become our Saviour and Lord, our Elder Brother and our King. Make us all members of the holy family through faith and faithfulness. May we follow Jesus in the ways of his humility, that we also may follow him to the throne of his glory. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 2.

Theme—The armed and waiting servants of God.

Scripture—Having done all, stand. Stand, therefore, having girded your loins with truth, and having put on the breast-plate of righteousness, and having shod your feet with the preparation of the Gospel of Peace. —Ephes. 6:13, 14.

God doth not need
Either man's work, or his own gifts; who best
Bear his mild yoke, they serve him best; his state
Is kingly; thousands at his bidding speed,
And post o'er land and ocean without rest;
They also serve who only stand and wait.
—John Milton ("On His Blindness.")

Prayer—Dear Father, it is not always easy to restrain our souls when we behold the world's need of work, and hear the call of Christ. But teach us the need of quietness and obedience as well. It is not always by activity that we can fulfil Thy pleasure. Sometimes we are appointed to silent service and waiting that seems in vain. Teach us, we pray Thee, the patience that tarries and is at rest, because it is Thy will. Help us to arm ourselves in readiness for Thy call, and having done all, to stand. For Christ's sake. Amen.

THURSDAY, MARCH 3.

Theme—The wrestling of Jacob.

Scripture—And Jacob was left alone, and there wrestled a man with him until the breaking of the day.—Gen. 32:24.

Like that strange angel, which of old
Until the breaking of the light,
Wrestled with wandering Israel.
—Tennyson ("To ————.")

Prayer—O God, we thank Thee that Thou art with us in the darkness as in the light. And when the night has settled upon us, in trouble, we feared the coming of another day, we have been forced to cling to Thee, like Jacob of old, till Thou shouldst bring us deliverance. Then have we wrestled in prayer, crying, "I will not let Thee go except Thou bless me," and we have not called upon Thee in vain. Merciful Father, comfort us in our affliction, and lift up the hands that are weak. Make known Thyself to us in the hour of need, and may the dawn find us still clinging to Thee, and happy in the victory of prayer. Amen.

FRIDAY, MARCH 4.

Theme—To the Greeks, foolishness.

Scripture—But we preach Christ crucified, unto Jews a stumbling block, and unto Greeks foolishness; but unto them that are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God.—I. Cor. 2:23, 24.

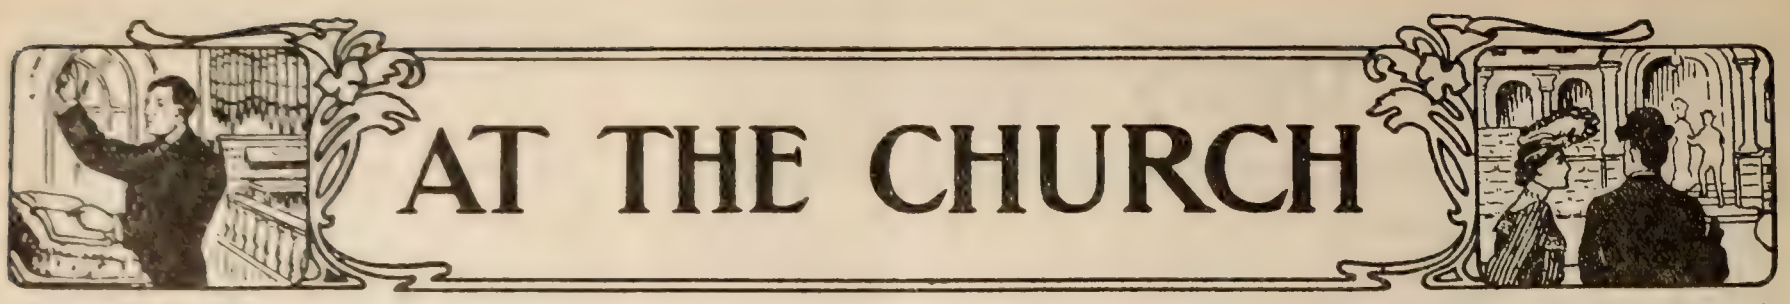
One called Paulus; we have heard his fame
Indeed, if Christus be not one with him—
I know not, nor am troubled much to know.
Thou canst not think a mere barbarian Jew
As Paulus proves to be, one circumcised,
Hath access to a secret shut from us!
—Robert Browning ("Cleon.")

Prayer—O Lord, our Father, we thank Thee for the gospel of salvation. How little has the wisdom of the world understood its meaning and entered into its spirit. Its first interpreters were scorned, and its latest messengers are too often unheeded. But Thou, O Father, knowest that the cross is set for the conquest of the world, and we are gladdened by the signs of its triumph. Teach us the wisdom that is from above, that we, being taught of the divine Spirit may escape the folly of denial, and may enter, with the apostles and witnesses of all the ages, into the joy of loyal service. For Christ's sake. Amen.

SATURDAY, MARCH 5.

Theme—The Passing world.

Scripture—For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the vain glory of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world. And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof; but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever.—I. John 2:16, 17.



Then came brave Glory puffing by
In silks that whistled, who but he!
He scarce allowed me half an eye;
But thou shalt answer, Lord, for me.
—George Herbert ("The Quip").

Prayer—Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed by Thy name. In honoring Thee we find our chief satisfaction, in serving Thee our highest gain. Save us from holding in too high esteem the things that will not last. Write Thy warnings upon our consciences, we beseech Thee. May we find the joy that comes not from selfish pleasure, but from the love of Thy little ones, the poor, the hungry and the sick. Forgive us that we so often forget Thee and the needy ones whom Thou lovest. Teach us to walk humbly, soberly, unselfishly by the power of the world to come. And bring us to Thyself at last, for Christ's sake. Amen.

McPherson Brothers at Parsons, Kansas

Lowell C. McPherson, of Keuka Park, N. Y., with his brother, R. P. McPherson, closed their meeting at Prasons, Kansas, February 10. There were ninety-eight who responded to the gospel invitation. Many of these were men. However, the success of the meeting cannot be measured by numbers. People in the community who have never been particularly interested in the church are in full sympathy with our cause as a result of this splendid meeting. The power and influence of this meeting will be felt for years to come. I am told that for genuine helpfulness and deep spiritual power this is decidedly the best meeting ever held in Parsons. Lowell C. McPherson is a true man of God. He impresses all with his deeply spiritual life. One can not be long in his presence without feeling that he must be a better man. He does not fail to deepen the spiritual life of the church. As a harmonizer of discordant factions within the church he has no superior in the brotherhood. He should be in constant demand for this kind of work. Parsons is unanimous in the wish that the McPherson Brothers will come again.

FRANK E. MALLORY, Minister.

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

A Day in Capernaum*

Probably the most conspicuous feature of the public ministry of Jesus was his healing of the sick. It was by no means the most important part of his work, but it attracted more attention than any other because it gave relief to many sufferers. The people of his day were more interested in physical welfare than in matters of greater moment. It is precisely so today. One who claims to heal the sick will secure a far greater following than one who is bent upon the more impressive matters of moral soundness and religious devotion.

The Leprosy

It was probably this fact, that the healing work of Jesus attracted so much attention, which has given to us so large a number of such narratives in the gospel records. People more easily remembered the instances in which works of power had been wrought than those in which Jesus had spoken the great truths of the kingdom of God, and it is the things that most impress the witnesses that get themselves recorded. The present study is a presentation of the work of one day that must have been full of interest to the people who saw Jesus busy at his task. It must not be forgotten that probably by far the larger portion of this day, as of other days, was spent in talking with the people concerning the great truths on which Jesus continually dwelt. But the miracles were notable and they have taken most of the space.

The ministry of Jesus in Galilee had its center in Capernaum after the first few months. From that center Jesus made his journeys into the different sections of the hill country. Probably it was on one of these journeys that a leper, learning who it was that passed that way, came up to the Master and threw himself at his feet, crying out that if Jesus were willing, he could be cleaned of his foul disease. The leprosy was more dreaded than any other malady. In the lack of scientific knowledge characteristic of that time, many different forms of disorder seem to have passed under the one name of leprosy.

It covered nearly all forms of skin disease and eruptions from the mildest cases to those deep seated and incurable instances in which the limbs gradually rotted away and the patient was a helpless and terrifying mass of sores. Probably leprosy was not easily contagious. In essence it was a filth disease, induced by uncleanly habits and unsanitary surroundings. It is still found in Palestine and other parts of the East. The Turkish rule in Palestine compels the lepers to reside in one of the four cities, Hebron, Jerusalem, Shechem, and Tiberias. Western missionary enthusiasm has provided ample hospital accommodations for all the lepers in the land, but these wretched people prefer to live the life of freedom on the outskirts of these towns where they can marry and beg. Their unsightly and disgusting appearance is a fine asset in the indolent life of beggary which they lead.

The Compassion of Jesus.

In Old Testament times the leprosy was viewed as the stroke of God, a token of divine wrath upon evil deeds. Whatever pity, therefore, might have been evoked by the pathetic condition of these people was checked by the popular belief that they rested under the wrath of God, and must not be aided beyond the barest necessaries or life. Hence they were banished from the towns, both as capable of infecting others and because they were outlaws from the divine pleasure.

Jesus' kindness to these unhappy people was perhaps as much the result of his sympathy for their unjust ostracism from society as for their physical plague. Leprosy was supposed to be incurable, although, in the nature of the case, there were many recoveries from the milder form of the disease. Indeed the Levitical law had made explicit provision for sanitary inspection of lepers and their ceremonial reinstatement in the community when discovered to be whole once more (Leviticus 14:1-32). But ordinarily they were regarded as hopelessly outcast.

The Healing.

When this leper pleaded for cure, Jesus instantly expressed to him his willingness to heal him. What form of leprosy it was we have no means of knowing. Certainly Jesus did not undertake the healing of all those thus afflicted. His help was always given to those who showed the proper attitude of mind and could benefit beyond the mere healing of the body by his work of kindness and his words of counsel. It was with the customary touch that Jesus healed this man. There may have been in this act something to call out whatever latent faith and confidence the man possessed, and these were not without value in his recovery from the disease. Then, bidding him go and submit himself to the medical inspection of the priest, Jesus dismissed him.

The Roman Captain.

In that time there were many groups of Roman soldiers quartered in Palestine. There was even a fleet of Roman ships upon the sea of Galilee. One of the Roman captains came to the Master in Capernaum, apparently on this same day, and requested of Jesus the cure of his servant who was afflicted with palsy. Jesus answered at once that he would go and heal the sick man. But to this the Roman demurred, saying that he was unwilling to put Jesus to that trouble, but only requested him to speak the word where he was confident that it would be effective in the cure of his servant. He did not question the power of Jesus to command so simple a thing. He was himself a man of authority, able to order his soldiers and his servant about as he would. Why, then, should he doubt that Jesus could similarly command the disease to vanish?

Saving Faith.

When the Master heard these words, he turned with astonishment to the disciples, and with a touching appreciation of what the incident meant, he said to them, "Did you hear what this stranger says? He actually believes that I can perform the thing he asks. I have not found such faith any where among my own people." Jesus was deeply sensitive to men's faith in himself. Nothing wounded him more than to have his claims disregarded and his words disbelieved, and nothing gave him greater satisfaction than the knowledge that he was taken seriously. He added to the disciples that just such faith as this would constitute the saving element in his kingdom. Men would come from the East and the West to share in its blessings because of their faith in him, while the doubtful and unbelieving men of his own race could be passed by and left in that darkness which is the outer gloom of rejection and regret. The incident closed with assurance to the centurion that his servant was healed, and it was even so.

In Peter's Home.

In the town of Capernaum several of Jesus' disciples had their homes, among them, Peter. On this occasion his wife's mother was stricken with a fever, and perhaps for this reason Jesus came to Peter's home. Going up to the side of the invalid he touched her hand in his familiar way, and almost immediately she arose and took part in the work of entertaining the guests of the day. How much the very presence and confidence of Jesus would have to do with the cures he wrought, we can only conjecture. But both his word and his presence brought new life and strength to the sick. And his touch was as if he had imparted to them a current of life that restored them at once to health.

The Burden Bearer.

As soon as the Sabbath was over, at the sunset hour, the news of Jesus' presence spread throughout the vicinity and many sick people were brought to him for his help. No doubt he used here as elsewhere the same discriminating power in choosing the objects of his assistance. Time did not permit him to heal all the sick of the region, nor did his ministry require any such wholesome activity. Yet his heart went out to all the suffering, and as far as time and strength permitted, he ministered to their necessities. And thus the prophetic word was fulfilled, that the Messiah should take upon himself the ills of his people.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

Topic March 6: Christ Our Guide. Luke 1:76-79; John. 16:13; Rev. 7:16, 17.

Consecration Meeting.

In what is Christ our guide? In our attempt to gain heaven? No. Incidentally this may happen, it will happen to the true Disciple of Jesus, but this is not all. Christ is our guide in life—all life. "I am come that they might have life," he says. It is not even correct to say that he is our religious guide, unless we understand religion to compass the whole of life. Indeed our smaller conception of the scope and function of religion is inadequate. The idea that one's life is made up of compartments one of which is private and personal, another business, another political, and another religious, etc., misconceives life altogether. The personality is a unit and the different functions are but so many phases of its activity. Jesus seeks the heart of the personality that he may control it in all the phases of his activity. We are not to understand that Jesus outlines our programs in a political, commercial or even a religious way, except in broadest outline. But we must never overlook the fact that whatever we do in any field of activity has direct bearing upon and significance for, our relations as Christians. No Christian if he is reproached for some deed or habit which is inconsistent with the great life-ideals of Jesus, can plead that what he did was politics or business and was not to be judged, therefore, by the standards of Jesus. His limitations and obligations are moral and from them there can be no escape at any time, no matter what may engage our attention. If the Christian men who are moving in an influential way in our business and political life were to make their lives to conform to this truth many of the most pressing problems confronting this nation and the nations would find their own solution. In fact to the Christian mind this seems to be the only promise of permanent solution to the great social problem.

The manner in which Jesus seeks to guide us is interesting. He was not a law-giver. He did not employ stern and harsh commandments. He did not design specific programs. He did not even seek to anticipate the various and changing conditions in which individuals might find themselves through the coming centuries. A search for the literal word of our Lord to guide us would often be futile and an attempt to follow the literal words of Jesus would often miss the real thing which he sought to give. We would search in vain for any good of his to the locomotive engineer, a street car conductor, a machinist or a professor in a business college. For a man to turn both cheeks to one who would smite him and then pommel him until he is beyond recognition is to miss Jesus teaching of non-retaliation.

The great ideal which Jesus passed on to us is righteousness, i. e., his message to us is to seek to do right and live right. If we catch the spirit of his life and his message and seek to be like him we will at all times, in all places and under all circumstances in the spirit of fairness and justice. We will carry to our daily task the courage of our convictions and be true to our moral ideal whether in the office, the home, the store, or the shop. He who does that has made Christ his guide in the highest and best sense. To attempt to follow him any other way is self-delusion. God gives us strength and courage to move on this high plane.

The Missionary Spirit

By Mabelle Raymond.

No individual can be a true Christian without the missionary spirit, for the missionary spirit is the manifestation of the love of God in our hearts. It is not flowing, it is like a perpetual fountain giving forth life to weary pilgrims. Only from wells of love can spring waters of peace and hope and salvation.

The man in whose heart the missionary spirit does not dwell is infinitely poor and miserable. One of the most intolerable thoughts that can come to the mind of man is the one that he has lived in vain, that his life has borne neither fruits nor flowers, that the world has been made neither happier nor better because he has lived. This despair inevitably comes to every man who has lived for himself only. The man who pursues exclusively his own selfish ambitions will sooner or later know the bitterness of it. Ashes and withered leaves are the fruits of the selfish spirit.

The missionary spirit is pre-eminently unselfish, altruistic. In it self is forgotten in the needs of others. Petty ambitions and selfish purposes are forgotten in the general good. As we know, Christ was the greatest missionary who ever lived. He pleased not himself. He went about among his fellows doing good. How wonderful were his promises to the children of men! Did he not say, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest," and "He that believeth in me hath everlasting life?" He longed to give rest to the weary, strength to the weak and salvation to all mankind.

The missionary spirit springs from the very heart of God and the nearer we live to Him the more will our spirits come to be like His.

The missionary spirit cannot live in hearts where there is no charity. Life teaches us the infinite wisdom of Christ's words that "Charity is the greatest thing in the world." Could we realize the terrible bondage of the heritage which comes from by-gone generations to peoples of every nation we would truly pity instead of condemn and earnestly strive to free them.

The missionary spirit is all embracing, it stretches forth from those very near us to the uttermost parts of the earth. It takes in the sad-eyed neighbor's child as well as the degraded Hotentots. It is "no respector of persons."

Sometimes it seems that our hearts will break when we think of the needy, struggling hungry-hearted world around us. What a terrible thought to think of so many thousands, yea millions, living in darkness without the comfort and inspiration of that "most blessed of all hopes, the hope of immortality!" Why do we shut our hearts to these conditions? Why can we not hear humanity's cry so ceaseless and imploring? The needs of the suffering world around us are imperative. Today let us forget self and do what good we can. For many in every land, our own included, life brings its sorrows and its heartaches, and without helping, how can we bear to think of the intolerable lives of those who know not of the great joy of the hope of salvation.

Indianapolis, Ind.

News from the Foreign Society

A. F. Hensey and wife, who have already been out to Bolenge, Africa, during one term of service, and who have been at home for a time on furlough, will return, sailing May 31. Mr. Hensey has been a popular and convincing speaker before the rallies and the conventions, and has done much to arouse a larger interest in our mission work in the dark continent.

This February number of the Missionary Intelligencer is a gem. Yes, a sparkling diamond. It sparkles from every angle. May it bring showers of shekels.—J. Durham, Irvington, Cal.

E. L. Powell, pastor of the First Church, Louisville, Ky., was called to Nashville by the managers of the Laymen's Missionary Movement to make an address on Foreign Missions in that city.

During a recent visit of Secretary E. W. Allen to Canton, Mo., the church and college were made a living link in the Foreign Society. In the future they will have their own representative on the heathen field.

The members of the Advisory Committee of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society and the C. W. B. M. met in joint session at Jubbulpore, India, January 12 and 13. Much important business was transacted.

John G. MacGavran reports nine baptisms at Bilaspur, India, and six more will be baptized soon.

E. R. Moon, Bolenge, Africa, in a letter under date of December 20, 1909, and just received at the office of the Foreign Society, says: "Everything is lovely in Bolenge. The evangelists are in for the Christmas conference, so we are having meetings going almost day and night. We rejoice to know that more workers are to be added to our force. We have just received the good news of the dedication of the mission boat, the "S. S. Oregon," at the Centennial Convention. We are all well and as busy as we can be. My native carpenters and I are putting up a new building. It is of brick. We have a new kiln of brick ready to burn."

M. G. Buckner, minister of the church at Owensboro, Ky., reports fifty in his senior mission study class and twenty-five in the junior class. This means much for missions.

Last week a friend in Kentucky sent the Foreign Society $1,000 on the Annuity Plan.

In the death of L. L. Carpenter the Foreign Society loses one of its life members. He was the first life member enrolled on the records of the Foreign Society. He was its warm and liberal friend from the very first. He helped it every year from 1875 to 1910. Few men now remain on these earthly shores that were at that first meeting. These great men planned more wisely than they thought.

The church at Huntington, W. Va., C. H. Bass pastor, has decided to become a living link in the Foreign Society, and has chosen Mrs. A. F. Hensey, Bolenge, Africa, as their living link missionary.

John G. MacGavran and family and Dr. Mary T. MacGavran, all of India, will sail for England and America April 15, for their usual furlough. They expect to attend the World Missionary Convention in Edinburgh. O. J. Grainger and wife will also sail for America May 1, on their regular vacation. They will also probably attend the World Missionary Convention.

H. C. Saum of India, has been quite ill, but we rejoice to report that he is now rapidly improving. It will be remembered that he was at one time pastor of the church at Prairie Depot, Ohio.

Dr. W. N. Lemmon, the new missionary of the Foreign Society to the Philippine Islands, reached Manila January 3, after a journey, he says of forty-four days. He finds all in good health and glad to see him.

William M. Bobbitt, one of our good preachers at Emporia, Kans., says: "Oh, how wife and I would like to become a living link. If the good Lord prospers us and we live long enough we want one year just to see how good it would feel." Many hearts are turning in that direction. We are hoping that Brother Bobbitt will be able to carry out his good purpose.

George Darsie, Jr., pastor High Street Church, Akron, Ohio, which gave $1,248 including Sunday-school offering, last year for Foreign Missions, says: "Expect to pull for a big offering. We have the personal pledge card ready for the solicitors. I will give the whole month of February to the March offering, solicit every member of the church for the largest gift possible. I will resort to every legitimate means to make the offering what it ought to be. We follow up those who fail to give March 6. Will do my level best."

Church Life

The Iowa state convention is to be held at Boone, during the month of June.

O. H. Bolman, Havana, Ill., began a meeting February 13. W. H. Wellicome, Youngstown, Ohio, led the singing.

F. W. Norton has organized a men's Bible class in his church at St. Thomas, Ontario. There were forty charter members.

Dean H. H. Guy, of Berkeley Bible Seminary, has taken charge of the church at Pala Alto, Cal.

A revival meeting is being held by the church at Huntington, Ind., conducted by the pastor, E. W. Cole.

The Sunday-school at Urichsville, O., where Mr. Darsie is pastor, has a regular attendance of above 300.

Charles E. McVay of Hardy, Neb., will sing at Owosso, Mich., in September in a meeting with minister C. M. Keene.

George T. Meeker, pastor of the church at Petaluma, Cal., delivered the Lincoln memorial address in that city February 15.

A. D. Rogers who has been supplying the pulpit of the church at Denton, Texas, since the first of the year has accepted a call to become the pastor of the church.

Scott Anderson will close his pastorate with the Central Church, Pueblo, Colo., and will enter upon evangelistic work, making his headquarters at Enid, Okla.

The First Church, Milwaukee, Wis., enjoyed an address by F. E. Meigs, of Nankin, China, February 29. Mr. Meigs spoke at the Second Church in the evening.

The evangelists, Varney and Marks, are in a meeting in Elkhart, Ind. Good audiences are in attendance and great interest is being awakened.

J. M. Rudy, pastor of the church at Greencastle, Ind., read a paper on "The Philosophy of Christian Science" before the Indianapolis Ministerial Association, Monday, February 7.

H. G. Flemming has accepted a call to remain with the church at Charlottesville, Va., another year. Mr. Flemming is doing excellent work in this important field.

The church at Arkansas City, Kans., will begin a revival about the first of May, with Allen Wilson as evangelist. Thomas H. Popplewell is the pastor.

T. J. Golightly has closed his work with the church at Shenandoah, Iowa, preaching his last sermon in the church Sunday evening February 13.

The Sunday-school at Pittsburg, Kans., is rejoicing in an attendance of more than four hundred. S. J. Smith, the pastor is pushing vigorously the work there and is being heard by large and increasing audiences.

I. N. McCash, secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society, preached at the First Church, Valparaiso, Ind., February 13. His sermon subject was, "Reason and Religion."

The annual report of the church at Canon City, Colo., shows a present membership of 245, a net increase during the year of twenty-one. The total receipts for the year were $2,654.56.

W. E. Reavis after two years of service will close his work with the church at Stanberry, Mo. March 1. The congregation has voted an expression of the love and esteem in which Mr. and Mrs. Reavis are held in the church and the community.

John S. Collins, assistant superintendent of public instruction in St. Louis, Mo., delivered an address before the ministers' association of that city on the subject, "The Public Schools and Their Relation to Instruction in Religion."

J. Frank Green, late of Marietta, Ohio, entered upon his work as pastor of the church at Cadillac, Michigan. In going to Cadillac, Mr. Green goes back to his native state, and The Christian Century wishes him success in his new work.

George P. Rutledge has been for thirteen years with his church in Philadelphia. The works is growing steadily. There are additions to the church almost every week. Mr. Rutledge is planning to begin a meeting with home forces early in March.

Charles Darsie completed five years of service with the church at Urichsville, Ohio, the third Sunday in February, and observed the day by an appropriate sermon. Mr. Darsie is doing a very successful work, and is greatly beloved by his people.

J. T. T. Hundley has been recalled to the pastorate of the church at Norfolk, Va., at an increase of $200 in the yearly salary. This church under the ministry of Mr. Hundley has seen baptisms almost every Sunday evening.

F. K. Shellenberger addressed a union meeting of the men of the Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian and Christian churches at Muncie, Ind., in February. This church is to begin a meeting about the first of April. President R. H. Crossfield of Lexington, will be the preacher.

The C. W. B. M. of the church at Berkeley, has become a living link, supporting Mr. and Mrs. Ghormley and wife of India. H. J. Loken has just become pastor of this church, and likes it better as the days pass. It is a great church and will doubtless do a great work under the leadership of Mr. Loken.

Austin Hunter of the Jackson Boulevard Church, Chicago, was the guest of honor at the banquet and annual meeting of the Men's Club of the First Church, Valparaiso, Indiana. He spoke to the men on the subject, "The Disciples and the Movement Toward Christian Union."

Ray E. Rice, member of the First Church, Lincoln, Nebraska, and a student in the University of Nebraska, preparing for the ministry, has been appointed chaplain of the Nebrasak Hospital for the insane. When Mr. Rice has completed his work in the University of Nebraska, he will continue his studies in one of the eastern universities.

The meetings at the University Place Church, Des Moines, led by I. J. Spencer, of Lexington, Ky., began Tuesday evening, February 15. Special services have been and are being held in all the other churches of the city. In the Capitol Hill meeting just closed, there were 135 accessions.

Evangelists W. H. Kindred and H. E. Winters have just closed a revival at Chandlersville, Ill., with forty-three additions to the church. This church has outgrown its house of worship, and will face the question of a new building at once. I. A. Ingle is pastor.

As he enters the pastorate of the Central Church, Denver, George B. Van Arsdall changes the order of the regular prayer meeting services. He has announced to his church that he will on Wednesday evenings deliver a series of lectures on the general theme, "The Story of the Bible and How to Study the Book."

In the special meetings in the church at South Bend, Indiana, where the preaching was by Evangelist O. L. Hill, and J. J. D. Hill is the pastor, there were fifty accessions to the church. The meetings closed Monday evening, February 7, and a reception was given the new members on the following evening.

The Young Men's Class of the church at Altoona, Iowa, of which the pastor, L. G. Parker, is teacher, gave a banquet February 5, when Charles S. Medbury, University Church, Des Moines, gave the principal address. The Drake University orchestra furnished the music. The event is spoken of as the greatest of the kind ever held in that section of the country.

John A. Jayne, of Pittsburg, who served as chairman of the publicity committee during the latter part of the Centennial campaign, has accepted a call to the pastorate of the church at Hampton, Va. Mr. Jayne has been a pastor in Pittsburg for nine years. The churches of the Old Dominion will welcome him to their tasks and joys.

At a banquet of the Men's Club of the Central Church, Des Moines, held recently the principal speaker was Governor Carroll, who spoke on the work of men in the church. Other speakers were, Dean Norton, Drake University whose subject was, "The Call of the Church," and Dwight L. A. Manuel, and the pastor of the church, Finis Idleman.

The meetings at Tulsa, Okla., led by George L. Snively are growing in interest. Before February 8, there were forty-six accessions to the church. Large audiences are attending all the meetings, and the entire town is being greatly interested by the work of the evangelist. Mr. Sniff is the leader of song.

There have been fifty additions in the meeting held by the Central Church, Kansas City, Kans., where T. M. Myers is the pastor. This meeting, conducted by the forces of the church, is as quiet and normal as the regular Sunday services, but the meeting has been felt by the church to have been most helpful.

T. F. Rawlings writes that the church at Phoenix, Ariz., of which he is pastor has just closed a meeting, which resulted in twenty-one accessions to the church. He commends highly the work of Samuel W. Jackson and wife of Portland, who had charge of the preaching and the music. From Phoenix they went to Junction City, Ore.

J. F. Findley has resigned his pastorate at Fort Collins, Colo., and will close his work the first of July. Mr. Findley has announced his plan to start August 1 on a tour of the globe. During the four years Mr. Findley has been pastor of this church 514 persons have been received into the fellowship of the church. The church has raised more than nine thousand dollars for current expenses and $1,331 for missions.

J. E. Gorsuch was formerly installed as pastor of the church at Brazil, Ind., Wednesday evening, February 9. The principal address was by J. M. Rudy, pastor at Greencastle, the charge to the pastor, by J. B. Jones of Marion, a college friend of Mr. Gorsuch. S. D. Dutcher, pastor at Terre Haute, delivered the charge to the congregation.

Dr. Edward S. Ames, as is his custom, will preach a special series of sermons during Lent. His general subject will be "Growth in Character," and the special topics, beginning February 13 and closing March 27, are: "Through Individual Experience," " "Through the Imagination," "Through Institutions," "Through Great Tasks," "Through Emotional Experiences" "Through Loss and Defeat," "Easter: Through Great Triumphs."

A unique plan is being used by the Sunday school of the First Church, Lincoln, Nebraska, to secure the prompt attendance of its pupils. Each Sunday morning one class of the school gives a concert promptly at the hour for the school to open. This is so interesting to the pupils that they will not allow themselves to be tardy. This school by the way is doing excellent work. It is thoroughly graded, using the Bethany lessons, and has an attendance ranging between four and five hundred.

A. McLean, of Cincinnati, Ohio, M. D. Adams, of India, and R. Ray Eldred, of Africa, made a tour of the Virginia city churches in the interest of foreign missions. These foreign mission rallies are always helpful and interesting, but they were especially so this year because of the moving pictures, showing the life of many of the countries in which the work is being conducted.

"There are two ways of building up a Bible-school. We have tried both ways in Uhrichsville. One way is to boom the attendance and nothing else. The trouble with that way is that when you have gotten the room full of scholars you are really teaching them very little. The best way is to organize a school that can give valuable training in return for the support of its students. Make the school worth attending and all who really want to learn will appreciate it."—Charles Darsie.

In the meeting at Vincennes, Indiana, which has been continuing for three weeks, there were, at last report, 401 accessions to the church. Evangelist Wilhite and his party of helpers have been working with great earnestness. The church is enthusiastic over the results of the meeting. A local paper reports when at the close of the evening service the four hundredth person came forward to unite with the church, the audience broke into applause. William Oeschger is pastor of this church.

L. L. Carpenter, the veteran church dedicator, of Wabash, Ind., died in Kansas City February 13. The funeral service was held in Wabash, Ind., February 16, at 2 p. m. This announcement, though not unexpected, will bring sorrow to many a heart among the older men, and indeed many of the younger men who have come to know the genial disposition and faithful character of L. L. Carpenter, the faithful preacher, and devoted Christian.

The Men's Club at New Berlin, Ohio, is a live affair. At a recent meeting they were addressed by George Darsie of Akron, who gave them his lecture, "Hot Trails." This is the first time in two years that the club has gone away from its own city for a speaker. At a recent meeting they were addressed by a local Catholic priest. This shows a "catholic" spirit. The pastor of this church, Robert B. Chapman, is being assisted in a meeting by Percy H. Wilson of Akron.

W. B. Hendershot, pastor of the church at Martinsville, Va., has been with the church at Downsville, Md., in a three weeks meeting. There were twenty-two additions. W. S. Hoye has been pastor of the churches at Downsville and Beaver Creek for twenty-seven years. At Martinsville, where Mr. Hendershot is pastor, the work moves encouragingly. There are additions to the church nearly every Sunday. The Sunday-school has been thoroughly graded and its attendance is increasing daily.

Since Charles Darsie became pastor of the church at Urichsville, Ohio, there have been 467 additions to the church, a net gain of 256, giving the church a present membership of 785. The church has contributed to all purposes, $24,537; of this $3,436 was for missions and benevolences. The Sunday-school has been carefully graded and the attendance increased from 235 to 356. A men's reading room is maintained at the church, and within the last year property has been purchased for a second church in the city.

The church at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, it is announced is putting forth unusual effort to induce R. F. Thrapp, pastor of the church at Jacksonville, Ill., to accept the pastorate of the church just vacated by George B. Van Arsdall. Tuesday evening, February 8, the church gave a reception in the church parlors at which time Mr. Thrapp was present to meet the members of the congregation and become somewhat acquainted with their work. It is not announced whether Mr. Thrapp will accept. His church at Jacksonville, with a membership of over a thousand, and Sunday-school attendance of more than 500, and one of the best church buildings to be found among the Disciples, is devoted to its pastor and will not willingly give him up.

Resolutions of tender regard and gratitude to God for the splendid services of the late L. L. Carpenter were passed by the State Board of the Indiana Sunday-school Association, in whose organization he was the moving spirit and who represented its work as state evangelist for seventeen years; the Board of Directors of the Bethany Assembly, an institution which he organized and whose presidency he held for nearly a quarter of a century; and by the Indiana State Missionary Board. These resolutions all speak in terms of the utmost appreciation of the leadership of this great spirit and extend to Mrs. Carpenter in tenderest terms their sincere condolences.

The church at Waynesburg, Pa., has just closed a meeting of three weeks with thirty-nine additions, twenty-eight of them by baptism. Wallace Tharp of North Side Pittsburg, did the preaching and Joseph A. Joyce of Sheridan, Pittsburg, had charge of the song service. Each of these men proved himself to be a master workman. One of the results of the meeting is that the church at the suggestion of Mr. Tharp and with his aid in raising the money, will send their minister, F. A. Bright, on a tour to Bible Lands. He has been with the church for four years, and it is understood that he will remain at least two years more. This trip is given him as a token of appreciation of the work he has done and as an investment for good work in the future. The church will pay the direct expense of the trip.

From December 30 till January 29, John E. Pounds and wife, of Hiram, Ohio, were with the First Church, Bloomington, Ill., in a meeting. The unusually cold weather of this period decreased the audiences during the week, but on Sunday the seating capacity of the church was taxed. While the church had made no effort to secure an especially large number of additions, yet there were twenty-one added to its membership. Of the work of Mr. and Mrs. Pounds, and their daughter, the pastor, Edgar De Witt Jones, says: "Mr. Pounds' preaching was enjoyed by all of us. There is a freshness, and epigrammatical quality to his pulpit work which makes it very delightful. Some of his sermons were Poundesque. This was particularly true of his sermon on the "Foolish Wise Man," also on "The Rich made Poor," and "The Catholicity of the Gospel." The presence of Mrs. Pounds was a delight and an uplift to our community, She spoke for the Woman's Club and before a union meeting of the C. W. B. M. Societies of the three Christian churches and always with great acceptability. Miss Bertha Pounds had charge of the singing and each night sang solos. She quite captivated our people by her simple and unaffected yet altogether helpful singing."

In order to meet the great demand for Sample Copies of the Bethany Graded Lessons the publishers have decided to send out Returnable samples of the complete line of supplies—Beginners', Primary and Junior—(excepting the large Beginners' pictures). Accompanying the samples a bill will be sent for $1.09, the regular price of the set. The recipient may do one of three things: (1) He may return the samples uninjured after examination. (2) He may remit $1.09 and keep the samples. Or (3) he may return the bill with his Sunday school's order for supplies and the publishers will mark it "paid." In writing for sample copies please say "Returnable."

At the beginning of the present month the board of elders of the church at Englewood, Ill., made a report concerning their organization which was adopted. This report provides for a good plan of organization that may be suggestive to other churches. They are: (1) The communion committee, whose duty it is to see that the emblems are provided, and that the service is made as helpful as possible; (2) Bible-school, duty, to keep in touch with the work of the Sunday-school, and report its progress to the general board of the church; (3) Endeavor societies, duty, to work with the C. E. societies and aid them in all their work; (4) Prayer meeting, to have charge of all the prayer meetings, appoint leaders and arrange topics and programs, etc.; (5) Missionary committee, to keep posted on all missionary work of the church, and lead the church in this work; (6) Library committee, to have charge of all books, papers, and other matters in the library, and to collect historical matter, relating especially to the local church and the work in Chicago; (7) The music committee, to develop the music and encourage the congregation to commit to memory a few of the old hymns of the church; (8) Committee on celebrations and entertainments, to consider the whole year's work and arrange for such meetings as seem to them wise; (9) the visitation committee, to superintend systematic visitation by the members of the church and the societies; (10) Committee on coöperation with other congregations; (11) Committee on church growth and development, to suggest plans and meetings that shall tend to harmonize all the different elements of the church, and bring each to its highest efficiency; (12) Committee on the relation of the church to the community, to study the methods of the societies for the betterment of the community and the way in which the church can coöperate with them. (13) Committee on the use of the house, to consider the purpose and nature of all meetings to be held in the building and to pass upon their desirability.

What The Brethren Are Saying

The church I serve gives as much for missions and benevolence as it spends on local expenses. This year our purpose is to double our missionary contributions.—H. Mahon, Ebensburg, Pa.

Our plea commits us to missions. If we are not a missionary people we should give our plea to somebody that is.—Lawson Campbell, Indiana, Pa.

The church needs a great objective for her own sake. Missions is the only thing that can lift the church out of littleness and selfishness.—George W. Knepper, Wilkinsburg, Pa.

I propose that the church I serve shall be an Every Member Church.—C. L. Morrison, Wellsville, O. (An "Every Member Church" is one in which every member gives for Foreign Missions.)

Every idol is an indication of the hunger of the heart for God. The man who is concerned about his own private affairs is a less noble character than the man who worships an idol. The one is feeling after God; the

There is nothing provincial or parochial or sectional in Christianity. The gospel is for all mankind.—George Saunders, Bethany, W. Va.

The New Testament is a missionary volume by direct statement and by necessary inference.—Frank Custer, Barnesville, O.

Our theory is correct; the defect is in our practice. One may confess Christ with his lips and deny him with his pocketbook.—E. P. Wise, East Liverpool, O.

We are driving away at the Living-link with might and main. We expect it and will be bitterly disappointed if we fail. I called my men together and put it up to them. They will make the canvass.—George W. Knepper, Wilkinsburg, Pa.

The most comprehensive word in the language is missions.—Wallace Tharp, Allegheny, Pa.

The greatest work in the church is the work of Foreign Missions. No man in the pulpit can be true to his Lord, who does not plead for missions.—John H. Mullady, Claysville, Pa.

I can remember when there were no missionary volunteers. Now they are found in all our colleges. The volunteer is a sign of promise.—M. J. Grable, Salem, O.

Loyalty to Christ in the largest sense means giving freely, systematically and joyously. Carey and Livingstone gave their lives and their all. They were the world's greatest givers.—J. R. Glenn, Bethany, W. Va.

We plead for absolute personal devotion to Jesus Christ. That involves an interest in the cause of world-wide evangelization. He has commanded; it is for us to obey.—W. E. Hootman, New Cumberland, W. Va.

We are going to have the greatest March Offering in our history. The Rallies are splendid.—A. McLean.

We are having good Rallies. I believe the churches will increase their offerings.—S. J. Corey.

I. J. Cahill is in a meeting at Campbellstown, Ohio. From there he will go to New Paris.

E. D. Salkeld of Lakewood, Ohio, will assist F. D. Butchart of the Aetna St. Church, Cleveland, in a series of meetings this month.

P. H. Welshimer began an eight-day evangelistic campaign with home forces at Canton, Ohio, February 27.

The churches of Holmes county, Ohio, will unite this year in supporting a living link on the foreign field.

Roy L. Brown and Miss Una Dell Berry are assisting the church at Collinwood, Ohio, in a meeting this month.

M. E. Chatley did the preaching in his own meeting at Bowling Green, Ohio, being assisted in the music by J. P. Garmong.

C. A. Freer, of Millersburg, Ohio, is doing the preaching in a three weeks' meeting at Nashville, the same state.

J. E. Lynn, pastor of the Central Christian Church, Warren, Ohio, has asked to be released from the pastorate of that historic church that he may accept a call to the Central Christian Church of Pueblo, Colo. He has been at Warren six years. During that time 760 members were received into the Central Church and in round numbers $52,000 raised for all purposes of which $15,000 was for missions, education, etc. The Central, Pueblo, is one of the best churches in Colorado outside of Denver, Pueblo being the second city in size in the state.

J. E. Lynn.

V. G. Hostetter has resigned at Fostoria, Ohio, after a ministry of three years. About 200 were added to the church in that time. He closes his pastorate March 1.

Frank Brown will do the preaching in an evangelistic effort with his congregation at Coshocton, Ohio. His brother from Cleveland will have charge of the music.

In our issue of December 30, The Christian Century made an error which has been called to our attention. We there say that we received letters signed by the official boards of the churches at Barnett and Litchfield, Ill., warning the churches against J. R. Campbell, a Christian minister. Instead of Litchfield we should have stated Cameron, Ill. We have no communication from the board of the church at Litchfield.

The Ohio convention will meet at Toledo this year. But the date has been postponed a week on account of the Sunday-school gathering at Washington. The date will be May 31-June 3. A good program is in preparation. Deacon E. I. Bosworth of Oberlin will conduct the devotional Bible studies.

The Richmond Avenue Church of Christ, Buffalo, N. Y., lifted $2,919.74 for missions in 1909, which includes $452.84 contributed for a special campaign instead of the usual evangelistic meetings. Its operating expenses were $4,199.40. This statement comes pretty near justifying a challenge to any church of our brotherhood. Raphael Harwood Miller is the minister.

We regret to learn that Ernest J. Sias, who recently resigned the pulpit at Frankfort, Ky., has been ill in an Indianapolis hospital for nearly a month and is yet unable to answer the large correspondence that has come to him in regard to supplying the Frankfort pulpit. This correspondence, he asks us to say, has been turned over to E. A. Spray, chairman of the pulpit supply committee. Mr. Sias' intention is to devote his time to the lecture field.

W. B. Clemmer, recently of Rock Island, began his new pastorate at Rockford, Ill., the first Sunday in February. He speaks a hearty word of praise for the good work done by W. D. Ward and O. F. Jordan, his immediate predecessors in the pastorate there, saying that they both did good work of an "enduring and constructive nature." This is always a sign of a pastor's good spirit when he speaks well of the workers who went before him. Another sign of this pastor's good quality is his remark that The Christian Century tastes good. It is clean and stimulating, and perhaps best of all free from the 'boost me and I'll boost you' propaganda." We thank Mr. Clemmer for his appreciation and wish him a long and prosperous ministry at Rockford.

The returns from Children's Day for Home-Missions continue to show an increasing liberality from a larger number of schools. 1,053 schools have sent in $12,750.57 up to date since November 21, 1910. This is an increase of $1,633.71 over the receipts for the same period last year. Many schools have taken the offering and have delayed remittance. Every school should know that one-half of its offering goes to Bible-school work. No greater opportunity is before the Bible-schools to help both Home Mission work and the Bible school work in their state. Remember the slogan, "A square deal for Home Missions, and $50,000 from the Bible-schools."

The Seventh Church, Indianapolis, has just closed a splendid meeting conducted by the pastor, Clay Trusty, assisted by E. A. Blackman as song leader. There were 181 additions, 105 of them on confession of faith. Since Mr. Trusty became pastor here two years ago 447 persons have been received into the church. They have not only quantity but quality. The Sunday-school is graded, with five adult Bible classes, one men's class averaging thirty-six in attendance and an elementary department using the Bethany Graded Lessons. Mr. Trusty says the new supplies which they have just received from The New Christian Century Company, are "making good." Two features of the school are the cradle roll, with 110 names, and a home department of 100, of whom sixty report their lessons studied each week and send a contribution to the work. A. C. Ward is the superintendent and E. S. Cummings superintendent of the primary department.

I. J. Spencer of the Central Church, Lexington, Ky., has just closed a short meeting, that extended over two Sundays, with the Central Church, Warren, Ohio, of which J. E. Lynn, the pastor, says: "The meeting will long be remembered. Mr. Spencer's work was solid, substantial, abiding. He gave a series of ten sermons on such themes as, The One Authority, The One Name, The One Faith, The One Spirit, The One Baptism, The One Basis of Unity, The One Confession, etc. In this series he restated in vital form the great fundamentals of the Gospel. They were sermons with a message." There were fifty-five accessions to the church most of them by baptism. Not only by his preaching but by his winning personality Brother Spencer won a large place in the hearts of the people and did much good. He goes to the University Place Church, Des Moines, for a meeting of the same length.

I. Raymond Lines, who accepted a call to the Monroe Street Church, Chicago, has just begun his work there. He comes from Newman, Ill., where he was only in the opening of a prosperous pastorate. Mr. Lines' former pastorates were Toledo, Ohio, and Ladoga, Ind. He is a graduate of Hiram College. The Monroe street people are responding to his leadership heartily.

I. Raymond Lines.

Eureka College will receive $1,000 from the estate of the late Mr. Peter Whitmer of Bloomington, Ill.; also $1,000 from the estate of the late Mr. LeRoy Wiley of Paris, Ill. These men were good friends of Eureka College.

SHE QUIT
But It Was a Hard Pull.

It is hard to believe that coffee will put a person in such a condition as it did an Ohio woman. She tells her own story:

"I did not believe coffee caused my trouble, and frequently said I liked it so well I would not, and could not quit drinking it, but I was a miserable sufferer from heart trouble and nervous prostration for four years.

"I was scarcely able to be around, had no energy and did not care for anything. Was emaciated and had a constant pain around my heart until I thought I could not endure it. For months I never went to be dexpecting to get up in the morning. I felt as though I was liable to die any time.

"Frequently I had nervous chills and the least excitement would drive sleep away, and any little noise would upset me terribly. I was gradually getting worse until finally one time it came over me and I asked myself what's the use of being sick all the time and buying medicine so that I could indulge in coffee?

"So I thought I would see if I could quit drinking coffee and go tsome Postum to help me quit. I made it strictly according to directions and I want to tell you, that change was the greatest step in my life. It was easy to quit coffee because I had the Postum which I now like better than the old coffee.

"One by one the old troubles left, until now I am in splendid health, nerves steady, heart all right and the pain all gone. Never have any more nervous chills, don't take any medicine, can do all my housework and have done a great deal beside."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Dr. Willett was the university preacher at Yale on Sunday, February 13. He delivered lectures at N. Tonawanda, New York, on the evenings of the 10th and the 11th, and addressed the Campbell Club of Yale University on Monday, the 14th.

W. J. Lhamon spent a few hours in Chicago recently en route from Wellsville, New York, to his home in Des Moines. His recent meeting in Wellsville was of great value to the church. There were about fifty additions.

The Ionia, Mich., church held a four weeks' meeting in January with E. B. Barnes, pastor of Lyon St. Church, Grand Rapids, evangelist. There were thirty-five additions to the church. The church has been much helped by this meeting and greatly appreciates the work of the evangelist. Miss Ella Massey was leader of the music. G. Webster Moore is the pastor there.

During the week of March 28 to April 1 the fifth annual lecture course of the Ministerial Association of Eureka College is to be given. For the last few years, the lecture courses given under the auspices of the association have been of a strictly theological nature, and the lectures have been given by such men as McGarvey, Dungan and Richardson. This year, the students making up the association consider themselves very fortunate in having been able to secure Charles Stelzle, "the Apostle of Labor," to give the week of lectures. The general theme of the course will be "Christianity and Social Problems." There will be five lectures in all on such subjects as: Social Conditions Confronting the Church, and Jesus Christ as a Social Reformer. The final one on "Social Problems in our Great Cities" will be illustrated by the stereopticon and moving pictures. Besides these there will be round-table discussions in the afternoons, at the close of recitations, at which there will be questions and answers and open discussion of the lectures and related topics.

Miss Lemert's Campaign at Troy

Last Saturday Miss Eva Lemert, our great Bible school specialist, left Troy after a campaign of one month. In many particulars this was the most difficult field that Miss Lemert has nad to labor in. Ninety per cent of our surrounding population is Roman Catholic. The other ten per cent is divided up among several Protestant churches. In addition to this, we struck every kind of weather from a severe rain storm through zero weather to several feet of snow. In spite of all these difficulties, the campaign was a great success. Miss Lemert's institute work is worth all that her campaign cots in time and money, if nothing in addition to that were done. She has the ability not only to conceive of great Bible school designs but to impart her vision to others, and so inspire them with the dignity of Bible school work as to make them strive to reach the vision. Our Bible school was greatly enlarged in numbers, the teaching staff and officers were inspired to better work, and the whole school has settled down to a more vigorous and happy line of activity. We are all exceedingly glad that Miss Lemert has come. At Troy we count her campaign as worth far more than any evangelistic service that might have been held. One of the splendid things about Miss Lemert's work is the fact that she never loses sight of the great end and aim of Bible school work. She never tries to boom a school, nor does she try to build up one school at the expense of another. She places Bible school work upon the lofty plain of apostolic, personal evangelism. The aim is always to reach men, women and children that their lives may be made brighter and happier through the knowledge of Christ. We expected great things of Miss Lemert. She surpassed our expectations. We found her personally much greater than even we had expected to find her. Fortunate indeed is the church and Bible school that can secure her for one month.

CECIL J. ARMSTRONG.

As We Go to Press

Wichita, Kan., February 17.—Nine hundred men at Laymen's Missionary convention tonight. J. Campbell White gave wonderful address on world-wide evangelism.—W. S. Priest.

Vincennes, Ind., February 20.—Meeting five weeks old. Four hundred and fifty-six added. Fifty-five during last week, sixteen today. The entire week very stormy. The interest as great as ever. Will close one week from tonight. Expect to close with more than five hundred additions.—William Oeschger.

Wichita, Kan., February 19.—Eleven hundred delegates at Oklahoma Laymen's Missionary convention. Great enthusiasm. Churches voted to double offerings for foreign missions. One thousand delegates at Wichita. Our church led in per capita giving last year. Voted to double this year.—E. W. Allen.

Newark, Ohio, February 20—Forty additions today, twenty-eight tonight, 167 in seven days. Storm and cold cannot overcome the enthusiasm and interest of the Lord's people. The high school auditorium, seating 1,100, was filled today at a men's meeting. We are antagonizing wickedness among those in high places. The gospel is triumphant.—W. T. Brooks.

Kansas City, Mo., February 21.—The Scoville evangelistic company is with the Linwood Ave. Church, Burris A. Jenkins, pastor. One hundred and twenty-three accessions in seven days of invitation. This church is located in the wealthy section of the city, hence in the hardest possible field to reach. Audiences, interest and results have been most remarkable for this first week.—W. J. Minges.

Elkhart, Ind., February 21.—Three hundred and fifty in Sunday-school yesterday, largest in history of church. Twenty-three confessions, total of eighty-eight in twenty-two days. S. G. Buckner a great worker. Continue few days.—Varney and Marks.

North Tonawanda, N. Y., February 20.—Overflowing crowds, great interest, thirty confessions today. Pastor Edward F. Randall has done great work here. His preparation is the right sort. Church enthusiastic and hopeful. Tonawanda has all the conservatism of the East, but stirred to great interest. Gordon called to death bed of his mother; returns this week.—Allen Wilson, Evangelist.

Cleveland, Ohio, February 20—Collinwood's greatest day. Thirty-five added. Fifty-one first week. Miss Berry's second engagement here. Singing and leading great chorus. M. L. Buckley on his fifth year. Owing to change of plans may have March open. Write or wire Collingwood, Ohio. We continue.—Roy L. Brown.

BOOKS! BOOKS!

Rev. Nelson G. Brown was one of the most widely-read preachers among the Disciples. His death some months ago leaves a large, up-to-date library which is now offered for sale at greatly reduced prices. The library contains a set of the Critical Commentary and of the Expositor's Bible. Hundreds of the choicest books a preacher could wish may he had. Write to Mrs. N. G. Brown, Manchester, Iowa, for a list and prices.

Now is the Nick o' Time to Place Your Order for the Bethany Graded Lessons. A New Junior Term of four months (for pupils 9 to 12 years) is just beginning. The new quarter for Beginners and Primary begins April 3. The literature you order now will thus supply your three elementary grades until July 1. Remember, the Bethany supplies are only for your pupils under twelve years of age. Place the main bulk of your order wherever you wish, but give your younger children the best religious instruction ever put into any Sunday school. Send for our convenient order blank at once. "Old Kentucky Leads"

The following is the latest report of the interesting contest for state banner for the largest offering from the largest number of schools for Children's Day for Home Missions:

State	Schools	Offering
Kentucky	289	$3,645.99
Illinois	147	1,278.23
Kansas	123	1,177.94
Ohio	112	1,561.19
Indiana	65	994.11
Missouri	44	550.38
Iowa	23	144.96

It looks as if Kentucky was a winner. Many large schools have not yet sent in their offerings. The matter should not be delayed longer. All offerings should be sent immediately to the American Christian Missionary Society, Y. M. C. A. Building, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Wisconsin

The brethren of Wisconsin have honored me by calling me to become their general missionary and corresponding secretary. I wish I could express the gratitude which I hold in my heart for the confidence in me, thus indicated by these hopeful, consecrated followers of Christ. I am thankful to God for this dignified service which he has permitted me to enter. I have been on the field but a short time, having entered into the work February 1. I have seen enough to know that our work is not strong, but that there are wonderful possibilities. My reception on the part of the board has been most cordial and I am encouraged in the assurances of their loyal support. As soon as I can get my plans perfected I expect to visit all the churches and anticipate only the glad hand in all my visits. We are indeed sorry that we are soon to lose Claire L. Waite, who is a member of the state board from the First Church of Milwaukee. We are greatly encouraged by the report of a splendid meeting at Richland Center held by Evangelists Nay and Davis, Thomas Wallace being the efficient pastor. We hope to establish the cause which we all love so much in Green Bay in the near future. We come to Wisconsin with the determination to give to the work the very best there is within us, and we feel sure that as in the past God will use us to His honor and glory.
Green Bay, Wis. FRANK L. VAN VOORHIS.

Lathrop Cooley

The following resolutions were unanimously adopted b the Board of Managers of the Ohio Missionary Society at the February meeting:

Whereas, the Heavenly Father has called to his eternal reward our fellow-member and beloved brother, Lathrop Cooley, therefore be it

Resolved, That a wise counsellor, and noble executive, and a judicious servant of our society has been taken from us, and that this organization thereby sustains a distinct loss; that the Ohio fellowship shall miss a saintly presence, and the brotherhood at large a thoroughly representative Christian man.

Resolved, That we call especial attention to his abiding and practical interest in educational, missionary and benevolent enterprise, and urge upon all the necessity of emulating his splendid example.

Resolved, That while our deep sympathy goes out to his entire family in their sorrow, yet even in our sadness, we can but rejoice that his beautiful life was spared far past man's allotted time upon the earth, and that with faith triumphant he drifted so peacefully into the Haven of Rest.

Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon the records of this society, a copy sent to the family of our deceased brother, and same be published in our religious papers.—A. A. Teachout, H. E. McMillin, H. Newton Miller, Committee.

Yeuell in a Co-operative Meeting

Herbert Yeuell has just closed a meeting in York, Neb. Two weeks before starting Mr. Yeuell came over from Fairbury and laid the plans for a town wide meeting in a new garage and our budget of expenses amounted to nearly $500. The garage, seating 1500, was filled the first night. Scores of young men have come. Families that were indifferent to our small standing and had gone into other churches have taken their stand with us. The business men were interested and invited Mr. Yeuell to address them one Monday night. Many business men have come. In all there were over 200 confessions. About 100 came to us. There were only thirteen nights of invitation. Seventy came the last three days, forty-five the last night. The garage was owned by members of other churches and the seats belonged to the ministerial alliance. York had suffered many things at the hands of sensational evangelists. The business men raised a subscription and testimonials as a token of appreciation of Mr. Yeuell's clean-cut methods and especially the simplicity of the invitations. Mrs. Yeuell conducted a Bible class for young folk every afternoon and a few nights before the meetings closed over a hundred of the class gathered in a section and for fifteen minutes gave a demonstration of the wonderful work of Mrs. Yeuell's teaching. Mr. Albert E. Buss handled a large chorus every night in a masterly manner. His cornet work is a wonderful element in his success. To see members of all churches for the time being united and to see our own members that have hitherto scorned us come out fully ont the Lord's side, to see members of other churches asking to be baptized and yet no sectarian bitterness engendered, to see the ministers endorsing the unlabeled gospel and closing their prayer meetings and offering to close Sunday services, was a situation which one month ago would have been regarded as the dream of a madman. The United Brethren, Evangelical, and the Methodist ministers, whose church overshadows all others combined, having a membership of a thousand, have freely and cheerfully used our garage baptistry. W. E. Brandenburg is our minister.

SHOW LAST WEEK'S CHRISTIAN CENTURY

To the Superintendent of Your Sunday School and

The Teachers of the Younger Classes

Perhaps they do not know that a Brotherhood publishing house is putting into the wide-awake schools of the Disciples the most fascinating, artistic, scientific, and, withal, the simplest system of Sunday school supplies ever printed.

IT IS YOUR DUTY TO INFORM THEM. WE BELIEVE EVERY READER WILL COUNT IT A PLEASURE TO DO SO.

If you do not wish to part with your own copy send us their names and addresses and we will send a copy to each one.

THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO.
700 EAST FORTIETH ST., CHICAGO

Christian College

Christian College began the second semester of its fifty-ninth year with increased numbers in the dormitory and with all departments well organized and doing excellent work.

A strong Y. W. C. A. was organized in November, and at an enthusiastic meeting of faculty and students held just before the holidays, $155 was raised by voluntary subscriptions to send one faculty and two student representatives to the Student Volunteer Conference which met in Rochester, N. Y. The splendid reports of the conference made by these representatives upon their return have brought the great subject of missions to our hearts with renewed strength and insistence. Three earnest Mission Study Classes are gaining theoretical knowledge of missions, and practical work is being done by the Y. W. C. A. girls among the children and their mothers of our needy district in Columbia.

Many students enter for special courses in the Schools of Music, Art, Elocution and Domestic Science, the last named being especially popular. A new course has been added to this department on Home Management, and the young women are taught the dignity of being home-makers. It is hoped in the near future to have a separate building entirely devoted to this great work.

Just now Christian College and all of its friends are looking forward to the early erection of a splendid new Academic Hall, to be known as the J. S. Dorsey Memorial Building. On February 22nd the old, historic Martha Washington Society will give its fifty-fourth annual open session.

LUELLA WILCOX ST. CLAIR.

Meeting at Little Rock

The greatest meeting ever held in the south and the fourth largest ever held anywhere by the Disciples has come to a close. From the time when Mr. Scoville was engaged there was always a feeling of uncertainty as to the results. Our people are not strong in the south. When we read the reports of great meetings elsewhere, I was frequently asked, "How many converts do you expect here?" My answer was, "I hope there will be not less than three hundred."

As to the elements that entered in to make the great meeting I may mention the following:

We had just dedicated our magnificent church building, by far the best building in this state, and possibly not surpassed anywhere in the south, and thus put us before the public in a favorable light. We were well advertised before the meeting began. Also the great Pittsburg convention had just been been held and our papers had given us generous space. The public wanted to know more of a people who could do things like that.

The Third Street Church, of which A. K. Brooks is pastor, and the Wright Avenue Mission, of which E. C. Brown is pastor, loyally coöperated. The Third Street Church is made up largely of railroad people and it was chiefly through their efforts that we reached so large a number of railroad people. Brother Brooks, having had experience in evangelistic work, was a tireless worker and a notable factor in the success of the meeting.

As to the Scoville evangelistic company, I hesitate to speak what I really feel lest I should seem extravagant in statement. W. J. Minges and wife did great service and endeared themselves to all. Brother Guthrie as chorus leader, is a hard worker and is thoroughly consecrated. Miss Stevens, as stenographer for the company and personal worker, rendered efficient help.

When I come to speak of Brother Scoville and his wife, my pen fails. An adequate characterization is impossible. Mrs. Scoville is beautiful in spirit and has a woderfully winning personality. God has marvelously endowed her with the power of song and this power she has wholly dedicated to His service. This talent she uses so unaffectedly, with such an evident sincerity, that she draws people to the cross while hiding behind it herself. All the good things that have ever been said about Brother Scoville are true and more. I will not attempt to add anything to his praise. Only this, my heart yearns to say, I love him. He is a genuine man. He is a rare spirit. He is in a class by himself. He is a master in his profession and a prince among men. I have asked hmetaoinetaoinshrdlun men. I was asked many times before he came, "What is the secret of his power?" I did not know for I had never been with him, but he had not been here a week 'till I felt I knew the secret of his power and I have not changed my mind since. His power is in his dead-in-earnestness and his mental equipment to make his earnestness effective. He has the intellectual equipment to drive his message home and the earnestness to wing the message with power. No one ever doubts that he is in this work for the King's sake. His is the rare combination of spiritual and mental endowment that brings a great message home with tremendous power. Of course he has a great gospel to preach, and he preaches it. He stands squarely on the Bible (sometimes literally) and has no compromise to make with anybody or anything that does not stand on that book.

The meeting is a great victory for righteousness in the city and its effect will extend far throughout the state.

We feel that the cause here has been advanced twenty-five years by this meeting. That is, we have accomplished in two months what under the ordinary methods of church life would have taken twenty-five years. We now have the largest and most effective church in the city. We had the most active church before. The prospects for the future are exceedingly bright.

THE WONDERFUL DISCOVERIES MADE BY THE ORIGINATOR OF THE PHILO SYSTEM HAVE REVOLUTIONIZED POULTRY KEEPING and in many respects just the reverse, accomplishing things in poultry work that have always been considered impossible, and getting unheard-of results that are hard to believe without seeing.

THE NEW SYSTEM COVERS ALL BRANCHES OF THE WORK NECESSARY FOR SUCCESS, from selecting the breeders to marketing the product. It tells how to get eggs that will hatch, how to hatch nearly every egg and how to raise nearly all the chicks hatched. It gives complete plans in detail how to make everything necessary to run the business and at less than half the cost required to handle the poultry business in any other manner.

TWO-POUND BROILERS IN EIGHT WEEKS are raised in a space of less than a square foot to the broiler without any loss, and the broilers are of the very best quality, bringing here three cents per pound above the highest market price.

OUR SIX-MONTHS-OLD PULLETS ARE LAYING AT THE RATE OF 24 EGGS EACH PER MONTH

in a space of two square feet for each bird. No green cut bone of any description is fed, and the food used is inexpensive as compared with food others are using.

Our new book, the PHILO SYSTEM OF POULTRY KEEPING, gives full particulars regarding these wonderful discoveries, with simple, easy-to-understand directions that are right to the point, and 15 pages of illustrations showing all branches of the work from start to finish.

THREE-POUND ROOSTERS TEN WEEKS OLD.

DON'T LET THE CHICKS DIE IN THE SHELL.

One of our secrets of success is to save all the chickens that are fully developed at hatching time, whether they can crack the shell or not. It is a simple trick and believed to be the secret of the ancient Egyptians and Chinese which enabled them to sell the chicks at 10 cents a dozen.

CHICKEN FEED AT 15 CENTS A BUSHEL.

Our book tells how to make the best green food with but little trouble and have a good supply, any day in the year, winter or summer. It is just as impossible to get a large egg yield without green food as it is to keep a cow without hay or fodder.

OUR NEW BROODER SAVES 2 CENTS ON EACH CHICKEN.

No lamp required. No danger of chilling, overheating or burning up the chickens as with brooders using lamps or any kind of fire. They also keep all the lice off the chickens automatically or kill any that may be on them when placed in the brooder. Our book gives full plans and the right to make and use them. One can easily be made in an hour at a cost of 25 to 50 cents.

TESTIMONIAL.

Elmira, N. Y., Oct. 30, '09.

Mr. E. R. Philo, Elmira, N. Y.

Dear Sir:—No doubt you will be interested to learn of our success in keeping poultry by the Philo System. Our first year's work is now nearly completed. It has given us an income of over $500.00 from six pedigree hens and one cockerel. Had we understood the work as well as we now do, after a year's experience, we could easily have made $1,000.00 from the six hens. In addition to the profits from the sale of pedigree chicks we have cleared over $960.00 running our hatchery plant, consisting of 56 Cycle Hatchers. We are pleased with the results, and expect to do better the coming year. With best wishes, we are,

Very truly yours,
(MRS.) C. P. GOODRICH.

A Time for Action

Trumpet Call of the Foreign Society.

The time for direct, decisive action is upon us. For weeks the churches have been in the spirit of prayer and preparation for a worthy offering for world-wide missions March 6th. That day is at hand. Much is involved. The comfort and usefulness of an army of missionaries stationed in twelve different countries depend upon what the churches now do. More than six hundred native evangelists, who go everywhere preaching the Word, are now turning their eyes toward their American brethren in the hope that their present and future usefulness may not be threatened. This is a critical moment, one in which we cannot afford to be indifferent. We have promised to stand loyally by the work we have planted. Our obligations are larger and more imperative than in former years.

The cause of Foreign Missions is worthy of the best thought and most strenuous effort of the greatest minds and hearts of the world. It is commanding the attention of the greatest characters of the world. This is Christ's own work and bears the stamp of his own divine authority. No other cause is doing so much for the interests of Christian union. The simple New Testament gospel is what the heathen world demands. The non-Christian world is not interested in our traditions, and strifes, and sectarianism, and the history and statements of our doctrines, creeds and confessions; but they are mightily interested in the personal life and ministry of Jesus Christ. The story of his death and resurrection touches their hearts. We of all people are specially commissioned to the heathen. We can do more than any other people if we will.

No other agency is doing quite so much for the world's commerce and trade as Foreign Missions. None other is doing more for good laws, just government, domestic happiness and general enlightenment. The future of the world is in the hands of the missionaries reinforced by the intelligent and spiritually minded churches at home. Nothing is doing more to commend our plea and work to the world than what we are doing for this divinely appointed enterprise. It is helping to save us from a hard and provincial selfishness. It is warming our hearts into a larger and sweeter life. It is helping to unify all our force, and quicken all our activities, and sanctify all our living. God reigns and this is his holy cause.

We ought to astonish even ourselves March 6 by large gifts. Some men should be asked for thousands. We have been only toying with an enterprise as big as the purposes of God. We have been mere pigmies when we ought to have been giants of faith. We have been in a state of hesitancy when we ought to have given ourselves with a complete abandon. We ought to pour out a stream of money for homes of missionaries who now live in mud hovels, for well appointed hospitals that are now mere shacks, for schools that are all too small.

But a brighter day has dawned. The churches were never before so stirred. From one end of the land to the other there is a mighty up-rising. Many will double all previous efforts. Great numbers will increase their offerings. A host will give for the first time. A chorus of cheerful notes is sounding from every quarter. Ask for great things. Expect great things. Plan for large gifts. The voice of God rings out in a clear and definite note to move forward. We are enrolled in his army to obey his orders.

Please send your offerings to the undersigned promptly Monday morning, March 7. If all the offering is not ready send all you have and the balance later.

F. M. RAINS, SECRETARY, BOX 884, CINCINNATI, OHIO.

Editorial Survey

Students and Missions

In the past four years 1,275 students have gone to the mission fields. This is an increase of 27 per cent over the previous four years and of 64 per cent over the second previous quadrenium. This is not an army of the rank and file, it is a corps of captains sent out to lead a larger host of workers.

The Rochester convention represented 722 educational institutions. One hundred of its 3,624 delegates are to go out this year. The delegates came from twenty-nine countries and will go out to every land the sun shines down upon. It was a symbol of the morrow when the Kingdoms of this world shall become those of our Lord and his Christ. From there the pathways of apostles and prophets lead to every corner of the earth. They are not rich in this year's goods, but pledged $85,000 on the floor of the convention that the work of the Volunteer Movement might be enlarged and other thousands led into the same work.

Out of the 1,477 colleges and universities in the United States and Canada, 861 sent reports to this convention. Out of this number 442 are contributing as such to the missionary cause. This includes not all who have students giving to missions nor all that is given in the colleges and universities, but only those that are giving as colleges and universities for missionary enterprises of their own. The total thus contributed is $131,000. Four years ago it was but $80,000. The amount given as an average for each student in various kinds of institutions is interesting. The theological students lead with an average of $1.30, and those of normal schools come last with an average of but 6 cents for each student enrolled. Schools for men average 75 cents, while those for women average but 25 cents.

Mr. Mott has now bound the students of all lands into the international bond. In the Orient he found great interest. There are 5,000 Chinese and 700 Korean students in Tokio, and the Y. M. C. A. is giving them special attention.

Where Denominational Lines Vanish

If every community was a parish and its religious interests centered in one place, there would be made possible an efficiency in Christian work that can never obtain so long as there is no parish because of rival sect divisions that compete for a division of numbers rather than coöperate for the community good. So long as one church in each community meant restriction of opinion and intolerance it was bad, but now that we have achieved tolerance and freedom of opinion as a very vital principle of our living and thinking, there is little danger of any ecclesiastical tyranny, and for the sake of efficient work in fellow help we should coöperate, and our cooperation demands unity in organized effort.

Denominational lines are no longer vital. There was a time when every denominational difference stood for a vital advance or protest, but practically every denominational advance has now been won and the denomination goes on standing for things that all possess in common. Thus the walls become a hindrance to the coöperation the times demand for the sake of the social task before them. Out in Korea it has been demonstrated that when essentials are put before traditions the denominational walls come down easily. The Presbyterians and the Methodists are the chief missionary agencies at work out there. Last autumn they agreed to coöperate in the great task, and to facilitate matters each took a certain portion of the country. Then each transferred to the other all the stations on the new fields claimed. Thus thousands of Korean Christians with their church edifices went from one to the other. It not only caused no breaks or difficulties, but reacted upon the work in a signal fashion. The largeness of the Christian spirit that could effect such a union of peoples that Jesus might be preached and all Korea come to believe upon him must bring such success, or the Master himself was mistaken.

Federation and Industrial Problems

The Commission on the Church and Social Service for the Federal Council of Churches has made an initial report. It is conservative and simple and adheres to the principle that the churches can best undertake only those things in which all may agree without controversy. Three things are embodied in this report, which is a sort of recommendation to Christian employers and forms also a kind of platform on which the pulpit can agree for united demand upon the industrial world. These demands are for:—

One day's rest in seven.

Reasonable hours of labor.

A living wage.

Only the first is definite enough to be of great value. The other two may be interpreted from the viewpoint of the one interested. The committee believes in the eight-hour day, but did not think it wise to advocate it. They were agreed on the ten-hour day as a limit and are to be understood as asking for a six-day week and not over a ten-hour day, condemning anything in excess of that as "an abuse which is not to be tolerated." The last is least definite. Perhaps it could not be more so, but the sociologists could have safely pointed out to them that anything below a certain wage was not a "living wage." However, the beginning is good. The conclusion will be better. The committee is urging Chas. Stelzle, its secretary, to become the paid official of its work and thus enlarge his work from that of a single denomination to that of the Federated Council including all churches. This would be of great value to Mr. Stelzle's work in that it would give him the backing of all Protestant America and make his message ring with greater authority and it would be the most significant event that has happened in the union movement among the churches in that it would be practical effort along a practical line by one who is a master at it.

How Is This for Profits?

The man who pays $2.00 a night for an "upper" when he rides in a Pullman sleeper and then pays the porter an extra quarter in the morning because he does not want the poor fellow to work for next to nothing may be interested to know what becomes of his little two and a quarter. Well, here is the tale told in figures and with little embellishment and nothing explained away. The company was organized back in 1867. It not only built, but operated sleeping cars. Mr. Pullman's patents allowed him a complete monopoly, so he ingeniously concluded that he need not make a single profit by selling the cars, but would make a continuous profit by simply renting them. What the profit was the first seven years does not appear, but by the end of that symbolic period he was paying 8 per cent and earning twice that amount on its capital of not quite $6,000,000. The capital had grown from a million and continued to grow until in 1898 it was $36,000,000, all said to have been paid for in good money. But a surplus of some $18,000,000 had piled up by that time, so stock was issued to cover it and thus 50 per cent was added to the 8 percent that had always been paid as a yearly dividend, and to this was added a little cut of melon amounting to $7,200,000. In 1899 it "absorbed" the Wagner Company, with its competing business, and thus obtained a complete monopoly of the field. The Wagner Company took their pay in the shape of $20,000,000 additional stock, but of course that does not figure in this tale of the "melon" because their property may have been worth that much. If it was not, it was worth that much to the Pullman Company to have a complete monopoly of the field and so help the industry of growing rich dividends. By 1906 the dividends of 8 per cent had failed by some considerable to divide the profits accrued, so another division of stock was made. Just how much of this was accrued cash is not revealed, for there was considerable agitation over rates for "uppers" at that time, and it would disturb the public mind less to pay a reasonable 8 per cent dividend than to be cutting melons so often. Anyhow, the stockholders were handed out an additional $26,000,000 in stock, all able to draw the regular 8 per cent. The agitation has died down somewhat before the weightier matters of saving the timber lands and increasing the poor man's ability to live, by increasing the tariff on his socks, and there is to be another melon cut in the Pullman stock factory. This time $20,000,000 will be the reward of the faithful stockholders who have stood by the old business ship in all the stress and held the life ropes on the money bags so the sleepy traveler could safely land his "two per night" in its capacious mouth. This is the statistical story of 8 per cent annually and $64,000,000 in melons on a capital of $36,000,000, all done in twelve years, and that without in the least injuring the ability of the thribled stock issue to earn the 8 per cent. The total to the original holder of the 1898 stock is only 422 per cent, including the annual dividend.

It is perhaps better to pay $2.00 than to sit up all night, but must we thus argue that it should be paid and that to charge it is but "business"? Or is there no "business" consideration in the transaction for the buyer of a bed for the night? When is "business" business for the public? If there was a free competition and the Pullman's could meet all competitors in a legitimate business competition and still make an average of 35 per cent per annuam, we would need to but ask that they pay their own porters and compensate all their employes with some such wages as they earned in dividends and call them a great business concern. But when they do not pay their own porters nor compensate their workingmen beyond what is absolutely necessary to obtain labor and, above all, when they have no competitors for a business that is so profitable that were competition possible under natural economic law, the field would be full, we must conclude that the Pullman Company is performing a sort of legal robbery on the public and that it is time that the people defend themselves and inject a little business on the public behalf into the situation by compelling the Pullman Company to make a rate for a night's sleep that will make it more like a business transaction for the man who rents a sleeper for the night, and less like an act of brigandage by which he can sit up or "cough up."

Chicago's Fight Against the Saloon

The campaign for the abolition of the saloon in Chicago has appeared to many people to be ill-advised and chimerical. The saloon seems so deeply intrenched in the large cities that it looks like boastful audacity to attack it in a citadel like Chicago. But those who are best informed regarding the possibilities are perfectly certain that the campaign is going to result in incalculable good both as an education of the forces of sobriety and as a warning to the saloon that its lease of life grows short. But, further than this, it seems not unreasonable to believe that the election may actually result in a victory for prohibition. The number of those who signed the petition, aggregating 74,000, was a splendid demonstration in favor of a clean city. And there is no question that in the final issue of the campaign a very much larger number of voters will be in line for the abolition of the saloon. If the number of signatures could be doubled, there would be strong assurance of victory, and this the leaders are confident can be done. The churches and other organizations interested in social uplift will certainly spare no efforts to bring this campaign to a successful issue, and every individual who can help will feel it a privilege and a duty to have a part in the effort.

What Labor Thinks of the Saloon

Labor votes are confidently counted upon by the brewers. They raise the pathetic wail that the saloon is the working man's club. In England much is said of the working man's beer, and its protection is talked of like that of his bread. In this country every effort is made to line up organized labor in favor of the saloon. The surprising thing is not that on a few occasions unions here and there have passed resolutions against prohibition, but that with so many and such constant effort all over the country so few have ever passed them. When in nearly every city there can be found ministers who oppose the enactment of prohibitory laws, it certainly cannot be wondered at if in the same cities there can occasionally be found a labor union that goes on record in the same manner.

It is estimated that the average expenditure of the drinkers of the nation is $250 per annum. Not every drinking man spends that much, nor does every working man that drinks spend up to the average, for the high wine drinker is the man that raises the average. But one beer a day means at least $20 per year for the drinker who works for wages. Three beers a day means at least $75 per year, for he will do more treating and take more extras on occasion. The average wage of the factory workers of this country is $490 per year. One can see where the margin falls for the one who drinks regularly. It means so much less of the necessities. Even the skilled worker who will average an income of $900 per year cannot afford to spend 10 per cent upon his drinking habit. This, of course, does not reckon with the excessive drinker nor the man who gets drunk and loses many days' work and ultimately the job.

The labor leaders see the issue clearly and are lined up against the saloon almost solidly. Jno. B. Lennon, Treasurer of the American Federation of Labor, says, "The liquor traffic tends to decrease wages, never to increase them." He says the unions fight child labor, and the saloon sends more children to labor than they can redeem from it; that it reduces the standard of living and thus strikes a vital blow at labor. He declares the labor movement is essentially a moral movement and the saloon is a demoralizer of all that is moral.

Thos. Lewis, President of the United Mine Workers, says, "Because the liquor traffic tends to enslave people, to make them satisfied with improper conditions and keep them ignorant, the leaders of the trades union movement are called upon to fight the saloon." It is significant that this great organization forbids one of its members to sell intoxicants, even at a picnic. A great surprise has been furnished in many instances where mining communities went "dry."

John Mitchell, perhaps the most trusted by the general public of all labor leaders, says, "The average workingman has no money to spend on drink without robbing his family. I believe that as the labor movement grows the temperance movement will grow." He thinks that the closing of the saloon is a part of that readjustment that is taking place in society and that it is to be welcomed.

Samuel Gompers, for twenty-seven years head of the American Federation of Labor, and one of the most masterly and statesmenlike of all men in public life, says, "The time has come when the saloon and the labor movement must be divorced." When they are not only divorced but the labor movement sees both the economic and moral handicap of the saloon they will put its quietus on it quickly.

The Blacksmith's Journal in a recent issue says, "No well advised trades unionist denies that the greater part of the internal quarrels and bickerings among trade unionists have been concocted in the back-rooms of saloons. The greatest curse to the labor movement has been the saloon, and it is high time that the labor leaders get together and forever divorce the trades union movement and the saloon influence."

Mayor to Abolish Liquor Selling Resorts

Mention was made in these notes a week or two ago of the resolutions passed by the mass meeting held in the Chicago Central Y. M. C. A. under the direction of the Federal Council of Churches, calling for official action to restrain and as rapidly as possible destroy the social evil in this city. One of the steps urged was the appointment by the Mayor of a commission to investigate and report upon the whole question, with recommendations as to measures best calculated to meet the needs of the situation. But in connection with this request there were others calling for more drastic action regarding the evil resorts, among which was the abolition of liquor-selling in connection with any place known to have this character. Last week Mayor Busse issued an order abolishing the sale or the use of intoxicants in such places after May 1. Any one who knows the methods of the red light district can readily understand what a blow this step is to the traffic in virtue which flourishes best in connection with the liquor business. The Mayor, in this action, has astonished even those who believed in his desire to promote righteousness in Chicago. But it is almost certain that the credit for this step is to be given largely to Chief Steward of the police department, who has pursued a course calculated to assure the better class of citizens that he proposed to clean up some of the most flagrant abuses under which the city has suffered. There are always those who cannot be satisfied with any efforts public officials may make in the right direction, and who are either suspicious of their motives or are impatient of any but the most revolutionary measures. But those who study the intricate workings of things in a great town like Chicago are likely to be genuinely encouraged by such interest as the city administration now seems to be taking in efforts to meet the desires of Christian people generally.

Vacation Bible Study

The National Vacation Bible School Association is organized for the purpose of promoting Bible study through the activity of teachers and students who can conduct vacation classes for unreached children, and others who could be enlisted in the work. It was felt that a large number of church buildings—with cool, pleasant rooms during the long summer days—ought to be put to use. In many of these, little groups of women, children, or even men, could be gathered for the study of the Bible. The vacation is the period in which many students who are competent to teach the Bible are largely without active work. The combination of the need and the opportunity seemed admirable. And a great deal of work of this character has been done during the past two or three years, chiefly in Philadelphia and Chicago. The movement is directed from the Bible House, New York City, and Robert G. Boville is the national director.

Disciples' Congress, Bloomington, Indiana

The Congress of the Disciples, which meets at Bloomington, Indiana, March 29-31, gives token of being the equal of any that has preceded it. The themes and speakers are sufficient to enlist the interest of all of our men who are attempting to keep in touch with modern methods of thinking and teaching. The fellowship afforded by the Congress is of the most delightful order. In the nature of the case the company who attend is smaller, and for that reason perhaps more valuable in its social character, than the general conventions, where numbers are much greater. The Congress has taken a permanent place in our calendar. Whether it shall alternate as a gathering of the Disciples with a union congress in which Disciples, Baptists, and Free Baptists shall participate, will depend somewhat upon the thought of the Bloomington gathering and the work of the joint committee.

R. E. A. at Nashville, Tennessee

The annual convention of the Religious Education Association, which is to be held in Nashville, Tennessee, Tuesday to Thursday, March 9-11, promises to be one of the most important in the series of these annual gatherings, which have done so much to interpret and promote religious education. The program is unusually rich both in the features of the public and general sessions and in the departmental gatherings, where specific topics of great interest to all types of workers in religious and secular education will be discussed. Special rates have been secured for those attending the convention. Programs and full information can be secured from the headquarters of the Religious Education Association, 72 Madison Street, Chicago. Many of the Disciples of Christ ought to be in attendance at this great gathering, especially those who live in the South and are less able to reach the conventions at northern points.

The Visitor

It is always a pleasure to one who has spent some time at Yale University to return occasionally for even the briefest of visits. Although Yale is the second university foundation on American soil, dating back to a few years from the time the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth Rock, it is in the fullest sense a modern and up-to-date institution. It has always stood for the essentials of academic culture, refusing to embark in the experiments which its great rival, Harvard, has so freely indulged during the past quarter of a century. It has always been the feeling of university men that the undergraduate requirements at Yale were based upon sound educational principles. And, though its graduate department has taken form only within recent years, it is now well up among the graduate schools of America. But it is in its great undergraduate spirit that Yale holds a unique place in university rank. Probably no body of undergraduates in the world is held together with such a sense of devotion and such an esprit de corps as the Yale students. This has accounted in no small degree for the success of the institution on athletic fields. Other universities may have a larger student body from which to draw athletic material, but Yale furnishes the enthusiasm and unity of purpose that wins victories.

A Sunday service in Battell Chapel, the gathering place of the university, where its chief religious services are conducted, is an inspiring occasion. There are few institutions which preserve the plan of required church attendance. It is, therefore, a somewhat unique experience to see a body of young men, nearly two thousand strong, gathered punctually at the 10:30 hour on Sunday morning. Perhaps the knowledge that if left to themselves by no means all these young men would be present, and that their attitude is likely to be critical, perhaps even unfavorable, is something of a challenge to the preacher of the day. But the attention is splendid and the inspiration of a great body of alert and purposeful young men is a notable asset to one who has a message. The service is very simple. The music is splendidly rendered by a large choir of young men. President Hadley gives the few notices; two or three fine, old hymns are sung, and the rest of the service is in the hands of the preacher of the day. When asked once what length of sermon was expected, President Hadley shrewdly observed that there was a tradition at Yale that the souls of the students were saved after twenty minutes of preaching. At the conclusion of the morning service the Lord's Supper was celebrated. Professor Bacon presided at the table, assisted by the preacher. Several members were received into the church, some upon confession of faith and others upon the presentation of letters. A surprisingly large number of the students remained for the communion, and the spirit of the occasion was solemn and impressive.

The Disciples at Yale are a notable company of young men. Our earliest graduate students went to Yale as one of the oldest and most satisfactory of American educational institutions. From that time there has been hardly a year in which one or more of our people have not been registered in the student body, and especially in the Divinity School. On Monday of the week the Visitor enjoyed his stop in New Haven, the group of Disciples met in the hospitable home of Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Deming. It was the annual meeting of the Campbell Club of Yale University. President Hadley and Dean Curtis of the university were present, and Dr. William Bayard Craig of the 126th Street Church in New York City, came over to enjoy the occasion. There were about twenty men present. And the after-luncheon talks by Dr. Hadley and Dean Curtis revealed something of the high esteem in which our men at Yale are held.

Among those present were H. M. Hall of Franklin, Ind. (Transylvania and Butler), who will take his Bachelor of Divinity degree at the end of the year; Charles E. Underwood of Indianapolis (Butler), who is a candidate for the doctorate in the biblical department; William R. Howell of Chattahoochee, Fla. (Milligan, Yale), working for the doctorate in the department of sociology; George S. McLary, Tazewell, Va. (Bethany), who will take the degree of Bachelor of Divinity in June; F. E. Lumley, St. Thomas, Ont. (Hiram, McMaster), who took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity at Yale in 1909 and is now working for the doctorate in sociology; John T. Riddell, Hudsonville, Mich. (Bethany), a Junior in the Divinity School; M. L. Pontius, Taylorville, Ill., Junior in the Divinity School; J. W. Yoho, Bethany, West Virginia (West Virginia University), Divinity School; John L. McLarty, St. Thomas, Ont. (Bethany); Thomas Penn Ullom, candidate for Bachelor of Divinity; Professor E. E. Snoddy of Hiram, who is doing work in philosophy and theology on a year's leave of absence from Hiram, and expects to receive the degree of Master of Arts at the close of the year; Ray H. Legate, Mena, Ark. (University of Arkansas); C. M. Smail (Bethany); H. C. Armstrong (Cotner); W. A. Crowley, Lexington, Ky. (Transylvania); Gilbert W. Campbell, Billings, Mo. (Transylvania, Yale); and J. L. Deming, New Haven (Cincinnati University, Bethany), candidate for Ph. D. in the department of economics.

These men are for the most part supplying pulpits as opportunity offers. To be sure, the Disciples have but two or three churches in Connecticut, and the work of our students at Yale must be among other churches as a consequence. They go out to different towns in the state. But there is good reason to believe that these men bear their testimony with courage and sincerity wherever they preach. Mr. Hall is writing his thesis on, "The Place of the Disciples of Christ among the religious forces of America," and is to present his material before the Divinity School within a few weeks. Mr. Underwood is supplying for the North Congregational Church at Woodbury, Mr. Howell is pastor of the United Church at Beacon Falls, Mr. McLary is preaching at Short Beach, Mr. Lumley at Northford, Mr. Pontius is pastor of the Baptist Church at Montowise, Mr. Ullom is the acting pastor of the important Humphrey Street Congregational Church, New Haven, Mr. Smail is preaching at Avon, Mr. Armstrong at Huntington, Mr. Crowley at Union City, and Mr. Campbell at Easton. Until very recently Mr. Deming conducted a large class in the Dwight Place Methodist Church, New Haven, and has frequently filled that pulpit.

It is a matter of no little satisfaction to the Disciples of Christ that the young men who are graduating from our colleges, are availing themselves in this manner of opportunities of graduate instruction at the great universities. Next to the group that has been doing work at the University of Chicago since its foundation, as members of the Disciples' Divinity House, the body of our men at Yale is the largest gathered in any institution of graduate character. The fact that we have smaller but important companies of such students in Harvard, Union, Columbia and one or two other places is significant as bearing upon the problem of ministerial supply among the Disciples. The day is past when the graduates of our colleges who propose entering the ministry or the teaching profession can satisfy themselves with less than some competent experience in a university. The opportunities for this kind of work are so numerous, the expenses so small and the advantages so conspicuous, that the number of men enlisted in this work naturally grows from year to year. There will always be ample work for the man who has only a partial educational equipment, but in the light of the needs and opportunities of our generation no one of our students can justify himself in the neglect of such advantages as the times afford for satisfactory educational preparation.

The Visitor's journey to and from New Haven was made pleasant by brief visits with friends in Buffalo and North Tonawanda, New York, where a couple of lectures were delivered, and in New York City, where our churches are entering upon what promises to be a new era in their work. But the pressure of time was too great to admit of any protracted stay such as could justify an attempt at reporting the situation in detail. It remains only to say in conclusion that wherever we have a group of students engaged in graduate study, the example of the Yale Campbell Club, with its regular meetings, its discussion of important topics and its constant impress upon the institution and the churches its members supply, may well find imitation.

An Important Distinction

Readers of Dr. Gates' article on another page should carefully distinguish between the baptism question and the church-membership question. This distinction has not been made clear by the scholarly editor of our "Religious Outlook" page.

The subject discussed by President Faunce, from whose address Dr. Gates makes liberal and illuminating quotation, was not the baptism question at all, but the church-membership question. We do not believe either Dr. Faunce or Dr. Hanley would favor for a moment the practice of sprinkling or pouring in the Baptist church.

There is no sign, so far as we have observed, of a weakening of the practice of immersion only. What these Baptist leaders are rebelling against is the use of their immersionist dogma and practice as a bar to fellowship against those who, equally with themselves, are members of Christ's church. The spirit of Christian fraternity is strong with them. They cannot tolerate the making of a ritualistic form a test of fellowship. Christianity is principally a vital, a moral matter, they feel. Its forms and formulas are always secondary, and are ever to justify themselves by their actual usefulness in promoting spiritual life.

Such conceptions as these lie back of the discussion at the Baptist Congress. The question with those who participated in that discussion was not, "Shall the Baptist church practice sprinkling as well as immersion?" but "Assuming that the Baptist church is to continue its traditional practice of immersion only, shall we make provision for receiving into our fellowship other Christian people than those who have been immersed?"

That this question should find consideration among Baptists, and that an affirmative answer to it should find such eminent support as that of President Faunce, Drs. Hanley, Aked and others, gives it a significance fully justifying Dr. Gates' lengthy report.

Among the Disciples the question takes on a somewhat different form. It connects itself with our plea for union, a plea the Baptists as such do not make.

The Baptists practice immersion only, because they understand the Bible to demand it and nothing else. Being a sect, they see no reason why they should not set up their creed as a test of fellowship against those who do not understand the Bible as they understand it.

Disciples, however, are not a sect, and whatever their personal creeds as to baptism may be, they are all impelled by their desire for Christian union to practice only immersion.

But just because the Disciples are not a sect, and just because they deny that they themselves or any other group of Christ's people have the right to set up their personal creed as a divisive test of fellowship, there has always been, and is today in widening and deepening measure, a sense not only of inconsistency but of unchristianity in their refusal of membership to any member of Christ's church on the ground that he has not been immersed.

Soon or late this problem must be faced by the Disciples. It has been a perennial problem in our history. Our plea for the union of all Christians will not be taken seriously by the Christian world until we make it clear that we are not just another sect, but that we welcome into our fellowship all whom Christ receives into his.

The practice of immersion-baptism—that is one question.

The practice of Christian union—that is another and a fundamental question.

The Christian Century believes that these two should not be confounded. And we also believe that the earnest and intelligent practice of Christian union will require the practice of immersion only.

Jesus, The Truth of the World

Truth is conformity of statement or knowledge with fact. In this sense we accept Jesus as the truth of the world. We do not mean that he gave to the world the facts of science. These facts men have discovered for themselves. Infinite harm has been done by teachers of religion who have tried to dictate to science what it ought to teach. It is the business of the church to use all the facts of science for moral and religious purposes. Jesus embodied in his person the meaning of life as a whole. The details are left for men to discover for themselves. We dare to speak about God because we believe that in Jesus we have a revelation of God. What Jesus said of God's will is accepted by the Christian as true. The attitude of Jesus toward all sorts and conditions of men is taken as the attitude of God.

Truth is sincerity, conformity to the demands of one's moral knowledge. In this sense also Jesus is the truth of the world. He not only taught the highest standard of conduct; he lived what he taught. We discover no gap between what he demanded of men and what he was. He asked that men have faith in God and he lived according to the petition, "Thy will be done." Neither love of comfort nor fear of pain turned him from the path of duty. He bade men love their enemies and he so inspired his apostles with the spirit of love that they were able to offer forgiveness to the penitent multitude that had cried for the blood of their Master. He stated that service is the supreme law of conduct and all his life was spent in doing good to others.

Truth is steadfastness. The true man can be trusted. Men depend upon him. It is written of Jesus that he is the same yesterday, today, and forever. His steadfastness is not bounded by time; it is a part of the eternal order. The slander of the tongue is nothing to him whose ways are ordered of God. The lie will at last be seen to be a lie and the truth will be recognized as truth. While the church of Jesus must take heed to times and seasons that its message may be delivered effectively, it must not attempt to discover the message in the mood of the mob. Truth is a law of progress rather than a static condition, but the law of progress is something deeper than the fads and hobbies of the present.

The preaching of the truth of Jesus is directed to the consciences of men. "By the manifestation of the truth commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God." Display of rhetorical gifts is not preaching the gospel, nor is an exhibition of mental acuteness or of erudition a manifestation of the truth. Eloquence, mental power, and learning may be very useful to the minister of Jesus, but they alone do not qualify him for his mission. He must have a passion for righteousness, which is a passion for getting souls into right relations one to another and to God. If Jesus has revealed the truth about God and human relations, the supreme business of every man is to fit his life into the society of the divine kingdom and to teach others what he has found to be most precious to him.

It is an ancient saying that truth is mighty and will prevail. The saying is based on the conviction that the mind of man is adapted to the truth. For narrow, selfish ends some persons may try to hide the truth, but the contact of mind with mind discloses error and displays the beauty of truth. Wherever Christianity goes, the oppressed begin to demand their rights and they will be satisfied with nothing short of justice. The fact that in England the landed aristocracy is being attacked is encouraging to every one who believes the gospel. The gospel teaches respect for the rights of all, not for the privileges of the few. The truth of Christ appears in America when men of sense and patriotism oppose graft and the rule of the dollar. Man, not the dollar, is the gospel standard.

"Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." There is a formal freedom and there is a real freedom. Formal freedom was granted to the negro as a result of the Civil War. Booker Washington is giving to him real freedom. The free man understands himself and his circumstances and he has power to change his circumstances so that they will conform to his ideals. Ignorant, superstitious men are never free. No emancipation proclamation can deliver them. It may give them a chance to become free. They must learn the truth or remain slaves. The truth about the moral order in which we live enables us to fit our lives to it and thus gain freedom.

A Remarkable Clinic

By Alva W. Taylor

There visited America last year a quiet, unassuming man who perhaps does one of the most remarkable pieces of work in the medical world. That man is Dr. James Butchart, a Canadian who went to China more than a decade ago and is now conducting a hospital at Lu Cheo Fu, in the Yangtse valley, China. He has laid the tribute of a good physician on his city and all the country about it for many miles. His patients come from as high as one hundred and fifty miles, some of them trundled all the way on a native wheelbarrow, that they may have the benefits of his merciful knife or the balms of his medicine chest. But the remarkable thing is not so much what he does as the amount of it he does. His work is of the same character as that of all missionary physicians in China but the extent of it is quite extraordinary for even that land where need cries out for the help surgical science brings.

Dr. James Butchart

Dr. Butchart's practice brings him 18,000 patients in a year. It is doubtful if in all the civilized world there is a single great specialist that has so many patients in a twelve-month. Think of the ceaseless procession coming into his doors. Many of them have these complaints so prevalent in China because of unhygenic living and need but a single treatment and direction thereafter at the dispensary. But five hundred impatients is a good record for a mission hospital and especially when it must practically all be charity work and where the cases are so often sent only after native superstition and the unscientific practice of Chinese quackery has exhausted its ingeniousness and not only left a case worse than it found it but made it as nearly hopeless as possible. In all 33,000 treatments were given in each of the past two years. This means that nearly one hundred different patients must be seen every day and many of them require major operations. For all this work the doctor has two native medical assistants whom he has trained in person. He has but a single trained nurse and is training six young men for medical practice besides. But this is not all by any means, for he makes some 1,200 calls each year on families in the city where he is paid for his work. This nets the mission about $1,900, and is all turned into the work while the man who turns it over draws but $1,200 for his salary and is provided a house in which to live. The man at home who did the same work would draw as many thousands for it as this good man requires in hundreds. Barring interest on the investment in buildings the missionary society is put to an expense of only about $4,000 annually for all this vast work of humanity and adds to it some $3,000 for evangelistic work at the station. Where in all the world is more good done for the same amount of money?

Mrs. James Butchart

Lu Cheo Fu is the ancestral home of the great Li Hung Chang and here the scion of his house resides in the person of Lord Li. The young Lord once made a contribution to Dr. Butchart's work in consideration for receiving plans for a high school be was building in his city. But later the family became jealous of the progress Christianity was making as it advanced in that ancient Chinese stronghold "at the point of the lancet" and they built a hospital themselves, but with characteristic pagan acumen put an opium smoking native physician at its head and its work has never relieved Dr. Butchart of any of his arduous labors. It is a larger plant and more richly provided but it has not the skillful touch of the Christian's science nor the soothing balm of the Christian's consolation. The Chinese is tenacious of his race and customs and full of agnosticism regarding the mysterious ways of the westerner even though he sees the work he does daily. This is not to be wondered at when we see our own enlightened folk rushing to the offices of every medical quack that advertises a new nostrum and many otherwise intelligent consulting the moon and the signs of the sky to determine the issue of events while every Dowie that arises finds his tents surrounded by the credulous who love Christianity better than they love a certified experience. Thus the native quack gets his practice out of old custom and the natural tendency of the untutored to patronize pretense before being driven to rational practice. When all other hope is exhausted he comes to the foreign doctor and he, with faith and fortitude, wrestles with the case in its hopelessness and gives help and cure. The prevalence of tumors and other cases that present a fearful aspect gives the practice of medicine in China opportunity to do things that appeal to the native mind as quite marvelous. The fear of certain contagions lead them to isolate the patient and leave him unattended. The doctor takes them in and cures them and his courage as well as his charity awakens the dormant love of the good in all men about him. When an epidemic of malaria broke out and every twentieth person died the doctor went everywhere without waiting to be called and it was a wonder to a people who are not accustomed to extending help to those who nave no claim upon them, and it was the beginning of the great days at the hospital. Today even the Chinese physicians will call him to treat themselves and their families and turn over to him their hopeless cases.

How many young men are today studying medicine who will strive and wait for a chance to work? Every street has a shingle hung out and many are driven to doubtful practice to procure a living. If a young man loves his science he will get a clinic in China that he can never hope for at home and if he practices for the sake of helping suffering he will help a multitude out there where but a few will feel his touch here at home.

The Crowded Thoroughfare

BY WILLIAM B. DELANCY.

The world is wide, so very wide,
Friends travel through it, side by side,
Jostled by throngs that come and go;
Yet never know, they never know.

Their world and mine the seas divide,
Although we journey side by side;
Where multitudes rush to and fro
We never know, we never know.

One boon I crave, discerning heart,
In crowded street or bustling mart,
Where friendship's fires brightly glow,
Real friends to know, my friends to know.

Be mine the power to command
A word, a look, a voice, a hand;
Not on my way unheeding go
And never, never, never know.

COULDN'T RESIST THAT ONE.

Little Davey was forever asking questions. "You'd better keep still or something will happen to you," his tired mother finally told him one night. "Curiosity once killed a cat, you know."

Davey was so impressed with this that he kept silent for three minutes. Then: "Say, Mother, what was it the cat wanted to know?"

COULDN'T LAY IT ON HIM.

Two London cabbies were glaring at each other.

"Aw, wot's the matter with you?" demanded one.

"Nothink's the matter with me. Why?"

"You gave me a narsty look," persisted the first.

"Me? Why, you certainly 'ave a narsty look, but I didn't give it to you."

Our Church Men

By John Ray Ewers

"A Man's Job"

The work of the church is a man's job. Its leaders have always been men—the best and biggest men. To make the world righteous is the task to which it is called. To accomplish this the strongest must give a hand. Every man enjoys the fruits of Christianity Therefore no man should withhold support, nor leave to his wife the work which is properly that of both. No wife, if her husband be living, should be made a lonely widow in the church life, and no child, if its father be living should be reared an orphan in the matters of the soul. The wife, the children and the church far out-value—yes, any one of the three, far out-value any business that may all too much absorb attention and time. Man is obligated to live the unselfish life as well as woman. Every husband of a Christian wife should have Christ's call to worship and service.

"We have only one life to live." No, let use rather say, "We have one life to live," and man like woman give it whole and intense to the deathless cause of the right.

The Bellavben Bible Class

Bellevue, Pa.

[Recently I presented to you a sketch, from the pen of Walter S. Cook, of the great Men's class at Nelsonville, Ohio. This class makes the, to date, undisputed claim of being the largest Men's class among the Disciples. Since the sketch of last week was mailed the class has had 341 and 345 men actually present. The papers of Columbus, Ohio, have photographed the group and written up the Nelsonville men for the edification of Ohio people generally.

This week I present a sketch of the famous Bellavben class, which gave the demonstration at the Centennial and created such favorable impressions. It is another top-notch class. This write-up is by Mr. G. W. Gerwig, the teacher. He is a man of wonderful intellect and personality. He stands high among the educators of Greater Pittsburg. Mr. Doan, of Nelsonville, is a prominent business man; Mr. Gerwig, of Bellevue, is a high-school superintendent. In a few days I want to give you a picture of the Men's class taught in the East End Christian church by Col. S. H. Church, secretary of the Pennsylvania railroad and author of the Life of Cromwell and other books. Surely this is the day of the layman's power and opportunity. It is the most hopeful sign of our times. Mr. Gerwig's sketch follows: J. R. E.]

The Bellavben Bible Class is the man's class of the Bellevue Christian church, of which Wm. Ross Lloyd is pastor. The three boroughs, Bellevue, Avalon and Ben Avon, join, and the class name is made up of the first parts of the three names. In January, 1908, the class was organized on its present basis. Previous to this there had been a class under the direction of Rev. Alfred W. Place, the former pastor, who is now a missionary in Japan.

The class began with a membership of less than twenty, but has grown rapidly until at the end of the first year it had a membership of 149, and has at present an enrollment of over 200 members. Considering the fact that it is not an interdenominational class, but a part of the organization of the Bellevue Christian Church, which has a membership of only 500, this growth has been rather notable.

Cause of Growth

It would be difficult to say in a few words just what has caused this growth. Unquestionably a number of things have contributed to it, no one of which would have been successful without the others. The instructor is George W. Gerwig, Ph. D., Secretary of the Allegheny Board of School Controllers. The plan has always been to give short lectures each Sunday morning, without asking questions. Some central thought in the lesson for the day has been taken, and its practical application to the actual life of young men of the world of today emphasized. It was not felt that the members of the class, who are young business and professional men, all actively allied with the progressive work of the day, would be interested in geographical, theological, denominational or other abstract questions. It was believed that they would be interested in a presentation of the eternal truths of the universe, particularly as they applied to their own lives and work.

Meets Social Needs

The class has never believed that the saloon should be the only place to extend a welcome to men. It has always believed that the best and finest life of men ought to and might center around the church. So the class is gradually filling the need of good, wholesome recreation, relaxation, both mental and physical. During the summer season the class has always insisted that a complete line of athletic activity ought to be grouped around the church and Sunday-school. So it has always had its own base-ball club, with which it won or lost as the case might be, but clear above either victory or defeat, kept ever the notion of playing a clean, wholesome game. In the winter the class has constantly kept in mind the notion of bringing out and developing heretofore unrecognized ability among its members. It has always believed that the regiment which could call from its ranks a man capable of doing any work to be done was always the highest type of regiment and furnished soldiers capable of rendering the greatest service.

Its various musical successes and activities have been among the most characteristic of the class's activities. When it first began singing there was a good deal of noise, but not much harmony. There was constant trouble at first to secure an accompanist, and usually trouble to secure a director if Brother Daugherty happened to be out of the city. Gradually, however, the class has improved until it does some of the best chorus work now being done by men, and until its double quartette has more than a local reputation. One of the most successful of the class enterprizes was its minstrel show. It brought into play a whole wealth of heretofore unknown ability. The mock-trials conducted by the class have also been fruitful sources of entertainment and diversion.

Utilizing Masculine Ability.

One of the constant aims has been to effect an organization which would place at the service of the whole class, and where possible of the whole community, the full measure of ability possessed by every individual member. As the talents differed, so the various undertakings of the class differed. It of course goes without saying that the usual committees, each with a chairman and individual members trained for that especial work, and each doing the work better every month than it was done before, have been a potent source of power. The Finance Committee, under the guidance of C. P. McCurdy, the Social Committee under A. G. H. Bussler and, indeed, all of the committees have handled their problems with great skill.

The business of the class is transacted at a monthly meeting and this meeting is always made the occasion for some interesting form of social activity. Music of various kinds always forms a large part of these meetings, because it has been found to appeal to more members than anything else. The meetings usually close with a luncheon. Sometimes the men on the social committee furnish a dinner which is worthy of the pride of the best cook.

The class has, of course, a number of plans and ideals for the future. It hopes to evolve a scheme by which all the men in all the churches in the community may be banded together for "Good Citizenship" work. The class is at work upon a plan of helpful work for foreigners. It proposes to stand as Big Brother to the foreigners who are often in need of help and advice and encouragement. It will have in the near future a plan to organize the younger boys of the church and Sunday-school for work suited as well to their needs as the men's work is to their needs.

Attends to Spiritual Needs

While a mere statement of the various activities of the class seems to place perhaps undue emphasis upon the secular and social sides of the work, it should not be imagined that the spiritual features are not growing along with the others. In sickness and in death, in the various trials of life and business the members are beginning to realize that their class associations are indeed a tie which binds them more and more closely together. They are realizing that in making religion a practical matter of every-day work and experience they are coming closer and closer to the life of the Master. The class has determined to use "The Gospel of the Kingdom" as a basis of next year's work. The officers are H. C. Carr, president; L. L. Knox, vice-president; A. C. H. Bussler, treasurer; C. B. Walter, secretary, and R. E. Newell, corresponding secretary.

Desecrating the Church

There are a good many colored people living in our neighborhood. Some time since they undertook to raise money to build a new church, and of course the white people were given an opportunity to contribute. Prominent among the solicitors was Mrs. Kirtley, a middle aged and energetic colored woman. One afternoon she came driving briskly up to my front gate, seated in a buckboard, on the rear of which were two little folks, back to back, with a shawl tied around them both to keep them from falling off.

"Good morning, Mrs. Kirtley," said I.

"Good mawnin', Mistah Mills," she responded.

"Mistah Mills," she continued, "we is raisin' some retributions foh de chu'ch, an' I jes' called to ax ef you wouldn't consist a little."

I "consisted" as much as I felt able, and then inquired,

"How are you getting along with the new church, Mrs. Kirtly?"

"Fine! Fine!" she replied; "Satu'day night we's gwine to count de money, an' Sunday we's gwine to desecrate de chu'ch!"—A Contributor.

The Religious Outlook

By Dr. Errett Gates

Immersion Among Immersionists

Those who have dreamed of a union of the religious world in the practice of immersion as a test of Christian fellowship, will suffer some surprise at the evidences of a widespread inclination among immersionists to modify the requirement.

Among other questions discussed at the recent Baptist Congress in New York City, was the following: "Recent Tendencies to Change Denominational Practice: Are they Desirable?" Dr. E. A. Hanley, pastor of the First Baptist Church of Providence, R. I., was one of the appointed speakers on the subject. He prepared a paper "pointing out a change in policy," which he believed "fidelity to the truth and spirit of Jesus Christ," required Baptist churches to make. But when the Congress met he sent a letter containing the following paragraph: "I have come to feel, on further consideration, that the time has not yet arrived when I can fully declare my views on this subject without bringing grief to many and without arousing controversy which by its emphasis on secondary things would misrepresent my real attitude and would greatly embarrass my present work."

The Baptist Congress.

But one of the members of Dr. Hanley's church did come to the Congress and spoke on the theme with great frankness. This was Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, president of Brown University. He said:

I know at least a dozen Baptist ministers in churches as prominent as that of Dr. Hanley's who share his convictions and ought to be heard here tonight. They will be heard in the next ten years, either in the churches they now serve or in other churches that will be glad to listen.

Our Baptist churches have drifted into a position at variance with the teachings of our Baptist fathers, at variance with our fundamental principle, and which is causing today great searching of hearts. We hold that the Christian religion is a spiritual experience and possession; not a code of laws to be obeyed, not a set of external requirements to which one must adhere, not a series of propositions to which we must give intellectual assent, not a set of ceremonies which must be performed, but an experience hid with Christ in God.

Now there are two corallaries from this position, both very obvious. One is that religion must be free from state control. Surely we need say nothing about that tonight. The other is that believers are free from sacramentalism of every kind. Sacramentalism means either belief in the magical efficiency of certain sacred objects, or a literal bondage to certain clauses in formulas. incantations, or documents. When sacramentalism deals with ancient formulas or phrases in liturgy or declares that the essence of religious life is literal adherence and conformity to these formulas or phrases, it is literalism.

But are we ourselves wholly free from this literalism? Our fathers fought for their freedom from formulas and ritual. Are we still fighting for it? Today in the opinion of the whole Christian world, outside the Baptist church, by a most unhappy misunderstanding, we are understood to lay our chief emphasis on the ritualistic elements in religion. This perpetual misunderstanding is, in the phrase of Dr. John Clifford, "one of the most ghastly ironies of history.

So the Baptists now disclaim responsibility for the promotion of the practice of immersion. They dislike to be distinguished among Christians in the present age of spiritual religion by their emphasis upon a ceremony. This is the one thing that separates them from all other Protestant Christians. It hurt when Dr. G. A. Gordon recently said concerning the Baptists: "The Baptist can not surrender a mere form for the sake of the Eternal Spirit."

In response to that thrust Dr. Faunce still further said:

Who then is responsible for this? Largely the popular defenders and exponents of our Baptist tradition. For when we come to these exponents and read the little tracts that they hand around in the interest of the propaganda this is what we hear them say: "Is not the fundamental virtue of the Christian life obedience? But obedience especially requires a definite ritual. Therefore, no man is a true Christian in the deepest sense of the word until he has been through this particular phase of obedience." Obedience is thus singled out as the primal quality of the Christian life. But what do they mean by obedience? If by obedience they mean absorbing and assimilating the life of Christ, if they mean sharing his attitude toward God and toward man, if they mean absolute surrender of spirit for the great ends for which he lived, then obedience is indeed the primal virtue of the Christian life. But if they mean conformity of ritual to a few clauses in certain ancient and disputed texts, then I deny that in any genuine sense ceremonial obedience is the primary virtue of the Christian life.

Today the churches all around this one (the Madison Avenue Baptist Church, New York), in whose sanctuary all meet, are receiving Christians of every kind, if they truly believe in Jesus Christ. This church is receiving one species of Christians only, that which fully acknowledges that without the ritualistic element there is no full obedience, yet no ritualistic requirement can ever rank with spiritual demands. Though it were blazoned on the sky, though it were spoken out of the clouds, no ritualistic requirement can ever take rank with the command to love one's God and love his neighbor as himself.

Baptist Ministers.

The position which was taken in this address by Pres. Faunce is much more common among Baptist ministers than is usually supposed. I was present in a group of Baptist ministers, not long ago, in which one of them said he was ready at any time that it seemed expedient to join with other Baptist ministers in receiving Christians from other Protestant bodies to fellowship in his church without immersion, and he knew of at least six other prominent Baptist ministers who were ready to do the same thing. The only reason why they did not introduce the practice was because of the criticism that it would call down upon them, and the fear of alienating their churches from Baptist fellowship. A few Baptist churches have already begun the practice, and many more are likely to follow as soon as sentiment is strong enough to make it expedient.

The Disciples.

I have made such lengthy quotations from this address because it sets forth a condition of things which is strikingly paralleled in the ranks of the Disciples. A recent issue of the Christian Standard contains the report of an investigation made as to the attitude of a hundred ministers of the Disciples toward the practice of "Associate Membership." The following question was asked: "Do you endorse the plan to receive into our membership as 'associate members' the unimmersed members of other churches." This is what was discovered: "Of the fifty who oppose the Standard, thirty-seven answered in the affirmative, eight said, 'not if they are to be considered as real members of our church,' while five said they were not certain as to the matter."

From this investigation it is difficult to estimate very closely how widespread the inclination is among the Disciples to abate the requirement of immersion as a test of fellowship. Fifty ministers were found who opposed the Christian Standard, and out of the fifty, forty-five favored associate membership. If one half of the ministry of the Disciples oppose the Standard —3.500 out of 7,000—then, according to the proposition disclosed in the investigation, there would be 3,150 ministers who would be willing to practice asosciate membership.

Col. Church's Pittsburg Address.

Another hint as to the status of the question among the Disciples is to be found in the report of Col. Church, as to the number of ministers who endorsed the position taken in his Centennial address. Out of 800 letters received by him commending his position, 500 came from Disciple ministers.

These are but uncertain indications: there may be only 500 ministers who privately favor freer conditions of fellowship, or there may be over 5,000 Either number is significant of a deep-going movement which seems to run parallel among Baptists and Disciples.

The Causes.

The causes for this condition of sentiment in the two great immersionist bodies are not far to seek. (1) The first cause is the modern interpretation of Christianity, in the light of Jesus' principle of the inwardness of true righteousness.

As Dr. Faunce said: "We hold that the Christian religion is a spiritual experience and possession." The condition of the heart made all the difference in the world with Jesus. It is not what one does but the spirit in which he does it, that matters most. Not the length or loudness of one's prayer, but the spirit of it; not the amount of one's alms, but the motive of it. As Prof James Drummond has recently expressed it: "The principle which Christ laid down that nothing which is purely external can defile a man, involves the doctrine that nothing which is purely external can sanctify a man."

It is this modern view of the essence of religion as something inward and spiritual, that is loosening the hold of all Christian bodies upon rites and ceremonies, more than anything else.

(2) A second reason for it is the new feeling of obligation for Christian union.

The Rev. A. T. Lilley voices this conviction in a comment on Modernism: "Heretofore reunion has been sought through the very principle of division—through a forced and artificial agreement on questions, not of faith, but of theology or observance viewed as of primary and essential importance." "No stable unity can be affected but by the slow self-revelation of irresistible truth, whose forward march, like that of a glacier, none can withstand.'

It is a growing conviction in all sections of the church that ultimate agreement among the people of God can come only in the natural, universal unities of religion; and they are all ethical and spiritual. If it is so important that Christ's church should be one; if it means so much for Christians to love one another and work together, is separation for ceremonial measures worth all that it costs? Is it the will of Christ that his people remain apart until they can all agree to practice immersion?

"Ah, sir, we do enjoy your sermons," remarked an old lady to a new curate. "They are so instructive. We never knew what sin was until you came to the parish.

Our Readers' Opinions

Are Unimmersed People Christian?

Editors Christian Century: Since you have re-opened the "Baptism controversy" will you admit to your columns a full investigation if it leads to another feature of the question not yet mentioned in the investigation? I am a very much interested reader of all that is being written. The evident tendency is to receive into the membership of the churches that great company of sincere followers of the Christ who have not been immersed. And the evident intention is to make it appear a question of "no immersion, no church membership," to make immersion a condition of church membership, to make the impression that such are denied church membership for the reason that they have not been immersed.

This is making a false issue. The question of receiving into church membership does not hinge on baptism. In a ministry extending over forty years of active work as an evangelist and regular minister, I have never refused anyone membership for the reason that they had not been immersed. The ground of refusing church membership is far deeper than that. That is a very superficial view of the matter.

Deny this statement who can: There is no ground or reason for refusing church membership or any other right or privilege pertaining to Christianity to any one who is a Christian.

Let the question at issue be stated fairly. Put it right: Is baptism an essential part of the act of becoming a Christian? Now let it stand or fall upon its merits. I understand that it is. I refuse church membership to one who has not been baptized, not for the reason that he has not been baptized but for the reason that he has not become, and is not, a Christian. This is consistent. If you publish this it will raise a storm. The words of Jesus once calmed a storm and may do it again.

Due notice is given that I recognize and appreciate Christian sentiment and Christian character, and esteem all who possess them as much as any man does. This is not a matter of opinion but of evidence. It is not to be dogmatism on one side or the other. It is not to be any man's interpretation of Scripture, but what do the Scriptures say?

The question is this. Is an unbaptized man a Christian? This matter settled, the controversy on baptism is at an end.

Morristown, Ind. E. L. Frazier.

Our Consistency

Will you permit me lovingly to attempt to set Mr. Boren right on some points raised in his article "Our One Inconsistency," in Christian Century, issue of February 10, 1910.

Mr. Boren has juggled himself into chaos in this sentence, "Then, Christ was valued because he gave us an authoritative book. Today we value the Bible because it gives us an authoritative Christ. It is no longer 'where the Bible speaks, but where Christ speaks.'" Mr. Boren should clear up his own mind. Does the Bible give us an authoritative Christ?

No confusion ought to arise concerning "interpretation." Evidently some things of the Bible all can understand alike, this cannot be said of all things mentioned in the Bible. How about baptism?

Mr. Boren says the word baptize cannot be translated immerse.

Mr. Boren is simply mistaken. But Mr. Boren knows that correct interpretation does not always require translation, hence the transliteration is not necessarily dishonest.

Certainly immersion apart from its design could not be understood and if Paul discusses the design how does that involve the act in doubt?

Mr. Boren says "That his act indicates a fixed practice for that time, or was intended to set a fixed practice for all time and circumstances, is open to some doubt."

Is it open to some doubt? That the records will bear out our contention that Jesus "intended to set a fixed practice," no person will be able to successfully deny. Of course this process calls for an appeal to the record and a willingness to abide by its teaching. This the Campbells did and this was their conspicuous one consistency. This Judson did as he was crossing the ocean to the mission field and he was consistent.

If the record is discounted and what Christ intended to fix can be determined in some other way then it appears to me Mr. Boren's doubts are consistent. I have spoken my heart and have tried to use my head.

Los Angeles, Cal. E. H. Kellar.

Christ Above Union

Editors Christian Century: I am interested in the free discussion now going on in the Century. As each individual must solve the problems of life for himself, so must each generation. The creed makers of the past tried to settle religious problems once for all, but the problems would not stay settled. Our Centennial accomplished a good work in starting us to re-examining the fundamentals of our movement. We are discussing many of the questions in much the same way our fathers did, and I doubt not will reach the same conclusions, but when we do, they will be our own conclusions. At present there appears to be much confusion of thought. Hoping to help clear the atmosphere I offer a few suggestions.

Brother Boren and others think we would gain much for our plea for union by adopting the optionist position on baptism. If this were true the optionist churches should be making the greatest progress in popular favor, but it is the immersion bodies which are making the greatest gain. Some of our congregations have tried the experiment, but it has always brought weakness instead of strength. It is also claimed that our demand of immersion in order to membership is inconsistent with our plea for union.

Now we are a union people first, last and all the time, but dare not exalt even union above Christ. The Campbells and their co-laborers concluded, after long study, that the only way to secure a permanent union of all Christians was by a restoration of the Apostolic church in "faith and practice." Ours is a plea for union by a restoration. Our position concerning baptism and church membership is certainly consistent with that plea. In the Apostolic church Christ was head over all. Can we be loyal to Christ, and yet refuse to obey a known command of His? Our loyalty to Him demands that we believe what He says, and do what He commands. "And His commandments are not grevious."

Concerning "Baptizo"

Editors Christian Century: Two or three questions of W. L. Hayden in your paper of February 10 interest me greatly and have tempted me to say a word or two. So much depends upon the accurate knowledge of the Greek of the period of the New Testament writers. We are finding out more all the time and hence this knowledge fluctuates. In one question Mr. Hayden asks whether John's baptism is from God or men and if from men —"How did baptism become a part of righteousness" etc? The fact that it is from men makes it a part of righteousness. This word means "what is deemed customary, just, expedient." The theologians have read into these terms meanings foreign to them. "Is there any lexical authority" etc? This is a hoary old question. Hellenists have not deemed it worthy of an answer and its constant repetition seems to be considered a convincing argument. The interpretation of words and passages is not decided by lexicons. Authors wrote before lexicons were thought of. But to answer the question directly (for Mr. Hayden's benefit, not mine); the greatest "lexical authority" Stephanus gives a meaning of baptizo in the later days of the Greek tongue (the period of the New Testament) as— tingo, to moisten—to wet; abluo, to wash off (by throwing water on the object washed); lavo, to wash.

The "Oxyrhynchus Papyri" give evidence of baptizo as a synonym with louo, to wash. I have an example before me now in the fragment of the Gospel of 200 A. D., Vol. V.

These, however, are petty matters. When the world is calling for workers to relieve its sorrow, to help the downtrodden and downcast, to educate and train in society and politics and religion and to remove some of the inequalities of our modern civilization, we are wasting our energies on a word, "baptizo." I think we should be ashamed of the whole thing. One would not think Jesus came to show us how to live and help our fellows but to "immerse" us.

The Brotherhood and Results

John Ray Ewers has been making some good suggestions in the columns of the Century, from time to time, for the benefit of the Brotherhood movement. I have enjoyed his remarks; they are always pointed and spicy. But it seems to me he is laying undue stress on one point. He insists that a definite program shall be laid down for the National Brotherhood at once; that it may get right at a definite undertaking; and that it may be able to report definite results.

It should be remembered that any organization that arises out of a general and indefinite impulse,—and that is the case with the Brotherhood,—must first pass through a formative period which is nothing more nor less than a time for discovering through experience its purpose and its program.

Any purpose and plan now conceived and laid upon the Brotherhood from without, it seems to me, would do harm. The Brotherhood will work no purpose and program that it does not keenly appreciate. And it will appreciate no purpose and program into which it has not grown through experience. Purpose and program should not be imposed upon this new movement; they should be developed.

The experience needed to lead up to the definite purpose and program for the general organization will be furnished by the local organizations They can now find definite work to do in their respective localities,—plenty of it. In two or three years, when the representatives from two or three thousand of the local organizations get together, then, out of the local experiences, the definite general purpose and program will appear as naturally as cream rises upon milk.

Mr. Boren's Article

Editors Christian Century: I have been reading your esteemed columns for over four years. In this time I have seen much to commend. But I must raise a serious objection to such articles as that contributed by Frank E. Boren. Not that all men should not have free speech and free press. I think likely that your restrictions thrown around it in your editorial may possibly be sufficient. I refer to "Our One Inconsistency," in the Century of February 10. I do not know this dear brother. I would not use a harsh word toward any man. I am free from such feeling or purpose. But he is very much mistaken when he says that his views are modern. They are as old as sectarianism. I have heard them and known them for thirty-five years. In the section, "Change of Views Today," he uses the very same argument that Mr. Merrill used forty years ago in his debate with our Brother Franklin. I wish to correct this mistake. That whole section is identical in thought with Merrill-Rice et al, sectarians. We (the Disciples) can change our position on the action of baptism only when Christ changes his burial and resurrection from the dead. In fact, is it not true that many do not believe at all in the statements that Jesus died and was buried and that he rose from the dead? Is it not more modern to, at least, throw doubt over all these statements? I ask this seriously. Just so long as the old-fashioned ideas that Christ was buried—really and truly—and that he, sure enough, arose from the grave, just so long must there be represented in baptism a burial and a resurrection. But perhaps Jesus did not have a literal resurrection in his mind when he spoke of his resurrection. I really can see no reason at all for us to argue such questions if we positively believe that Jesus rose from the dead. Jesus did not often speak of his resurrection. Likely indeed the mention he made of it had some sort of mystical undefined meaning. Such treatment of our Savior's teaching is not very satisfactory to me. If God could raise up Christ from the dead and at the same time leave him in the tomb, it might also be possible to shift baptism around in almost any way or better yet leave it out altogether. I want to ask, Why not leave baptism out altogether? What is its real use? What is it meant to represent? If it represents nothing, then it is meaningless and should be wholly abolished. If it is to show forth anything at all what is that thing? Was Paul right when he said it was a likeness? Was Peter right when he said it was a figure? Either yes or no. If it means nothing let us quit it. If it has a meaning let us find what it is. But let us not suppose that the position taken in Mr. Boren's article is a new one. It is old. It was thrashed to nothing forty years ago. Its poor old skeleton is not able to speak loud enough to be heard afar. I may be very angular this morning but some way or other there is not a single position taken in the whole article, as it deeply impressed me, that should be seen in the columns of a Christian paper. If the belief in the death, burial and resurrection of Jesus is not essential to genuine Christian belief, then I can see why immersion is not essential to Christian baptism. Else you may believe any old thing in any old way and call it saving faith. In fact we can take Jesus Christ out of our faith altogether on such a principle. But so long as it is essential (if it is) to have an intelligent faith, so long it is also essential to have intelligent action to represent such intelligent faith.

It was Good Advice

Dear Brother Morrison: I have just finished reading the current issue of The Christian Century, and I can not resist the temptation to congratulate you upon being able to follow my advice given you at Pittsburg relative to your editorial duty! You are doing splendidly. You are emphasizing the vitals in a broad-minded, large-hearted way. You are editing a splendid paper. My heart thrills with joy as I see the expanding usefulness of The Christian Century and Evangelist. You are rendering the church at large great service. Stick to the fundamentals of "Our Plea," interpreted in a sane, Christian way and your future is assured.

Yours fraternally,

A. C. SMITHER.

The Book World

PARSIMONY IN NUTRITION, by James Critchton-Browne. This little volume by one of England's foremost medical authorities, should be read by all "Fletcherites." It is a very wholesome antidote for those who overdo the latest new thing. The author is not always convincing but he helps balance up. To cite the fact that animals gorge is no more to the point than to cite the complementary fact that they sustain long fasts also. To show that low diet in English prisons brings a depletion of strength begs the question, for Fletcher does not advocate small portions of food so much as thorough salivation which in turn will keep from overeating and get the benefit of all that is eaten and it is not likely that prisoners conform to his rule. His most striking contention is that salivation performs but a very minor part in digestion and he also urges that Chittenden's experiments did not extend over long enough time to prove much conclusively. His most useful warning is that, do what you will for yourself, children must not be underfed. (New York: Funk & Wagnalls.)

LABRADOR: THE COUNTRY AND THE PEOPLE, by William T. Grenfell and others. Dr. Grenfell has become a well known figure in the work of northern missions and exploration along the coasts and in the interior of Labrador. Few more romantic stories have been told in recent times than those which relate to the hardships of his work among the fisher-folk of the Labrador coast. Naturally quite apart from the interest which these efforts have produced in the minds of American and European readers, there has been an awakening of desire to know more of the interesting country in which Dr. Grenfell's work has been done. A recent volume, "Labrador," supplies this information in a very satisfactory way. Dr. Grenfell has written several of the chapters, while some of his fellow-workers, like W. S. Wallace, E. A. Daly, Dr. C. W. Townsend and others, have furnished additional information on such topics as the history of the region, its physical characteristics, the inhabitants, the work of missions the industries of the country, the animals, birds, trees, and flowers of Labrador. The volume is illustrated with many helpful photographs, and is an admirable statement regarding an interesting part of our country. (New York: The Macmillan Company, 1909. pp. 472. $2.25, net.)

THE BASIS OF ASCENDENCY, by Edgar Gardner Murphy. This book is a sane treatment of the race question in the South by a southerner. It is a ringing call to the South to come to its great problem with a clear mind and a clean heart and to solve it by great principles rather than to allow prejudice to rule. He argues that an injustice done the negro will react on the head of the white man simply because the law of justice has been broken and a people cannot expect to reap good from broken laws. If the inferior race remains inferior by the repression of the superior its very inferiority is a standing menace to the superiority of the superior race. Repression but aggravates all the ills the contact of the two races gives rise unto, while development softens them all and presents a working chance for better things. Social equality, that is, equality before opportunities of civilization is a cardinal necessity of peace and order but that individual equality which brings such racial intermingling as intermarriage, etc., is not to be desired, not even for the sake of the weaker race. The negro is doing the best for self when he clings to his independent racial integrity and climbs the ladder of self-attainment; the white man does best when he opens the way for such development. The book is wise and candid and courageous and no more suggestive volume has been written on the question. (New York: Longmans, Green & Company. Pp. 250. $1.25.)

THE SPIRIT OF YOUTH AND THE CITY STREETS, by Jane Addams. Miss Addams has performed such notable services in behalf of the unprivileged classes on the West Side of Chicago that any word she speaks in regard to social uplift is sure to be worth reading. No utterance of hers among the numerous books and articles she has written in recent years has been more informing in character and beautiful in literary style than her recently published book, "The Spirit of Youth and the City Streets." Instead of theorizing in regard to what childhood ought to be, she has attacked at once the reality as it is disclosed in the character, recreations, hopes and dangers of the boys and girls who make such an army in our modern industrial life. Her picture of the pathetic efforts made by childhood and youth to find relaxation from the terrible stress of daily work makes clear some at least of the opportunities which those who are trying to lay adequate foundations for the future must utilize. Miss Addams makes us understand something of the necessity for such forms of recreation as the theatre and dancing, without at all being oblivious to the dangers which lurk about these institutions as they are now exploited. She recognizes fully the nobler impulses that find expression in so many eloquent ways in the life of youth, and points out some of the methods by which genuine help can be rendered in the solving of the difficult question of furnishing the right kind of social and educational surroundings without the offense of patronage and coercion. Of few books can it be said that they ought to be read by everybody, but Miss Addams' volume is surely entitled to a place in that limited number. (New York: The Macmillan Company. 1909. pp. 169. $1.25, net.)

THE BIBLE AND THE CROSS, by G. Campbell Morgan. Dr. Morgan's work is of varying character. Some of his books are admirable examples of the interpreters' art. The present volume is a series of brief chapters relating to the Cross, attempting to set forth the different values of the death of Christ as unnatural, supernatural and reconciling, with its relations to the sinner and to the saint, and its permanent value to the world. (New York: Fleming H. Revell Company. 1909, pp. 128, 50 cents net.)

A STORY OF THE TRUSTS

BY JANE RICHARDSON

CHAPTER XVII.

An Offering of Honors.

When Miss Abigail heard the astounding news of Brainard's nomination, she could hardly wait till the phaeton came to the door, so eager was she to impart the glorious tidings to Eleanor. She drove rapidly to the cottage and found Eleanor engaged with Eldora's music lesson.

"Let the girl go!" she began abruptly. She was so unlike herself—so agitated—that Eleanor turned pale in anticipation of bad news.

"It's nothing bad at all," Miss Abigail reassured her, unerringly reading her countenance. "It's only about Robert!"

Then a faint flush replaced the pallor of Eleanor's face. It told the astute spinster who adored her brother, that here was another maybe, more tender regard. Robert had long since given her his confidence, but with the reserve of a fine nature, she had made no effort to discover Eleanor's feeling for him, waiting for her evident liking to bloom naturally into love, as she confidently assured her brother must happen. But the winter months had almost slipped away since Eleanor's mother had died, and her love still showed no sign of unfolding. Indeed, Eleanor had sternly repressed every expression of emotion in Robert's presence, for, after the keenness of her past grief she recalled with shame and confusion how she had surrendered herself in her grief, even as a woman might with an accepted lover, and she was so guarded in the presence of both brother and sister that Robert despaired and Miss Abigail grew despondent. Now Eleanor was off guard. Here was interest warm as love itself. She threw aside her assumed reserve and they exulted together. At last Miss Abigail rose to take her leave, saying tentatively: "He'll be home Saturday night,—will you—will he—be welcome here?"

"Let him come and see for himself." she said with a smile on her lips and a slight increase of color on her cheeks, as she looked with sparkling eyes into those full of appeal, bent upon her.

There was something so significant of the pride of the possessor in that look, that, Miss Abigail being a woman, could not fail to comprehend it and she clasped Eleanor in her arms and said incoherently: "You dear girl!"

Saturday evening found Eleanor in a state of faltering expectancy. She put on some trifling ornaments that Robert had once diffidently commended, only shamefacedly to take them off, as too bold a bid for notice. She was a woman—not a sentimental girl. "How do I know Robert will come, he has not told me so?" she reasoned speciously with herself.

"But you do know, you feel it in your inmost heart," sternly rebuked some inward monitor.

She seated herself before the glowing fire and had hardly grown composed when she heard feet stamping off the snow at her door. Ann answered the bell, and in another moment, with heart beating distractingly, she rose to greet Brainard.

He threw off his overcoat unceremoniously and came quietly to her, questioning eagerly:

"You have heard?"

"Yes—I know."

He impetuously caught both her cold hands in a close clasp, and cried with thrilling meaning: "But you don't know this honor is all for you—you!"

She looked at him timidly. "For me——" she echoed weakly.

"Without you to share it, nothing matters to me." He raised her hands one after the other to his lips. "Do you refuse it?"

"How can I, when it has not been offered me?" she said with an attempt at trifling which he checked at once.

"Don't quibble with me now, darling. It is yours, as you well know, for the man on whom it fell has always—yes, since boyhood—been yours."

She looked up amazed. "Since boyhood, Robert?"

"Yes; when you were a tiny child I loved you; when you grew into girlhood I worshipped you. Now I love you with the accumulated passion of all these years,—the single, only love of my life! Do you—will you, Eleanor, take me for your husband?" His arm surrounded her, and, as once before in time of deep sorrow, now in this moment of poignant joy she hid her face on his shoulder and said softly:

"Oh, Robert, dear and noble, what am I that you should love me so faithfully through so many years? Am I worthy to be your wife?"

A long and most intimate talk followed, in which he pleaded for immediate marriage that she might spend his first session in Congress with him in Washington. But he did not yet thoroughly know the woman whom he wished so eagerly to make his wife. There were things to be considered which a man would deride, but which a self-respecting woman must take into account. Now that his position was changed her marriage would call for an outlay altogether beyond her means, so narrowed by debts incurred at her mother's death that it was only by the most rigid economy that the small household could make both ends meet, and pay them off. Then, too, it was too soon after her bereavement.

The cool, self-contained man said hotly, "No, you do not love me as I do you, or you would grant my wish. You certainly owe something of duty to me——'

"Not yet, Robert," she interposed? "When I do—if ever—I will perform it to the utmost."

The little phrase, "if ever," brought him to speedy repentance, and he said, reproachfully:

"Do as you will, only don't—don't threaten anything so cruel as that——"

"I'm not threatening you. How could I? But, dear, you do not understand—my mother dead so recently—Ann so dependent on me—and—Oh, trust me!"

"You are right, as you always are. I will try to be patient."

Robert hid his disappointment and the next week took his place in the upper house of Congress; an honor he had hoped to have Eleanor share and which was cheapened because she was not present. But his desk mysteriously was heaped with flowers.

CHAPTER XVIII.

The Ring of Polycrates.

January had passed, a month of ideal winter weather. The February mornings were frosty and brilliant, with milder days now and then, that promised the coming of spring.

The men went to their work whistling and singing. Business had so increased that there was a liberal advance in wages, and Randall contemplated enlarging the Works and taking on more men.

The Johnsons were prospering. Eldora made two grades in the fall session of school, and Ned had entered the first of the primary grades. He found school very different from Mrs. Crofton's mild sway. She had taught him in her pretty room from blocks and wonderful pictures, and allowed him to stop when he was tired. Moreover he was pained and surprised when he learned that Jody, the cat, could not go with him.

"Why, for pity's sake, no," Susan said severely, when this innovation was mentioned. "Who ever heard of such a thing? All the boys and girls would laugh at you."

"I don't care if they would," said Ned tearfully.

"Yes, you would, too. It's not pleasant to have folks think you're silly, and laugh at you, right to your face. Hain't you never heard about Mary's lamb, 'that follered her to school one day, that was against the rule, an' made the children laugh and play to see a lamb at school'? There! you see how it was."

"But that wasn't nothin' but an old sheep," argued Ned, with contempt.

Jody was curled up on the window sill in the sunshine, and hearing his name in Ned's familiar tones he rose, arched his back and yawned, showing his sharp teeth, his red tongue and the ridged roof of his mouth.

"There," cried Susan, "just see how it makes him gape, even to hear talk about goin' to school!"

But it was hard to convince Ned that Jody's education had progressed as far as his natural limitations would permit.

Teddy and Mary were to be married as soon as the house was ready, and in the interval Mary was staying with Eleanor. They had looked at every cottage advertised for rent in Wakefield. They could not be too far from the Works, and Mary also wished to live as near Susan, as possible, expecting to benefit by her superior knowledge of housekeeping. She had already had a good many lessons in bread-making and other branches of cookery, and had stored in Susan's cellar specimens of her handiwork which Teddy pronounced superior to anything in that line he had ever seen.

"That's the way Lon used to talk, Mary. Don't count too much on it, and be too pleased. You just remember it, so if he complains after while you can throw it up to him. That's what I had to do," warned Susan, laughingly.

"You," said Teddy. "It's likely, an' Lon thinkin' every single thing you do can't be beat by anybody. Don't you be puttin' notions into Mary's head, Susan, or she'll be as hard to manage as you are," and Teddy gave a resounding laugh, and kissed Mary shamelessly before Susan's very eyes.

They enjoyed the house-hunting as mating birds probably enjoy searching the hedgerows or the forests, for a nook in which the precious nest may be hidden. They were somewhat difficult to please. Mary showed evidences of matronly forethought that delighted Teddy and made him feel sanguine as to their future. Such a wise little woman as she was; she would do wonders with their income. He thought it marvellous that she could think of all the homely, practical things, when she had been a stenographer and homeless for so many years. He had yet to learn, with many a clever man, that women forced from domestic life by the exigencies of circumstances go back of their own accord to the natural duties from which they have never been alienated. Through all that may befall, through all that may be required of them, they keep intact the home-making faculty, just as the mother bird provides the soft bed for her coming brood, woven after the primeval pattern, with the instinct that is part of her being.

Father's Greeting

As I came home from work for the day,
A gay little maiden ran right in my way.
"Oh, where are you going, my dear little maid?"
"I'm going to meet Daddy," was all that she said.

I watched her go hoppity skip down the street,
So merry, so joyful, on swift, dancing feet,
And saw her caught up in a welcome embrace,
While Daddy was kissing her dear little face.

Then back up the street she came trudging along,
Her hand in dear Daddy's, so big and so strong.
And as she passed by me she cried with delight:
"Oh, Daddy, there's so much to tell you tonight!

"Now guess what has happened to wee baby Ruth!
You can't? Then I'll tell you. She's cut a new tooth.
And Fido, poor doggie, his foot's very lame,
So he couldn't meet you tonight when you came.

"Mama has been having an afternoon tea,
And cook made some little cakes 'specially for me;
They were so very good that I saved you a few,
And I'm sure when you eat them you'll say they're nice, too." —St. Nicholas.

The Queen's English

In a City High School.

By Alfred R. Hedbick.

An instructor, engaged in teaching a class of high school students in any of our city schools, must be surprised that boys and girls who range from fourteen to eighteen years of age possibly could know as little as they do about the technical art of composition in their mother tongue. Not only is the amused teacher amazed, but he finds it hard to believe that many of the students are coming from American homes. He passes the nightmare of written work which he receives daily with the thought that those who make the most inconceivable blunders are of foreign parentage, and when they have had the chance will be improved, errors of spelling, use of word, sentence structure of thought will disappear.

Among mistakes made in spelling and use of word, the following have been rather interesting in one instructor's experience:

"People came in bunches, automobiles, carriages and chases to the contest."

"Refreshments were severed (from whom, the hostess, certainly?) in the dining room."

"When she went home, she carried sovereigns of the place to all she could think of."

Here is an example of an English I Theme, written by an impetuous boy. So interested was the boy in what he had to say that he rode recklessly through, not stopping for such minor details as commas, semi-colons, colons, or periods. As you read, are you not impressed by the dashing vigor, the nervous haste, the excitement? And are you not reminded of Byron's Maseppa? The subject was, "Why the Crowd Laughed."

"While I was down to a football game and was sitting in the grand stand when the fullback kicked off and the eleven were off and the quarterback of the other side got the ball and darting down the field come near being caught by the big fullback only he was so small that he dived under the fellow's legs and was off for a touch down before anybody knew what he was doing. This is why the crowd laughed."

And that was the sum and substance of the paper that was passed in for a theme! Someone once wrote—it must have been a girl, since she received so vivid a picture of the boy, and only the boy: "The appearance of a room into which I looked through a half-open door going down the hall at a rapid pace was that of a boy standing up reading a book." Remarkable boy to outshine everything else in the room! Wonderful girl to remember so distinctly and to write so forceful a sentence!

One may decide for one's self what these two sentences mean:

"I find that Yussouf's son had been slain first in the last part of the fourth verse."

" Omar told the Persian that he should die three times."

Next come mistakes in thought made through lack of correct information, or through misunderstanding. The class had been told that De Quincey dreamed of being locked up for a thousand years at the heart of an Egyptian mummy. We were informed on a paper which came in later, that Dr. Quincey was locked up as a dummy!

Are you learned in the new physiology of metabolism? Did you know? "A chicken dips her bill in water, gathers some of it and then turns her head upward so as to let the water digest."

One boy's class was asked to speak of Stevenson's character. This to one person's mind was the best of all.

"Stevenson was a good-natured man and very jovial, but was a sick man inwardly." Perhaps, that was the very highest compliment that could be paid. Indubitably it must have been the hardest task—"to be a sick man inwardly"—and yet to be "good-natured."

Englewood High School, Chicago.

Taking Careful Aim

By Stephen Innes.

Many a boy misses becoming a great man, many a girl misses becoming a great woman, by failing to take good aim. It's important to find out as early as we can just what we can do, what our special talent is, and then direct our utmost energies at that one target.

The men of single, concentrated purpose are the ones who accomplish the hard things of the world. Years ago a number of schoolboys, members of a Philadelphia school, were taken by their teachers to Washington to see President Lincoln in the White House.

When the ceremonies were over, Mr. Lincoln turned to the boys.

"Boys," he said, a kindly smile playing about his features, "do the teachers in your school teach you how to load, take aim, and fire? Do they teach you the importance of hitting the target every time?

"I've known some people," the President went on, "who had fine-looking guns, but they just went out and blazed away without much aim, and they didn't amount to much. It's a great thing to have good guns. But any kind of a gun that hits the mark is better than any other kind that doesn't. An insignificant mustard-shot that hits the target, boys, is better than a United States army shell that goes whizzing away in space and aimlessly explodes."

In these words Mr. Lincoln was emphasizing, in language the boys could understand, the need of concentrated purpose for any one who expected really to accomplish something in the world. Concentrated purpose is taking careful aim

And he was himself an excellent illustration of the lesson that he was trying to teach.

Whatever he did he did with all his might. He attended faithfully to the object in hand and did nothing by halves. He kept his wits so intensely directed to what he was doing, and worked so efficiently and well, that he was in the habit of accomplishing what he set out to do.

A person may have a whole series of bewildering talents, but if they are scattered and ill directed, nothing will be accomplished. Concentration is the key.

We all know how it is with scattered clouds of steam as they rise, gracefully and harmlessly, in the atmosphere. But if those same clouds of steam were confined under pressure in a boiler and in ocnnection with an engine, they would have the power to lift us or speed us across, the continents and oceans.

A boy is fond of reading. But his reading is objectless. Now, if he would only properly direct his efforts along this line, concentrate them on a particular branch of study, he would obtain results that would astonish himself. And his objectless reading would soon be transformed into actual mastery of a literature or science.

It's the same with artists and housekeepers and students, and business men and women, and budding lawyers and doctors and farmers. Whatever line of endeavor we may be engaged in, the principle must hold good.

That is what the President meant. The key to mastery in any and every department of life is concentrated purpose.—St. Nicholas.

The first day of spring is one thing and the first spring day is another. The difference between them is sometimes as great as a month.—Henry Van Dyke.

The pastor of a popular church in a suburban town received as a caller at his parsonage a young matron carrying in her arms a chubby-faced youngster.

"I want the baby christened," the mother said.

After the ceremony the clergyman started to write out the baptismal certificate required by the Board of Health. Forgetting for the moment the date of the month, he remarked to the mother, "This is the ninth, isn't it?"

"No, indeed, sir," replied the young matron indignantly, "it's only the third."

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, MARCH 6.

Theme for the Day—The world-wide empire of Christ.

Scripture—He shall have dominion also from sea to sea and from the river unto the ends of the earth. They that dwell in the wilderness shall bow before him, and his enemies shall lick the dust.—Psa. 72:8, 9.

Eternal Lord, from land to land
Shall echo Thine all-glorious name,
Till the kingdoms bow at Thy command,
And every lip thy praise proclaim.

Exalted high on every shore,
The banner of the cross unfurled,
Shall summon thousands to adore
The Savior of a ransomed world.
—Anonymous.

Prayer—Our Father, Thou hast made plain to us Thine eternal purpose, that all the world shall know the Gospel of Jesus, and by it be brought to the new life. Today we join with Thy people in many places to promote by our offerings this great cause of world-wide evangelization. Save us from the sin of small and unbecoming gifts. Help us to give as we pray, as we love and honor Christ, and as we can with hearts unashamed lay our offerings in his precious hands. In this way we worthily join with all who pray, labor and contribute for the coming of the kingdom in all the world. Amen.

MONDAY, MARCH 7.

Theme for the Day—Early saints and martyrs.

Scripture.—And they stoned Stephen, calling upon the Lord and saying, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit. And when he had said this, he fell asleep. And Saul was consenting unto his death. And there arose on that day a great persecution against the church.—Acts 7:59, 60; 8:1.

Saint, did I say? with your remembered faces,
Dear men and women, whom I sought and slew!
Ah, when we mingle in the heavenly places
How will I weep to Stephen and to you.
—F. W. H. Meyers ("St. Paul").

Prayer.—Father of lights, and God of infinite grace, we draw near to Thee to ask Thy forgiveness and Thy mercy. Thou who givest hope and power to them that trust Thee, grant us the faithfulness of Thy martyrs and the portion of Thy chosen. May we in the hour of trial be able to see Thy glory, and Jesus our Savior standing at Thy right hand. Perfect Thy strength in our weakness, and may Thy gentleness make us great. Enable us to be followers of those who through faith and patience inherit the promises. And receive us to Thy glory, through the atoning love of Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

TUESDAY, MARCH 8.

Theme for the Day.—The Word of God.

Scripture.—How sweet are thy words unto my taste, yea sweeter than honey to my mouth. Through thy precepts I get understanding; therefore I hate every false way. —Psa. 119:103, 104.

We search the world for truth; we cull
The good, the pure, the beautiful
From graven stone and written scroll,
From all old flower-fields of the soul;
And, weary seekers of the best,
We come back laden from our quest,
To find that all the sages said
Is in the Book our mothers read.
—Whittier ("Miriam").

Prayer.—Heavenly Father, Thy Word is a lamp unto our feet and a light to our faith. It has come to us like a precious legacy from the past. We do not understand all of its wonderful words, but we discover in it ever deeper springs of wisdom and of life. Through the ages it discloses new truth to each generation. It endures, while men and institutions pass. May we study it that we may catch its spirit, and see how the men who have written down for us their messages and experiences upon its pages have spoken for God, and that through them God ever speaks to us. Most of all, may we see that the heart of the Book is Christ, the Light of the World. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 9.

Theme for the Day.—The far-off divine event.

Scripture.—He shall deliver up the kingdom to God, even the Father, when he shall have abolished all rule and all authority and power. For he must reign till he hath put all his enemies under his feet.—1 Cor. 15:24, 25.

My own hope is, a sun will pierce
The thickest cloud earth ever stretched;
That, after Last, returns the First,
Though a wide compass round be fetched;
That what began best, can't end worst,
Nor what God blessed once, prove accurst.
—Browning ("Apparent Failure").

Prayer.—O God, our Father, we thank Thee that in the life and purpose of our Lord we discern Thy own great plan of the ages. Our hearts would grow faint and discouraged if we could not see the goal toward which we are striving. We cannot obscure from our eyes the present evil world, nor ignore its sin and sorrow. But we can look to the future, and mark the slow but steady coming of Thy kingdom, for whose triumph we ever pray. Comfort our souls, we beseech Thee, with this vision of the better time to be, and grant us a share in its blessedness.—Amen.

THURSDAY, MARCH 10.

Theme for the Day.—Perversions of truth.

Scripture.—Woe unto them that call evil good and good evil: that put darkness for light and light for darkness: that put bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter.—Isa. 5:20.

O purblind race of miserable men!
How many among us at this very hour
Do forge a lifelong trouble for ourselves,
By taking true for false, or false for true;
Here, thro' the feeble twilight of this world
Groping—how many—until we pass and reach
That other, where we see as we are seen.
—Tennyson ("Geraint and Enid").

Prayer.—O God of our life, we would escape the dangers that lie about us in the world, and reach the safe and sheltered life of trust and love. Save us, we pray Thee, from vain and foolish thoughts, from dilusions, falsehoods, and self-deception. Knowing the power of untruth to ruin character, to blight happiness, and to bring discord into the world, may we arm ourselves against it, and search our hearts to banish it wherever found. And may we abide in Christ, who is the Truth. Amen.

FRIDAY, MARCH 11.

Theme for the Day.—"The wreck of matter and the crash of worlds."

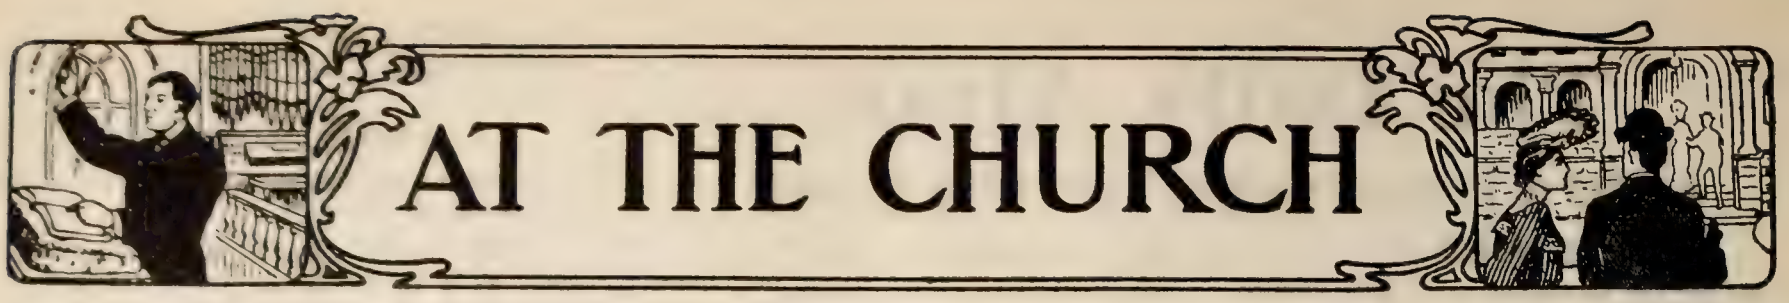
Scripture.—But the day of the Lord will come as a thief; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements dissolve with fervent heat, and the works therein shall be burned up.—II Peter 3:10.

The cloud-capped towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherit shall dissolve,
And, like this insubstantial pageant faded,
Leave not a rack behind.
—Shakespeare ("The Tempest, 4:1").

Prayer.—Our Father, teach us that here we have no continuing city, but that we seek one which hath foundations, whose maker and builder is God. Help us to build on no foundation but Christ, that our house fall not in the day of testing. In the fires of trial may our work abide. Fortify all Thy servants against the sorrow of defeat, and the sense of failure. Bless our home and our household, the young and the old. Give to us, whether our years be few or many, the sense of permanence and confidence in Thee. And give us redemption through Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

SATURDAY, MARCH 12.

Theme for the Day.—Gaining the heights



Scripture.—To them that by patience in well doing seek for glory and honor and incorruption, eternal life.—Romans 2:7.

The heights by great men reached and kept
Were not attained by sudden flight;
But they, while their companions slept,
Were toiling upward in the night.
—Longfellow ("The Ladder of St. Augustine"
—Longfellow ("The Ladder of St. Augustine").

Prayer.—Refuge and strength of our souls, we offer Thee our daily adoration. Thou dost beset us behind and before with Thy blessings. Thou dost crown our lives with Thy mercies, so that we have no speech with which to thank Thee. But we know that our best expression of gratitude is a cheerful heart and a ready purpose to bring our lives into likeness to Thine. We thank Thee that salvation does not depend on works of merit, but on Thy pitying grace. Yet help us to be of some service in this our day of life, before we fall asleep. And then receive us to the nobler labors of a world without end. Amen.

Waiting Upon God

This strength will show itself in the dullest duty of the common day. For they shall walk along life's common road—"They shall walk and not faint." Not only in our times of stress and strain, but in our plodding along the weary path, we are mightily helped, and heartened, and encouraged, by the strength that comes from waiting upon God. And do you know why the prophet puts that last? It is because he keeps the hardest till the end. It is because to be strong in dull and dreary duty is about the hardest task a man can face. It is a noble thing to be brave in tragic moments; but perhaps there is something even nobler than that. It is to be brave, and glad, and strong, and tender, when the sky is gray and when the road is dreary. It is in such seasons—and they form nine-tenth's of life—that he who waits on God will show his strength—George H. Morrison.

Sunday School Lesson

Tempests*

The incidents of the last study are separated from this in the narrative of the First Gospel by Jesus' purpose to visit the other side of the sea, and the interviews with the scribe and another petitioner which followed the preparation for departure. In this incident there is emphasized Jesus' unwillingness to have any attachments to his person save those inspired by confidence in his teaching and plan. He must be the first in the regard of all who come after him. And neither devotion to the expected rewards of his companionship nor to one's own family and posessions, must be allowed to stand in the way of instant and continued service.

The Sea of Galilee was the center of an immensely active life. Its shores were thronged with towns and villages, and all the region was thickly populated. Across the sea the little ships constantly plied in the traffic between the east and the west shores. But on the eastern side there was greater opportunity for Jesus to find rest and retirement, because it was largely a Greek population, with foreign interests. He would have greater leisure and the opportunity for uninterrupted companionship with the disciples in that section of Galilee than on the western side of the lake. For that reason he decided, after the busy work to which he had been devoting himself, to seek some seclusion and rest in the region of the Decapolis, the ten cities east of the sea.

On the Sea.

Almost immediately upon his embarking in the little boat, he fell asleep, overcome by the labors which had been so incessant. But the company had gotten only part way across the lake when one of those sudden wind storms swept down upon them from the hills. The place has always been subject to many variations of wind, owing to its depth of depression in the midst of surrounding hills. The sailors of the region even yet are loathe to push out from the shore unless all the weather signs are propitious, for they know the perils of the storms that sweep over the lake.

The disciples were not novices in the sailing art, and yet so violent was the storm that they were terrified. In their anxiety they wakened Jesus from his sleep, imploring him to save them. They had not as yet learned that calmness in the presence of danger which rests upon the consciousness of perfect unity with God, and looks upon all possible events as only the instruments by which the great ends of life are accomplished. In the presence of a supreme purpose that is world-wide in its reach, all incidents and accidents of the day's work become of minor moment. So Jesus must have felt. Even Caesar, in a similar moment of peril on the sea, when his sailors threw themselves in terror at his feet, called out to them, "Why do you fear? You carry Caesar and his fortunes with you."

The Quiet Sea.

The quietness of the our Lord in the presence of imminent danger was itself a victory over the winds and the waves. The calmness with which he inspired the disciples was the best aid in the encouragement of their seamanship. Did our Savior go further than this in his rebuke of the power of the sea, and put forth a force which subdued the angry waves and made the pathway of the waters smooth before him? Did he perceive that the storm was already spending its force and that the danger was passing, and calm the minds of his friends with this assurance? Or was there some greater power of command over nature which he invoked in that moment? Unquestionably the disciples so believed, and such is the purport of our narratives. Whatever power our Lord found necessary to achieve the result of restoring confidence to his troubled disciples, we may be sure he used, whether it was the encouragement derived from his presence, or the announcement that the danger was passing, or the grip upon the forces of nature which compelled obedience to his word.

In Gadara.

When they landed on the shore of Gadara, one tempest was past. But another was before them in the distressful condition of a furious madman, who rushed down toward the little company of the Master and his friends. Two afflicted men are spoken of in our study, but in the companion narratives only one is mentioned, probably the more demonstrative and terrifying of the two. This madman was the victim of that form of sanity which was the most violent of all that Jesus met. No efforts to restrain him had been availing. Untamed, fierce, the scourge of the countryside, he roamed about or found refuge in desolate and gloomy places, believed by that generation to be the haunt of evil spirits.

The belief of the time credited many different forms of disease to demon possession. Thus Jesus healed on different occasions the deaf, the dumb, the blind and the paralytic, all of whom were spoken of as possessed of demons. The gospel narratives describe these cases in the language of the time. Then there were the actually insane whom Jesus healed. These cases exhibited the marks of insanity very much as modern cases do. In several instances, they made public outcry against him, having learned his name and his claim to be the Son of God. This case of the Gadarene madman is the most violent of all, and in connection with it there is one of the few curious survivals of Jewish superstition which the disciples seemed to share.

Demon Possession.

It was the current belief of the time that such madmen were possessed of demons, one or many. The victims themselves were possessed of the same belief. Alienists of the present time are familiar with the phenomenon. It is one of the delusions of many insane people that they are possessed or controlled by resident intelligences that have gotten the mastery over them and that use their bodies at will. The beliefs of that age included the idea that such evil spirits were permitted to inhabit human beings, but if cast out, were likely to be compelled to return to the abyss of torment. If, however, nothing interfered with their career, they might hope to save themselves from this premature torment until the day of judgment.

Such fancies as these, together with Jewish hatred of swine, probably account for the strange and otherwise inexplicable sequel of this story. Most modern commentators have found it impossible to suppose that Jesus destroyed a herd of swine by dismissing demons from afflicted humanity into the beasts. To say nothing of the superstition involved in such a view, the character of Jesus forbids us to suppose he could ever have lent himself to the wilful destruction of the property of others, even though it might be property as heartily detested as the Jews hated swine and the traffic in them. The probability is that some circumstance in the experience of that community which resulted in the destruction of swine was connected in the report of Jesus' work with his cure of the Gadarene madman. It is not often that the narratives of the gospels raise difficulties of this character. When they do, however, it is to the high level of their general teaching, and especially to the character of Christ, that appeal must at last be made.

The Greater Miracle.

The significant feature of this incident is, of course, not what became of the evil spirits, nor indeed whether these evil spirits are to be thought of in the terms that Jewish belief had fashioned for itself. Our interest is centered upon the fact that the unfortunate man was cured of his dreadful malady, and that presently he sat at the feet of Jesus, clothed and in his right mind, begging that he might accompany our Lord on his further ministries of helpfulness. For it is this work that Jesus is still accomplishing in the world. He is stilling the tempests that break out upon the waters of human society, and in the minds of uncontrolled and selfish people. To speak peace in such conditions is to achieve the constant and unspeakable miracle of bringing order out of chaos and quietness where before there had been confusion and ruin.

MOTHER.

By Julia Ireland Ramsey.

On winter evenings cold and bleak,
The fire burns brightly on the hearth;
Outside, the snowflakes, stacked in heaps,
Are blown like leaves across the dark.

The little children linger still,
"For one more tale," they say;
So Mother tells them all about
The games she used to play.

"But now to bed you all must go,"
She tells them in her kind, sweet way;
"No more stories for tonight,
Perhaps the rest another day."

Marvelous Little Rock Meeting

The marvelous revival meeting in Little Rock, Ark., conducted by C. R. Scoville, and reported in our columns last week by the pastor, J. N. Jessup, is full of interest to the whole brotherhood. There were 1,068 additions. All will be interested in the following clear analysis made by Mrs. H. S. Martin when the meeting was but half finished:

Dr. Charles Reign Scoville recently finished the first half of the most marvelous evangelistic meeting that has ever been held in Little Rock. Three hundred seventy-five people came into the church in twenty days. How does he do these things? What is the secret of his power?

In the first place, he makes every possible preparation beforehand. At the present time there are five in the Scoville party besides himself. Nothing is left to chance. In the above meetings Rev. W. J. Minges and wife came ahead of the party several days. Judicious advertising was begun at once. Not only judicious but enthusiastic. Mr. Minges is a fine preacher himself. He prepares the way for Dr. Scoville. He hides himself behind Dr. Scoville. Beyond this, both men hide themselves behind Christ. There is rarely a tone of discouragement allowed to come into the meetings. Everything is done in an enthusiastic manner. Everything leads a little higher.

Dr. Scoville is the real leader of the Scoville company first, last and all the time. He thinks out every detail and he knows how to secure enthusiastic co-operation from every member of his company.

The singing, under C. H. Guthrie's leadership, is a real praise service every night. The prayers are fitted in in just the right place and for definite purposes. Dr. Scoville really prays every prayer through his helpers. Only those who have attended the Scoville meetings will understand this statement. Each song, each prayer, leads the vast throng a little higher heavenward. When the people are ready, when they have been led away from themselves and their worries, when they really begin to be ready to hear with open mind and heart, Dr. Scoville calls on Mrs. Scoville to sing.

To many a tired, lonely heart, the songs of this young woman are like a breath from heaven. A hush falls upon the people. Men and women do not know that they have almost forgotten to breathe till the song is over. Then there is a short, earnest prayer from someone that Dr. Scoville may be "filled with the Spirit" and the sermon is begun. The people are still led higher and higher in a marvelous way. The highest point was reached one night towards the close of this first half of the meeting when the speaker stormed down the steps and half way up one aisle as though he would snatch lost souls from certain death. Dr. Scoville had lost self in his theme. He was unconscious of the crowd who were saved. He saw only those who needed his message. He was willing to be stricken dead then and there if that were the only thing that would bring lost children home to their loving heavenly Father.

If the people respond in the middle of his sermon, he breaks off just there, and gives the invitation. There is no apparent break. He understands psychological laws too well for that. Dr. Scoville doesn't preach sermons as the words ordinarily indicate. He strives, always, for a psychological condition. When that is reached he endeavors to make the most of it by driving home the need of salvation. The moment the invitation song is begun the personal workers leave the platform and go out among the people. There are those present who have been visited in their homes earlier in the day by the workers, which include the local pastors and members of local churches. These are often the first to come forward.

In Little Rock the shop and saloon meetings were very interesting and helpful.

Dr. Scoville believes in much prayer. He and his wife always kneel together in prayer before they leave their room to go to any service.

Notes From the Foreign Society.

The late Mrs. Hardin, Harrodsburg, Ky., left property to the Foreign Society. She also left property to three other benevolences of the Brotherhood.

The First Church, Wichita, Kans., will double its last year's gift in the March offering. W. S. Priest is the minister.

Miss Kate Gault Miller, our new missionary to Wuhu, China, has reached her field. She went out from Louisville, Ky., and is supported by Transylvania University and College of the Bible, Lexington, Ky.

Two young men were baptized last month at Tonnogi, Japan. Both are well educated.

Last week the Foreign Society received another gift of $500 on the Annuity Plan from a friend in Michigan.

The money has all beenpromised for the new mission building in Matanzas, Cuba. Including the lot the cost will be about $16,000. Melvin Menges and his wife, our faithful missionaries at that post, will rejoice greatly over this enlargement.

The missionaries at Shanghai, China, have a rare opportunity to secure a much needed property to enlarge the school work in that city. This property will involve an expenditure of $6,000. It is a great bargain. Who will provide the amount.

A number of churches will observe the March Offering this year for the first time.

W. H. Colvin, Wheeling, W. Va., writes: "The Layman's Missionary Movement is being splendidly supported by both churches here in Wheeling, and I am satisfied that you will be pleased with the results." The Wheeling church expects to support a missionary on the foreign field and is working loyally to that end.

The Union Avenue Church, St. Lauis, Mo., expects to at least double its offering for foreign missions over last year. It expects to give not less than $1,000. W. J. Lockhart is the minister.

The official board of the church at Mexico, Mo., has voted unanimously to buy a printing press to cost not less than $350 for the Bolenge Station, Africa. This church is much drawn toward Brother C. P. Hedges, their living link at Bolenge. This will bring their offering up to $950 for the year and we need not be surprised, indeed, we may expect, them to raise fully $1,000. Walter M. White is the minister.

The church at Valparaiso, Ind., became a living link in the Foreign Society, and the American Christian Missionary Society, February 20. Claude E. Hill is the minister. He says this was accomplished with very little difficulty.

Tokyo, Japan

Jan. 18.—The Yotsuya mission is growing. Fifteen were added last year, a lot bought for $4,400.00; a new school erected, and $2,000 raised toward another lot and school to cost $3,000. One new worker has been employed. In seven years 172 have been baptized. Last year one member went as a missionary to China and one as Y. M. C. A. secretary to Korea. We have five schools.

W. D. CUNNINGHAM.

A Little Nonsense.

Looking For Father.

"I was invited to speak before a gathering in a small city near Chicago," said Clifford G. Roe, former assistant state's attorney, who is a man of youthful appearance.

"I was told that a committee would meet me at the station, and I looked for the committee when I arrived. No one spoke to me, however, and the crowd at the platform finally dwindled to two men. I thought they might perhaps be the committee, and so I accosted them.

"'Were you expecting to meet someone from the train that just went through?' I asked.

"'Yes,' said one of the men, 'we were.'

"'And,' I continued, 'may I inquire whom you were waiting for?'

"'Yes, sir,' said the man. 'We were waiting for Assistant State's Attorney Roe of Chicago.'

"'Well,' I said, 'my name is Roe.'

"'Oh, is that so?' said the man. 'Didn't your father come?'"

Wished He Was a Minister.

Dr. Smith Baker tells the following story: Going quite a distance into the country to dedicate a meeting-house, I reached the town the night before the service, and was the guest of a hospitable farmer, and his wife. Everything was as fine as one could ask, including a delightful supper, such as farmers' wives know how to prepare. In the morning the good wife wished to know what I liked for breakfast. I said, "Anything." I was not particular, for I knew that whatever such a cook prepared would be good; but she kept pressing the question, and I continued to assure her that anything she prepared would be all right. At last she said, "What do you have at home?" This required an answer, and I replied, "Generally an orange, a little oatmeal, with toast and coffee." An eight-year-old boy with his six-year-old sister stood listening; and unable to contain himself, exclaimed, "Golly! that minister has an orange every morning; wish I was a minister."

The Office Boy Got Rich.

"A horrible typographical error," said Clyde Fitch, "appeared in the Crestville Chronicle of Tennessee. The editor wrote at the head of the editorial page: 'Poultry taken in exchange for subscriptions and advertising.' And in the paper the note appeared as 'Poetry taken in exchange.' The only person that profited by this error was the office boy. He for the next fortnight sold a quarter's worth of paper from the waste-basket every day."

* * *

T. P. Haley, well known, and beloved for his works sake, leaves Kansas City to spend the winter in California.

A new church was dedicated at Council Grove, Iowa, Feb. 27, J. M. Hoffman of Des Moines, had charge of the services.

L. A. Chapman, will close work at Elmwood, Neb., May first, and will at that time be ready to locate with another church.

The church at Valparaiso, Ind., Claude E. Hill, pastor, has raised the money to become a living link in the Foreign Society this year.

R. P. Shepherd, well known throughout California, has been chosen to succeed Grant K. Lewis as corresponding secretary for Southern California.

A social was given by the choir of the church at Clinton, Ill., on a recent evening when, after a musical program, a seven-cent supper was served.

The Central Church, Austin, Texas, John W. Fern, pastor has issued the initial number of its parish paper which it calls "The Austin Christian."

Mr. and Mrs. R. G. Frank, of the church at Liberty, Mo., entertained the ministers of the other protestant churches and their wives at dinner, February 17.

The church at Marshalltown, Ia., let the contract for the installation of a new pipe organ, which is to cost $2550.00, and is to be ready for use by the first of July.

The church at Champaign, Ill., is in a meeting led by Charles Bloom, evangelist. The meetings are attracting large audiences and there is promise of large ingathering.

The Howett Street Church, Peoria is planning for a revival meeting to begin, March 15. The Ladies' Aid Society of the church have pledged $1,000.00 as a start for a building fund.

J. J. Haley is now comfortably settled in his new pastorate at Modesto, California, and is reported as getting things to moving, and finding abundance of work to keep hand and heart busy.

The church at Hastings, Neb., has decided to inaugurate the union of the morning worship and the Sunday-school meeting, making it a teaching service. The evening meeting will be of an evangelistic nature.

A contract for a new $30,000.00 building has been awarded by the church at East St. Louis, Mo., where Talmage DeFrees is the minister. The building will be of Grecian architecture and will seat about 700 people.

A. F. Hensey, just home for a furlough from the work at Bolenge, Africa, was with the church at Liberty, Mo., February 27, preaching in the morning, and giving an illustrated lecture on the work at Bolenge in the evening.

The church at Pentwater, Michigan, is in a meeting with home forces. W. F. Shontz is pastor, and is doing the preaching. Audiences are growing daily, and there is an interest that gives cause to hope for a very helpful meeting.

The church at Canton, Mo., enthusiastically supported by the faculty and the students of Christian University has raised sufficient money to assure its becoming a living link in the Foreign Society this year.

The Board of the Second Church, Warren, Ohio, recently gave a banquet to the members of the board of the First Church. This fraternal spirit was further manifest by an exchange of pulpits by the pastors on the following Sunday morning.

George L. Snively is in a successful meeting with the church at Tulsa, Oklahoma. From a report that reached us several days ago we learn that there had then been eighty-one accessions to the church, sixteen on the previous evening.

Victor Dorris, who has been holding meetings with the church at Hutchinson, Kansas, preached a sermon near the close of the series on "Why I Am Not a Campbellite." His sermon was a trenchant statement of the arguments that have been set forth by the preachers of the church during the larger part of its history.

O. C. Bolman, who in the three years of his work at Hanvana, Ill., greatly strengthened that church in all lines of work, has resigned, withholding from the public his reason for the action, and giving the church four months time before the close of his work. Mr. Bolman's resignation is generally regretted by all the people of Havana.

A new building is planned by the church at Altoona, Iowa, to be erected this summer. A new site has been donated by two members of the church. They will have it is said the best location in town. Leslie G. Parker is the pastor, and under his ministry of more than a year the church has made steady growth.

A letter from one of the well known preachers of Kansas City says that John R. Ewers, pastor of the East End Church, Pittsburg, has just closed a meeting with the First Church, Kansas City, Mo., with 104 accessions to the church. The meeting lasted eighteen days. The writer says: "Ewers did some mighty fine preaching."

At Fresno, California, where Ray O. Miller is pastor, the church is trying to meet the social needs of the community by opening up a reading room, where books, papers and magazines and harmless games are offered to the public every night in the week. Mr. Miller, the pastor, has been elected a member of the state board to succeed I. N. McCash.

A three weeks' evangelistic effort following the dedication of the South Geddes St. Church, Syracuse, N. Y., of which C. R. Stauffer is pastor, resulted in 50 additions, forty-five by baptism and five otherwise. The pastor preached during the first ten days of the meeting and Arthur Braden, president of Keuka College assisted during the closing ten days. Miss Una Dell Berry, of Lafayette, Ind., had charge of the singing. A great meeting for a New York church.

James K. Parker, late pastor of the church at Sandoval, Ill., died February 16, leaving a wife and one child. Mr. Parker has been a faithful preacher of the word, and has served as pastor at Niantic, Lovington, Winchester, Toledo, and Sandoval, Ill., and at Portland, Ind. The burial was at Toledo, Ill., where J. A. Clemens, the pastor, had charge of the service. The Christian Century extends its sympathy to the wife and child, and to the congregation at Sandoval in the loss of its pastor.

A thirty-five thousand dollar church building is to be erected by the church at Medina, Ohio, during the coming spring and summer. This building enterprise has a unique beginning, in that only ten members of the church have known of the proposed plan of building. From these few the money for the new structure has come. The names of the donors will not be announced until the time of the dedication of the church: C. C. Maple is pastor at Medina.

Fine reports come to us from the church at Iowa City, where Carlos C. Rowlison has been pastor for the last three years. During the next two months improvements will be made in the church to the cost of $2,500. The contract for a new pipe organ has been let, and the instrument is to be ready for use by the fifteenth of May. The funds for this purpose have been collected by the W. M. B. Society of the church, and includes a gift from Andrew Carnegie.

A. J. Saunders, who received the degree of B. D. from the University of Chicago last September, and left Chicago the latter part of December for his former home and future work in Australia, has on his trip east visited Glasgow, Edinburgh, Leeds, Birmingham, Stratford, York, Oxford, and London. While in London, Mr. Saunders has taken occasions to hear some of the great preachers of our day, R. J. Campbell, Campbell Morgan, Horne, Myers, Jowett, and Clifford. He left London, February 4, for Australia.

The First and the West Side churches, Springfield, Ill., held union services, Sunday, February 13, F. W. Burnham preaching in the morning and J. R. Golden in the evening. The meetings were in the First Church. The building of the Sunday-school annex made it impossible for the congregation of the West Side to meet in their accustomed place. Mr. Burnham is just concluding a series of twelve morning sermons on the "First Epistle to the Corinthians," which have been greatly enjoyed and of real profit to his church.

The following notice, which appeared in the parish paper of the churches of Warren, Ohio, we commend to other pastors and readers of our church papers: "If you are taking the Evangelist, Century or Standard, look on the label and it will state the time to which you are paid up. If you desire to be saved the trouble of sending through the mail, bring the money to the church and Mr. Fred Alexander of the Good Literature committee will send for you. We would like a number of new subscribers."

During the fall semester, G. B. Van Arsdall, then pastor of the church at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, and C. C. Rowlison, pastor at Iowa City, gave a course of lectures in the Iowa State University on "Old Testament History and Literature." Mr. Rowlison is now giving a series of four lectures before joint meetings of the Y. M. and Y. W. Christian Associations of the university. His general topic is "Problems of Today," and the several lectures are: "How the Forms of Our Religion Have Been Developed," "What is Criticism?", "The Modern Interpretation of God," "The Modern Man and the Church."

A notable event in the life at Milligan College each year is a visit from B. A. Abbott, pastor of the Harlem Ave. Church, Baltimore. Mr. Abbott's series of lectures this year was of special interest. His general theme was "Science and the Spirit of Progress." This general theme was illustrated by the series of four biographical studies interpreting as many different phases of progress. These studies treated the lives of Roger Bacon, Charles Darwin, Thomas A. Edison, and Luther Burbank. This would seem a highly skilled way of presenting the truth of the general theme of the addresses.

Now is the Nick o' Time to Place Your Order for the Bethany Graded Lessons. A New Junior Term of four months (for pupils 9 to 12 years) is just beginning. The new quarter for Beginners and Primary opens April 3. The literature you order now will thus supply your three elementary grades until July 1. Remember, the Bethany supplies are only for your pupils under twelve years of age. Place the main bulk of your order wherever you wish, but give your younger children the best religious instruction ever put into any Sunday school. Send for our convenient order blank at once. The New Christian Century Co., 700 East Fortieth St., Chicago.

J. E. Lynn, pastor of the Central Church, Warren, Ohio, has been called to the pastorate of the Central Church Pueblo, and has asked his Warren congregation to release him that he may accept this. In the six years that Mr. Lynn has been in Warren the church has made marked growth. During the time 760 members have come into the church, and the church has raised $52,000.00, of which $15,000.00 was for missions, and education.

In the meeting which I. J. Spencer just closed with the Central Church, Warren, Ohio, there were fifty-five accessions to the church. Without an apology at all for the results shown, this was by no means the best part of the meeting. Mr. Spencer's sermons were messages, indeed. Some of his subjects were: "The One Authority," "The One Name," "The One Faith," "The One Spirit," "The One Baptism," "The One Basis of Unity," and "The One Confession." Mr. Spencer has gone to the University Church, Des Moines for a similar meeting.

On the last Sunday of C H. DeVoe's pastorate with the church at Peru, Ind., the churches of the city assembled in a union meeting held at the Methodist church. The various ministers of the city and a local judge spoke enthusiastically of the service that Mr. DeVoe had rendered the community during the years of ministry with the church there. Mr. DeVoe has just taken up his new work with the large and flourishing church at Mason City, Ill. C. H. V. Wilson, of the South Side church, Lima, Ohio, has been called to the pastorate of the Peru Church, and began work March 1.

Earl Wilfley, the popular and talented pastor of the First Church, St. Louis, Mo., has again tendered his resignation. Some months ago Mr. Wilfley resigned on account of ill health but at the earnest pursuasion of the congregation reconsidered his decision, and agreed to make another trial. But now he finds that he must give himself to less exacting work and will return to Crawfordsville, devoting his time to lyceum work, preaching on Sunday as opportunity is offered. The local church and all the ministers of the city greatly regret the loss of Mr. Wilfley from their ranks.

A commendable plan of promoting a better understanding of the significance of the various religious bodies of a community was followed by the churches of Greencastle, Ind. A series of five meetings was held on successive evenings. The pastor of the Baptist church of Greencastle spoke the first evening on "The Mission of the Baptist Church." The second evening J. M. Rudy, pastor of the Christian church spoke on "The Mission of the Christian Church." A pastor from Terre Haute spoke for the Presbyterian church, one from Indianapolis for the Methodist church, and Rev. Father M. H. Boge, of the Church of St. Charles, Bloomington, Ind., on the Mission of the Roman Catholic Church.

Chas. E. McVay, leader of song, Hardy, Nebraska, has some unengaged time for spring and summer.

The College of the Bible of Transylvania University is enjoying a series of lectures by great preachers of the brotherhood. The first delivered, January 18, was by J. H. MacNeill, Winchester, Ky., whose subject was, "A Message for the Times." This message, the lecturer urged, is identical with that of John the Baptist, "Repent, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at Hand." The second speaker, February 15, was A. B. Philputt, Indianapolis, Ind., whose subject was, "Some Recollections of Great Preachers." The other lecturers are President A. McLean and Peter Ainslie, president of The American Missionary Society.

J. M. Rudy, pastor of the church at Greencastle, was the second speaker in the series of meetings held by the churches of Greencastle, for the discussion of the mission of each of the churches in the world. Mr. Rudy made a strong address, which was fully reported in the daily paper of the following day. He made clear to the audience that the Disciples stood primarily for Christian union, and that the name Christian was chosen because this was the common family name by which all Christians should be known. He did not hesitate to tackle the problem of our inconsistency, and working from a similar point of view to that taken in recent editorials in The Christian Century, he urged that immersion was the only form of baptism common to all Christian people, and therefore the common denominator for all.

Peter Ainslie, pastor of the Christian Temple, Baltimore, is the writer of the second of the series of articles being published in the Baltimore Star, in answer to the question why men do not attend church. Mr. Ainslie appeals to the history of his own church to show that men are not in so small a minority as often said. Out of 165 persons received into the fellowship of the Christian Temple since January 1, 1909, seventy-eight were men, and the pastor does not claim to have made a special effort to reach men, but to reach the human heart. He admits that the church of our day has its faults, but not more than other days, for the church is composed of human beings, who are necessarily imperfect. He urges that the reason many men are not found in church is that they are wicked, and seeking continually to follow their own wicked devices.

Writing of the Hiram, O., meeting, John E. Pounds, the pastor says: "The meeting of three weeks held here by R. H. Miller of Buffalo, was one of remarkable spiritual power. The preaching of Brother Miller was of so high a type that one scarcely dares to praise it. It laid bare the consciences of men and women, and stirred in them longings of which they had not before been conscious. Originality of thought, richness of vocabulary, fiery fervor of expression—all these merely ministered to high spiritual ends. Brother Miller has greatly endeared himself to the students of the college and to all the people of Hiram Hill. A chorus of eighty voices, led by W. E. Alderman and the college orchestra, contributed much to the success of the meeting. There were forty-two additions to the church, twenty-four of them by confession and baptism."

Professor A. M. Haggard of Drake University re-dedicated the church building at Clinton, Ill., January 30. The old house had been completely remodeled at a cost of $4,000. Albert Schwartz is the pastor there—a strong, thoughtful, practical and progressive leader.

Four of the largest churches of Bedford, Ind., recenty held a union evangelistic meeting with home forces. Each pastor preached five times. His appointment was not announced to the public until he arose to speak. Thus the people came to the service simply to hear the gospel, not the preacher.

H. H. Peters and A. T. Campbell have recently supplied the pulpit of the Evanston church, Chicago, the former speaking on "Educational Ideals," the latter on his interesting work of superintending one of the municipal playgrounds of Chicago.

The church in Perry, Iowa, is prospering under the wise and wholesome leadership of R. H. Ingram. Having paid off the church debt recently, they are actively at work in steady fashion to build up the membership. Several additions have recently been reported.

A new twenty-eight thousand dollar house will be dedicated for the church at Amarilla, Tex., the third Lord's Day in March by F. M. Rains. This will be one of the best arranged and equipped churches in the whole Panhandle country. Walter P. Jennings is the pastor.

That Disciples should lead in all united enterprises is becoming more clear. That they can lead in union evangelism has been demonstrated. Further proof will be given in Madison, Ind., where ten churches have combined to ask E. L. Powell, of Louisville, Ky., to lead them in a union meeting. Dr. Powell has accepted and will begin the series on March 7. James T. Lawson is the talented pastor of our church there.

J. M. Rudy of Greencastle, Ind., began a meeting last Sunday for the church at Bloomington, Ind., J. C. Todd, pastor, in return for the meeting held by Mr. Todd in Greencastle recently. The church in Bloomington is one of the very best among the Disciples. C. C. Morrison, of The Christian Century, recently preached for this congregation during Mr. Todd's absence and brought back to this office glowing praises for the splendid work being accomplished by this people and their talented leader. It is hoped that the Rudy meeting may still be in progress when the Congress meets there, March 29. Such a meeting as these two men will conduct will surely be in perfect harmony with the ideals of a Congress.

Mark S. Peckham is holding a meeting near Sumter, S. C., with good prospects.

Peter Ainslie is to hold a series of special meetings in the Central Church, Des Moines, Ia., beginning soon.

The congregation at Altoona, Ia., has decided to build a new house. A lot was recently given them for this purpose.

Mrs. Sarah Benedict, sister of Mrs. G. A. Willett, Professor Willett's mother, died at her home in Ionia, Mich., on Saturday, February 19.

B. F. Hill and son closed a meeting at Lanark, Ill., February 20. The immediate results were disappointing, says A. I. Martin, but much good seed was sown in this Dunkard stronghold.

Richard Martin report seventy-two additions in a meeting at Salisbury, Mo. Twenty have been added in his present meeting at Lockwood, Mo. He will continue at the latter place for three weeks more.

E. P. Wise, pastor at East Liverpool, Ohio, reports an excellent meeting there led by Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Darby of Beaver Falls, Pa. Their preaching and singing is highly praised. Sixty-one persons were added to the church.

B. B. Tyler, of Denver, is preaching a series of Lenten sermons on Wednesday evenings on the Temptations, the Prayers, the Works and the Sympathies of Jesus. His church will observe Passion Week with services each evening.

A. M. Haggard has resigned from the deanship of the Bible College, Drake University, meaning henceforth to devote himself to his professional work in the department of church history. Professor Sherman Kirk of the Greek department will probably be appointed as Dean of the Bible College.

Singing Evangelist J. P. Garmong of Des Moines, assisted M. E. Chatley in a short meeting at Bowling Green, Ohio, beginning January 30. Twenty were added to the fellowship of the church. Mr. Garmong's services were secured through "The National Association of Church Musicians" of Indianapolis.

The sensible efforts of the church leaders of Wabash County, Ind., to enlist all their congregations in co-operative work has resulted in a call to George T. Smith of Redkey, Ind., to minister to the churches at Roann, Laketon and Bachelor Creek. E. F. Daugherty, of Wabash, is trying to develop a "county consciousness" among the churches. This is an admirable ideal.

California Notes

Oscar Sweeney accepted a call to Douglass, Ariz. The church at Oceanside was compelled to decline the tendered resignation. The entire community, members of other churches and members of no church at all united to increase the salary of Brother Sweeney. Other pressure was brought to bear. Oscar Sweeney remains at Oceanside.

The San Diego First Church is just completing one of the finest and best equipped houses of worship on the Pacific coat. Pastor Crabtree illustrates the social value of a permanent ministry. He has won unsought but deserved recognition as "the most influential citizen of San Diego." This is clearly what the ministry of Christ ought to be in every community.

The Magnolia Avenue Church, of Los Angeles, has just celebrated the sixth anniversary of its Sunday-school. Nearly a thousand were listed "present" and an offering of $600 marked the fervency of the day. "More Room for the School" was the slogan. A new bungalow is the result. Brother Jesse P. McKnight is a prince of pastors.

The First Church of Los Angeles is attracting the largest audiences in the twenty years' ministry of A. C. Smither. At a recent business meeting of the church it was found that all current bills were paid and more than a hundred dollars remained. A great work remains to be done by this mighty force, for the problems of the "down town" church are met only by heroic effort which reaches afar.

Sumner T. Martin is doing a great work in the Imperial Valley. It takes the pioneer spirit of self-denial, the pioneer vision and the pioneer faith to achieve results in this wonderland of soil productivity. Holtville has been greatly strengthened by a meeting;

El Centro is actively at work on plans for a much needed house of worship and work; Calexico and Brawley will be evangelized and new churches started as soon as possible.

As ought to be expected from our ministry, our preachers are almost without exception taking the lead in Teacher Training work in their repective communities. Crabtree and Morgan in San Diego, Glover in Fullerton, McConnell in South Pasadena, McIntyre in Santa Monica, Lobingier in Ocean Park, Rogers in Long Beach, Emerson in Redlands, Anderson in Riverside, Maddux, McKnight, West

The Sky Is Bright

Never before were the skies brighter for the March Offering for Foreign Missions. Sunday, March 6, is the time.

The Missionary Rallies have been unusually successful. The attendance has been large and the interest real, vital and growing, and even enthusiastic.

Preparation for the day has been emphasized. This is reflected in the large orders for March Offering supplies.

The prospects for new Living-link churches were never brighter. We can already see a large number. Let none of "the old guard" break rank and we are sure of a mighty victory. There are over one hundred in this class.

The Apportionment of the churches has been cordially received. Comparatively few requests have been made for reductions. Please see that no church falls short of the amount asked. Put your church on the Roll of Honor. This, the first offering of our Second Century, should be a large one in every church. What we do this year will be recounted in our churches for the next hundred years. Let every man do his best.

The Laymen's Missionary Movement has had a marvelously quickening effect in many cities. In Pittsburg, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Louisville and St. Louis and other places a determined effort is being made to at least double previous records. Look out for some great reports.

There will be a number of new One Day Churches, that is, churches that will give $1,000 or more, or an amount equal to the support of all the work of the Foreign Society in all lands for one day. Last year there were some eight churches in this class.

A number of churches are working to secure an offering from every member. Churches reaching this high standard are known as Every Member Churches. This honorable class does not require great strength either numerically or financially. The one "test of fellowship" in this class is that every member gives something.

A large number of churches will give this year that did not last. If every church that gave last year will stand loyally "by the colors" March 6, we will astonish even ourselves. Please let no church fail on account of bad weather, debt or new building, or for any other reason. This cause is the first duty of every church. We must do this work if we would be churches of Christ. The New Testament church was first, last and all the time a missionary church.

The work in all the twelve countries we are cultivating is marvelously successful. Last year there were eight hundred additions in the Philippine Islands, or about fifty-seven for each missionary. The great work in Africa and other fields is well known.

Please send your offering if possible Monday morning, March 7. If you cannot send all then forward as much as you can and the balance later. We now owe the bank $61,000. This is the largest amount we have ever borrowed. This was done to pay the missionaries their regular salaries. The banks have confidence in our churches. Please send by bank draft, express order, post office order, registered letter or personal check, and give local name of the congregation when different from the post office, to F. M. Rains, Secretary, Box 884, Cincinnati, O. Let the whole column move as one man.

and Chapin in Los Angeles are all active in the actual work of teaching teachers to teach Jesus Christ in the Sunday-school. Throughout the land our preachers ought to be in the van of this vital function of the church.

M. D. Clubb is leading the Pomona church to really magnificent achievement. The new church building when finished and furnished will cost upward of $50,000, but not even this enterprise is suffered to interfere with the living links which this church maintains, one foreign, one home, one church extension, and generous observance of all missionary calls, besides the Bolenge Living Link of Brother and Sister Waters. In many ways the Pomona church is second to none in this country.

Long Beach church has just closed a splendid meeeting with local forces. But the term "local forces" has more than usual significance when the indefatigable Rogers and his no less indefatigable assistant pastor, Princess Clark Long, are the leaders and the persistent zeal of Superintendent Morrison, Mayor Windham, Buffum and hosts of others are the forces led. The Long Beach church is making itself increasingly felt as a force for righteousness throughout the state.

A. M. Growden, whose ministry in Ohio and Pennsylvania is widely known, has begun his work with the Santa Barbara church. This church has the problem of a vast pleasure resort, frequented for many months of each year by people of wealth and leisure. The faithful band who have "held the fort" there with splendid fidelity are bound to reap the reward of faithful labor. Pastor Growden is a splendid leader.

Broadway Church, Los Angeles, under the leadership of the veterans, B. F. Coulter and his assistant, John C. Hay, is continuing its wide ministry to multitudes in this city. Probably no church in the brotherhood is such a monument to a dominant Christian personality as is the Broadway Church to its only leader, B. F. Coulter.

The Wilshire Boulevard Christian Church is the newest addition to the Christian forces of the rapidly growing metropolis of Los Angeles. Located in one of the most exclusive sections of the city, it has stupendous problems ahead of it. Fostered by the Magnolia Avenue Church, and consisting largely at the first of former members of that congregation, it has behind it and in it a rich experience of successful work as a heritage. S. J. Chapman, one of the best of the new type of consecrated business men is the superintendent of the Sunday-school and one of the chief assets of the mission. In behalf of the Evangelizing Board, and under the direction of the Magnolia Avenue Church, R. P. Shepherd is acting pastor of the church. Its first Sunday-school session enrolled forty-three present, with an offering of $4.10.

F. W. Emerson, pastor at Redlands, recently closed a fine meeting with the University Church of Los Angeles, J. W. Maddux, pastor. This is one of the newer churches in the city and has been meeting its problems with worthy zeal and determination. It has one of the best possibilities before it to be found in the city.

E. W. Thornton has resigned at the Naomi Avenue Church, Los Angeles. He goes to the Sunday-school staff of the Christian Standard. Otho Wilkison, who has just begun a good work at Monrovia, has been called to Naomi Avenue. This church has the largest number of young people enlisted of any of our churches and it is reputed to be the very best opportunity for aggressive work to be found in the city.

The veteran D. A. Wagner has sold his property interest in the old Central Christian Church of Los Angeles and the property has passed into the hands of the trustees. E. W. Keller succeeds to the pastorate, with Brother Wagner as pastor emeritus. This church is but nine blocks from the South Main Street Church, L. W. Klinker, pastor, and efforts are already put forth to find some way by which to merge the two congregations into one strong and vigorous church. If it is decided that this ought to be done, some way will be found to do it.

The Santa Ana Church, A. F. Roadhouse, pastor, is rejoicing in the completion of its new and commodious house of worship. A recent meeting with Evangelists Meyers and Rehan showed seventeen additions and a general strengthening of the forces.

Redondo Beach, East Long Beach, Beaumont, Alhambra, San Dimas, San Pedro, and four additional points in Los Angeles City are the locations for immediate organization. Some of these calls are urgent.

E. E. Lowe has resigned at San Bernardino and is now in a meeting at Burbank. The San Bernardino Church has not yet called a pastor, although loving glances are cast toward Huntington Beach, where J. R. Jolly is the hustling and popular pastor.

Dedication at Tulsa., Okla.

It has been eighteen months since we came to this congregation. The time was auspicious at our coming. When we came the congregation was meeting in the little brick church that the writer dedicated for them some seven years ago, which would seat about 200 people. On the 30th day of January we dedicated our beautiful and modern new building, which has a seating capacity of some 1300 when thrown together. Our auditorium is 32x52 feet, with gallery on two sides. The chapel is so arranged that it is divided into twelve class rooms, all of which are in full view of the rostrum. Pastor's study, is on first floor, and ladies parlors at present probably the largest seating capacity of any building in the city. The money had been raised and all bills paid, except about $3,000.00, up to the day of dedication. Bro. Geo. Snively and his singer, Bro. Seniff, had been engaged to be with us and assist in the dedication, and continue with a meeting. Bro. Snively showed himself an adept in the line of dedication. At the morning

GRADE YOUR SCHOOL
On the Installment Plan!

Every informed Sunday-school worker desires to have the graded system introduced into his school. But it seems like too big an undertaking to grade the school all at once. Hence nothing at all is done, and the school goes on in the same old absurd way of teaching the children the lessons provided for grown-up people.

The International S. S. Committee has made it possible to bring the graded system in, like the Kingdom of God comes, "without observation." You can have your school graded without any agony—almost without knowing it, except in its beneficent results. Begin at the bottom now—with the elementary grades, the pupils under twelve years old. Provide teachers and pupils with the Bethany Graded Lessons, based on the outlines already authorized by the International Committee. Later on—perhaps in nine months or a year from now—when the Committee authorizes an outline of lessons for the Intermediate grades you will be ready to adopt them and the Bethany Series will be ready with the helps for you. And so on, through the Senior and Advanced grades, follow the International Committee and as fast as they provide the lessons you will be ready to adopt them.

Our advice to all schools, then, is: FOLLOW THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE. No independent course yet devised is better than that provided by the International Committee, if indeed there is one so good in all respects. Besides, there is advantage in the whole Sunday-school world studying together when our leaders really lead—as the International Committee is now doing.

The Bethany Graded Lessons may be commenced at any time. Purchase the main bulk of your supplies wherever you wish, but let us furnish you these fascinating lessons for your pupils under twelve. THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO., 700 East Fortieth Street, Chicago.

hour, over $4,000.00 was raised in cash and pledges. At the evening service the announcement was made that we had raised sufficient, but if others wanted to have a part in the work they could have the privilege. Over $200.00 was then given, while the collection was being taken. Our meeting continued seventeen days, during which there were 130 additons.

Bro. Snively is a strong preacher, and his sermons are especially attractive to men. We had many men and women among the additions, our Sunday-school having been largely gleaned during our regular work. Among the men were some of our best business men. Bro. Seniff is one of the best helpers as a singing evangelist I have ever known. He is not only a good singer, but a fine worker as a personal worker. Bro. Snively and Seniff are the hardest workers I have ever had with me in a meeting. They are house-to-house workers, entering all the business houses and offices, and talking the King's business to men, as directly as any man would his land business. The church by a unanimous vote, on recommendation of the board, increased the pastor's salary $520 per year.

Our annual report shows all departments of the church in good condition, having met all expenses and every department with money in treasury. We count this a worthy effort, when we consider the amount raised for the new building this year. During our eighteen months' work at the regular services we have had a total of 185 additions. Adding the 130 that came during the evangelistic services, makes 315 additions since our coming. We had 175 membership when we came. This is a great field of labor. Latest statistics gives to Tulsa 24,000. We feel that the Lord is blessing the churches in battling against the commercial spirit that predominates here.

D. A. WICKIZER, Pastor.

The Benevolent Association

The Benevoent Association has recently been notified that it will come into at least two legacies soon. There is a growing tendency among Christian men and women of strength to share with the poor the blessing which our Father has bestowed. So is Christ honored.

The National Benevolent Association has about 500 children under its care at present. Its family of aged brethren numbers sixty-three.

The Easter appeal is indeed and in truth the cry of the wretched. If they could be organized and marched by the doors of our churches and Sunday-schools, the sight would melt our eyes to tears, and our hearts to generous sympathy. First comes the helpless, abandoned, tiny babe, then the babe whose parents have both entered the "Great Beyond," leaving it alone; then comes the worse than orphan child, "cursed into life," the helpless victim of crime and cruelty "weeping, oh, my brother, in the springtime of the others"; following these comes the abandoned wife, haggard and worn by cruel treatment, and the pale-faced widow, with their helpless little ones clinging to their skirts. And still they come, a vast army of the sad, sick, hungry, naked, aged, an almost endless, homeless, hopeless procession, staggering on toward the open grave, begging in the name of our common Father and our Elder Brother to be given a fair chance to live, love and serve. Our Father cares for them. Shall we not hear His call to us to come to their relief? Jesus is not here to touch and heal or to bless and break and feed. He has left them to the care of His church. As we rejoice in the hope of a new and larger life through His suffering, may we to the extent of our ability lift some of the "world's wretched" into a sweeter, holier life before the shadows hide the light of another resurrection day.

The Association has just purchased an additional tract of land for the Cleveland Christian Orphanage. This Home needs the help of all its friends. JAS. H. MOHORTER.

Additional Church Life Items

Elmer Ward Cole is in a good meeting with home forces in Huntington, Ind.

The Brotherhood of the Hoopeston, Ill., church is planning to run a special train to Danville to attend the Billy Sunday meetings in progress there.

The church at Greeley, Colo., will dedicate its new house, April 3. Z. T. Sweeney will have charge that day. James Small will follow with an evangelistic meeting. A. E. Dubber is the pastor.

Finis Idleman, pastor of the Central Church, Des Moines, Iowa, has been chosen chairman of the committee, on public morals by the Des Moines Ministerial Association, representing the churches of all denominations.

J. F. Findley, pastor of the church at Fort Collins, Colo., gave an address on "Lincoln," Sunday morning, February 13, before the Women's Relief Corps and the veterans of the G. A. R. Mr. Findley is rejoicing in frequent calls for weddings.

The Christian church of Ashland, Ohio., recently closed a successful fourteen days' meeting. F. D. Draper, minister, did the preaching. President McLean, R. Ray Eldred and M. D. Adams conducted a rally with the church and vicinity, February 25.

The growing observance of Holy Week by our congregations is commendable. Among many others which have been noted in our columns is the church at Massillon, Ohio, H. Erwin Stafford, pastor. Special services will be held each evening of the week before Easter.

Another great pulpit will be left vacant by the resignation of T. W. Grafton, of Anderson, Ind., to take the leadership of the Jackson Avenue Church, Kansas City. Those Kansas City people go after the best when they want anything—and they nearly always get it. Mr. Grafton has been pastor at Anderson over six ears. During his term of service the two great meetings by C. R. Scoville were held, the first one resulting in over 1,200 additions to the church. The membership is now about 2,000.

John R. Ewers, fresh from his splendid meeting in Kansas City with Dr. Richardson's First Church, announces a series of Decision Meetings in his own East End Church, Pittsburgh, to begin March 20. We like the title "Decision Meetings." The name "revival" is repugnant both because of its etymology and its associations. "Evangelistic" is not much of an improvement, although its biblical basis is in its favor. "Mission" sounds like an affectation when used by any save an English evangelist or by the Catholics or Episcopalians. But "Decision Meeting" says precisely what you mean and has no questionable association. We thank you, Mr. Ewers, for the word.

We are a bit puzzled at a newspaper clipping sent us from Vincennes, Ind., saying that William Oeschger has declined a call to a Pittsburg church and is taking under advisement several other invitations from different churches. We had not heard, except by the implications of this report, that Mr. Oeschger had resigned at Vincennes. We profoundly hope the report is in error. The great meeting just concluded in his Indiana church, with over 500 additions, surely presents a situation which no one but the indefatigable and high minded leader of this old church can conserve. Mr. Oeschger has been with the Vincennes congregation many years and ought to stay twice as long. He is one of the best equipped pastors of the brotherhood.

As We Go to Press

Terre Haute, Ind., Feb. 27.—My partner leaving the field. All my time open after March 20. Write me at Terre Haute, Ind. —Leroy St. John.

Kansas City, Mo., Feb. 27.—Two great audiences today. Thirty added. One hundred eighty-two in thirteen days of invitation. Unabated interest. Scoville preaches with power.—Burris A. Jenkins.

Elkhart, Ind., Feb. 28.—Closed four weeks' meeting here with 110 added. One young man for the ministry. Most successful meeting in any church in this city for many years. Canton, Mo., next.—Varney and Marks.

Vincennes, Ind., Feb. 27.—Our meeting covering six weeks was brought to a close tonight with a total of five hundred and twenty-eight additions. Wilhite and the Tuckermans are a great team. There was not a single invitation extended during the entire meeting without some one responding. Thirty additions at last invitation. Church and pastor rejoicing greatly.—Wm. Oeschger.

Clayton, Ill., Feb. 27.—Great meeting. Whole city stirred. Great audiences at all the services. Biggest men's meeting in the history of the city last Sunday. Church jammed today to hear address on secret societies. Thompson the Egyptian is preaching old Jerusalem gospel with power, yet kind and scriptural. He is hewing to the line, and yet the audiences are increasing every night. We continue.—S. E. Sines.

Good Word from Akita

Akita, February 1, 1910.

Dear Brother: Three baptisms the first month of the new year.

Our work has been wonderfully blessed by a visit from Doctor Brandt and family enroute around the world. His great addresses were much appreciated by the Japanese. His talks to the missionaries were helpful.

His subject being "Christ" and not "America" or the "I," he did us and the work much good. May the work be blessed by many such visitors from the home land is the prayer of the missionaries and the the Japanese workers. Yours in His service,

WILLIAM H. ERSKINE.

Mrs. Sarah R. Vandervoort

The death of Mother Vandervoort removed from the church at North Tonawanda, N. Y., one of its most loved and prized members. On Sunday morning, January 16, 1910, she passed away without even a moment's warning to husband and daughter, who were with her in the house. Living in perfect health up to the hour of her death, she was one of the most interesting and valuable of those who made up the membership of the North Tonawanda church.

Her father, Asa Ransom, was one of the pioneer settlers of western New York, and a prominent worker in the church at Clarence, N. Y., visited more than once by Alexander Campbell. Here Mrs. Vandervoort was born November 29, 1830, and throughout her life has been an interested worker in Sunday-school and church. In 1850 she was married to Jackson D. Vandervoort who survives her. Her sons, Levant R. Vandervoort and George E. Vandervoort, are well known in North Tonawanda and Buffalo business circles, and in the work of the church.

Mrs. Vandervoort's life was one of constant devotion to the better things. Some time ago she was made life president of the Ladies' Society of the church. Her religious convictions were of the most abiding character; her faith and optimism were in constant evidence. She lived for the church, her home and her Lord. It will not be easy for the church to fill the place left vacant by her death.

Items from American Missions

Secretary I. N. McCash is visiting the colleges these days. Valparaiso, Eureka, Columbia, Canton, Lexington, Kimberlin Heights and Milligan have each in turn given his patriotic message an enthusiastic hearing.

Valparaiso, Ind., Claude Hill pastor, and Phoenix, Ariz., E. N. Phillips pastor, are among the recently declared living link churches.

Douglas, Ariz., for a long time a mission of the American ociety under the California board was recently brought to self-support in a meeting by John T. Stivers.

W. N. Spicer of Bisbee, Ariz., is helping the Tucson church in the campaign for funds to purchase a lot. A fine site in the University section has been selected. This will be the only church in the new and growing section. It can aptly be termed "the newest church in the oldest town in America."

Centerville, Iowa, has become a living link and the great and important field at Vancouver, B. C., under the auspices of the American Board to hold a meeting and locate a pastor.

The work at Charlottetown, P. E. I., is progressing as never before under the ministry of J. F. Floyd. The daily papers report a house filled to overflowing and constant additions.

The American Board is anxious to locate a minister at Pictou, N. S. The church has been pastorless for several months. A salary of $1,000 can be paid. This is an important town and here is a fine opportunity for service for some young man.

The church at Pullman, Wash., M. B. Ryan, pastor, writes us assurance of self-support after July 1. GRANT K. LEWIS.

Mrs. Carpenter's Appreciation

For the very many beautiful letters, and messages of sympathy, love and condolence received before and since the death of our beloved husband and father, we desire to show our appreciation through the columns of The Christian Century, realizing it to be too great an undertaking to acknowledge them separately. Each and every one has been a comfort to us, and shall ever be remembered.

MRS. L. L. CARPENTER AND FAMILY.

J. R. Ewers in Kansas City

John Ray Ewers, pastor of the East End Christian Church, of Pittsburg, Pa., has just closed a series of "Decision Meetings" with the First Christian Church, of this city. Lasting but three weeks, they brought 105 into the fellowship of the church, and left a profound impression upon the congregation and community.

Brother Ewers is a preacher of great power, fresh and interesting in his thought and style, and earnest and sincere to a degree that commands the confidence and respect of all who listen to him. He makes his appeal without any seeming thought of securing mere "additions"—his effort being rather to move men and women to immediate and earnest decision for the life of Christian faith and loyalty.

The church will be richer in its knowledge of God and its appreciation of the power of the gospel of Christ to redeem both the individual and society from sin and selfishness, from his spiritual and invigorating sermons. And many others who heard his message will yet yield to the claims of the Christ whom he preached among us. W. F. RICHARDSON.

Laymen's Convention at Wichita

The great Laymen's Missionary Convention came to an end on Lord's Day evening with missionary addresses in most of the churches. Nine hundred and fifty-seven men sat down to the banquet on Thursday night, February 17, in the magnificent banquet room of the Masonic Temple. The addresses that evening by J. Campbell White of New York, and J. Taylor Headland, of Pekin, were worth going miles to hear. They were thrilling in interest and made a profound impression on the great gathering. Then, day by day, as the convention went on and we heard from those direct from the mission fields, our hearts did burn within us as we listened to the triumphs of the gospel in all lands. Our own missionaries and secretaries, Madden, Hagin, Corey and Allen, were no whit behind the others in the high character of their addresses. It is a matter of some pride that our two churches in Wichita averaged more per capita for foreign missions last year than any other religious body in the city, the average for the Churches of Christ being $1.78, while the nearest to that was the United Presbyterian, with an average of $1.61. It was unanimously resolved by representatives of our two congregations that we would work towards the goal of an average of $5 per year for foreign missions. We will not likely reach that amount this year, nor next, but we will reach it some day. The Central Church gave last year about $2,500 for foreign missions, $1,000 of which was for a special purpose and given by one of the members The city of Wichita resolved to bring its offerings up from a little more than $10,000 given in 1909 to $30,000 for 1910. If we can do that it will be a great triumph. The note of union sounded by all the missionaries and other speakers in this convention is a matter of greata rejoicing and the Disciples of Christ should be in the front rank of this great movement. Kansas City Moving Forward

The Kansas City spirit is wonderfully manifest in all of the churches efficient throughout our city. Fife and sons are with Budd Park with over 200 to date; Scoville and company are with Linwood Boulevard just starting with almost 200; J. R. Ewers just closed a great meeting at First Church, our downtown house, with over 100 added.

Monday night, February 21, at the invitation of Brother R. A. Long, about twenty men, together with a few representatives of our City Missions Committee, met at the Baltimore Hotel. The outcome of the meeting is that about twenty thousand was pledged for work in our city in addition to the splendid work of all our churches in city evangelization. Brother Long duplicates whatever the other men give for this great work. This is but the beginning. Half of the first year's pledges will go to Jackson Avenue; the other half will go into new work. The organization of these men of means will augment our city work splendidly. They will work in coöperation with our city missions committee; Langston Bacon is president and J. S. Donalson, secretary-treasurer.

A Brotherhood Union was formed Tuesday night at a banquet given by the Brotherhood of the Jackson Avenue Church. This, too, will add strength to our churches, which now numbers 10,146 members and are growing every day.

After thirteen years as pastor of Jackson Avenue, and also city evangelist, I have resigned the pastorate and shall re-enter the city evangelistic field here. I leave this great church of 925 loyal, true followers of Christ with great reluctance. I love them truly and while they have urged me to remain at a greatly increased salary, duty calls me to city evangelism. I know of no people who have been more faithful to Christ and supported their pastor better than this noble band.

Jackson Avenue is a great working church; alive and ready for every advance step. They have gone through loss by fire and bank failure and yet today they have a beautiful stone edifice worth $50,000, seating capacity, in combination, of 2,000. There is a great Bible-school, Aid Society, C. W. B. M., two C. E. societies, Brotherhood, clubs of young people, a fine gymnasium with over two hundred in the first few weeks.

Brother T. W. Grafton of Anderson, Ind., pastor of one of the largest churches of the Brotherhood, has been called as pastor and has accepted, to begin May 1. We are confident of still better things.

I have received into the fellowship of this church almost 1,400 people, nearly 600 in other city fields, making 2,000 members the past thirteen years, all in new fields.

The Laymen's Missionary Convention opens tonight. Kansas City is in line. The Christian churches are proud of their record. The 10,146 members gave over $11 per member for missions in 1909. We are united, working hard and intend to move forward.

Congregational Evangelism

We have just closed a three weeks' revival meeting in the Christian church at Boise, Idaho. We have been trying congregational evangelization, the pastor doing the preaching and Mrs. Clara Gish Ewing leading the chorus and the congregation in the singing. The church was well organized for visiting and personal work during the afternoons. There were no solos, but splendid congregational singing. The sermons were simple and straightforward gospel appeals to the minds, hearts and consciences of the people. We did not appeal to the fear of death, but urged the hearers to accept Christ as the only Savior, because they were alive, well and strong, with the promise of long years of service before them. The interest grew till the last service was dismissed. The direct results were seventy-three additions to the church, forty-two by confession and baptism and thirty-one by letter and statement. The finest feeling and the best fellowship prevailed during the meetings, and the church is in a most happy and hopeful mood for the work of the future. The best of it all is that we have the whole force and organization of the meeting with us to go right on and follow up the revival to the very best advantage. We believe that such a meeting is better for a church than one led by an imported evangelist and singer. Where the congregation depends upon the minister for the evangelizing, and where the minister depends upon the professional evangelist the church is bound to suffer in the long run. We wish therefore to recommend to the churches everywhere not only pastor evangelization but also congregational evangelization as best adapted to yield permanent results and build up the cause of Christ.

The Bethany Graded Sunday-School Lessons

Will the new Graded lessons make their way into the Sunday-schools and become the standard lessons of the Sunday-schools of the world as the Uniform lessons have done? There are many signs indicating that this is precisely what will happen.

1. All the authorities in religious pedagogy have been a long time agreed that it is better to suit the lesson to the learner than to compel the learner to adapt himself to the lesson, regardless of his stage of mental development.

2. The International Committee which has for thirty-five years selected the Uniform lessons has now begun the issue of an additional series called the International Graded Course, consisting, not of one Scripture lesson for the entire school, but of a separate series of lessons for each year or grade, chosen with direct reference to the age and ability of the pupils.

3. These lessons are being adopted by the best schools of all denominations. The Presbyterians report that about two thousand of their schools adopted the International Graded courses for children under twelve years, last quarter. This is phenomenal. The Methodists and Congregationalists had to go to press the second and third time to supply the unexpected demand for the graded lessons.

The New Christian Century Co. is supplying these lessons to the Disciples' schools. There is no single achievement in which the publishers of this paper take greater satisfaction than in connecting our schools with this most significant Sunday-school advance of the last fifty years.

The editors of The Christian Century, Mr. Morrison and Professor Willett, both regard the Graded principle as essential to the highest efficiency in religious instruction, and both believe that the Bethany Series is the truest, simplest and most artistic set of supplies for the elementary grades that has ever been put out.

Our pleasure in offering the Bethany Graded Lessons to the brotherhood is enhanced by the fact that our orders for supplies for the winter quarter have been much beyond our expectations. Many other schools have assured us of their purpose to adopt The Bethany Lessons at once. This series may be begun at any time. See full description on another page.

His Religion.

In the New York city home for the aged a deaf old gentleman was making application preparatory to becoming an inmate. As is the usual procedure, he was questioned as to age, income, nationality, and religion. He seemed to be able to get through with the first three questions, but when asked his religion he stared blankly at the superintendent.

The doctors and orderlies of the home went through a series of shouts and explanatory gestures, but without success. As a last retort one of the doctors dropped on his knees, and with hands upraised to heaven tried to illustrate what they meant by religion. A gleam of intelligence came over the good man's face, and he exclaimed, joyously, "Tammany hall."—Success Magazine.

Not Enough Boy.

F. Hopkinson Smith, author of "Forty Minutes Late" and other stories, tells a story of a southern slave who diagnosed a boy's illness in her master's home. "It's a case of too much watermelon," she said. One of the others informed her with great dignity that there could be no such thing as too much watermelon. "Well," said she, "then there ain't enough boy."

We Have Too Many Ministers!

A Plea Against Mere Quantitative Increase

We have been hearing much of late regarding the need of a larger number of young men as candidates for the ministry. For some years past the theological seminaries and divinity schools of the land have been mourning the decline in the numbers of their students, and wondering what the future of their denominations would be if the ratio of decline continued. Of late there seems to have been a slight increase, and the alarm felt two or three years ago has, in a measure, subsided. Yet there are in all the churches strong and insistent calls for a larger company of ministerial volunteers. And the Disciples of Christ have heard this call uttered frequently of late.

It is claimed that we have scarcely more than one-half as many ministers as churches; that many of our congregations, especially in the country districts, are dying for want of shepherding. It is said that the duty of the ministry ought to be laid upon the consciences of a multitude of young men who are now entering other vocations, quite unmindful of the privilege and responsibility which the ministry presents. We are pointed to a few conspicuous instances in which single congregations have sent forth a dozen or more young men into the ministry, and are told that these fine examples should be emulated by many churches among us.

We have serious doubts as to the soundness of this plea. We are persuaded that unless the quality of the ministry is to be distinctly raised we have quite enough preachers at the present time. We are aware that the number of those now studying in our colleges with the general understanding on their own part and that of their instructors that they will enter the ministry is far in excess of the actual number who will finally assume the work of preaching. And in this fact we find comfort rather than disquietude. The longer we study the question, the more firmly are we convinced that there are too many men in the ministry today, and too many are being urged to accept the work.

There is first that class of young men who accept the ministry as a life calling because it seems on the whole to be as easy a method of making a living as any. The social advantages which it offers are rather attractive. It gives a man a fairly good standing in the community. Its financial returns are likely to be as great as those of any other professional work, as the average of such callings goes. It therefore seems to the somewhat careless, easy-going, ambitionless type of young man a field in which one can get on with about as little work as can be tolerated anywhere under the semblance of a serious calling. The result is that a class of ministers exists who are unconsecrated in life, undignified in conduct, indifferent to the deeper interests of the church, and chiefly concerned in getting a job and holding it as long as possible without putting forth too serious efforts in the direction of real and honest work. Of this class of men there is a sufficient number, unhappily, to give to the whole ministry a certain color in the eyes of undiscriminating people. It need hardly be said that however few these men may be, they are still too many, and their class ought to be restrained to the utmost from entering the ranks.

Again, there is the young man who is closely related to the one above mentioned, who takes up the work of the ministry because he is of the opinion that he can make good there, but is prepared if something more attractive invites to abandon the pulpit and take up the new enterprise, whatever it may be. He will try the ministry for a few years and see if it suits him. But he has no thought of anchoring permanently and firmly in this great calling unless everything goes well. He would as soon practice law or teach school or sell life-insurance, oil or rubber stock. He has no desire to overwork or make a martyr of himself. On the whole he presumes he can get about as much out of the ministry in the way of financial returns as in anything else, but if he should become convinced that a more profitable business was open to him and that he could make more money in some other way, he would not hesitate to change his vocation. The experiences of self-sacrifice, courage, patience and humility, which the true servants of God have so marvelously manifested in all the ages have no attractions for him. He is not willing to pay any great price for the privilege of being a messenger of God. We are confident that the number of such self-seeking and unreliable men in the ministry is not great. Nevertheless, it is too great for the welfare of the work. It is far better that men of this type should never be encouraged to enter, and if they are once in they should get their own consent to leave as quickly as possible.

A third class, of which we have already too many, and to swell whose ranks others are now coming forward, is that group of ministers who are unprepared to discharge with any large degree of value the work of the ministry. Their educational foundation is inadequate. Opportunities which they might have taken they did not have the courage or the consecration to embrace. They are narrow in view, legalistic in spirit, sectarian in temper. They are absolutely incapable of interpreting Christianity in the breadth and beauty of its spirit and the loftiness of its ideals. They are the men who cry out against the light and back under shelter of a mental creed at the approach of an idea. Their zeal is evident, but their wisdom is lacking. They are the perpetuaters of outworn conditions, the fanatical defenders of threadbare phrases, the eager followers of dogmatic leaders. This class of men may not be large among the Disciples or elsewhere in the church, but however small it may be it is still too large for the welfare and safety of the church. It would be well if all such could be restained from taking up the ministry before they have gotten too far started in a work which would be better without them.

Most patent of all is the fact that there are too many churches, especially in small places, and that these churches are kept alive in careers which are often a detriment to the religious life of the community by ministers who must make a living somehow, and who put their efforts into the strengthening of a church not because the community needs it, but because it is a base of supplies of denominational and ministerial revenue. Seriously considered, the situation in a large number of towns and cities is pathetic in the extreme because of this very element of over-churching and rivalry. If one-half or two-thirds of these contending churches, whatever be their creed, were closed up the community would be vastly better off, because the remaining churches would be the result of union, would work with a common purpose and would accomplish results now impossible.

But why are these rival churches continued? It is because there are ministers who must have places in which to preach. If the number of ministers was reduced the churches would have to follow the same course of reduction in number, and that is precisely what ought to happen. This would leave the best men in the ministry to work where there is real need of their services, and the others might well betake themselves where many of them seem to be going today, into other professions, or into business.

There was a strong conviction in earlier days that the minister must be born and not made, that he must be called of God to his task and not merely induced by some superficial consideration to devote himself to it. We have too far abandoned this conception of the ministry. It is too much the tendency of the present time to degrade the preacher's office by conceiving it as a work which any fairly well-disposed and harmless individual may undertake. There was never a greater fallacy, and the results of this view are seen in the numbers of men atempting to perform the duties of church leadership who have no suitable qualifications for the work and who could not by any stretch of the imagination be thought of as called of God.

There is need of a return to the older, truer and more biblical conception of the ministry as the work of the prophet of God, the proclaimer of righteousness, the man who has paid the price and is willing evermore to pay the price of a vital and timely message, to spend his life not in the trivial tasks which too frequently make the ministry seem like a superficial and inconsequential work, but in the hard but glorious work of interpreting daily by word and conduct the message of Christ to the world.

Editorial Survey

Has the Spirit of Jay Gould Returned?

A brief was filed in a Chicago court some time ago that, if the allegation is true, tells of a revival of the methods of Jay Gould by some of our most honored financiers. It was filed by Otto Gresham, administrator for the estate of John S. Cooper, but was dismissed by the judge because the dates for each separate transaction alleged were not supplied. Mr. Cooper was the "promoter" or attorney for the gentlemen charged with having worked the deal and being dead could not very well supply the missing dates, but the case has been appealed and may yet get a hearing on the documentary evidence the heirs claim to hold. The financiers are such men as Theodore Shonts, Pres. Brown of the N. Y. Central, Paul Morton, Robt. Mather, former President of the Rock Island and others of lesser note. Here is the story told in the brief:

Mr. Brown was at the time Vice-President of the Lake Shore and Mr. Shonts was general manager of the "Three I's," the road involved in the deal and which is a freight line running from Streator, Ill., to South Bend, Ind., where it connects with the Lake Shore. The first part of the conspiracy charged was that the gentlemen involved diverted freight from the "Three I's" until the stock was greatly depreciated when Paul Morton negotiated its purchase for $3,000,000, its paid in capital being $5,000,000. Of this sum $2,500,000 was borrowed by pledging the entire stock of the road while the other half million was taken from a fund of $800,000 which had been received as rebates by the management but never accounted for to the stockholders. Bonds were immediately sold to cover the loan of $2,500,000. Now that the "Three I's" was in the hands of the "financiers," they, through their railroad connections, diverted traffic to the road until its business was quadrupled. Then through the influence of Mr. Brown of the Lake Shore that corporation was induced to purchase it for $7,000,000, a clear profit of $4,000,000, without the actual expenditure of a single penny by the manipulators. The heirs of the dead lawyer are suing for $100,000 which they claim is due for his part in making the deal.

This was Jay Gould's method of "making" money. He would create artificial values or get a small line depreciated by conspiring against it and then unload or buy as the case might be, pocketing the proceeds of his financial brigandage. It is to be hoped no technicality will stand in the way of a hearing in this suit. If the gentlemen charged with the conspiracy are not guilty they should seek to clear themselves from the charge that will be generally believed until it is met. If they are guilty it should be proven and not merely asserted, and they should receive the scorn of all honest men.

Is the Tariff Responsible?

The 'cost of living' continues to occupy the front in public discussion. The Philadelphia Record publishes a striking cartoon in which Mr. Trust is lifting the necessities of life above the grasp of men with jack screw entitled 'tariff' while the investigators are busy lifting the lids off of various boxes labeled with the names of those minor things that are supposed to be responsible. Secretary Wilson adds a bit of caustic information when he decares that commodities are being sold cheaper in foreign lands than at home, not because of the fabled "surplus in production" theory but because trust has monopoly power at home to arbitrarily fix the price. The only answer is that under legitimate laws of supply and demand that surplus should operate to lower prices. If prices are kept up in spite of the surplus on hand it is because the tariff throttles the law of supply and demand and permits a monopoly; in other words the tariff is the mother of the trust in that case.

Again it has been claimed that the increase is world-wide and that it is owing to the increase in the production of gold. In other words it is not a real but only an apparent increase because the dollar is cheaper and therefore the number of them that must be paid is greater. In so far as there is a general increase in prices over the gold using world that is doubtless true. But in England the general increase in ten years is only 7.7 per cent while in the United States it is 34.3 per cent. Some one shouts that the difference is due to the higher wages in this country over those of England. But owing to the fact that wages do not constitute so large a proportion of the total cost of production our shouting economist must find some other fetich. The English protectionists are not so ingenious as some of our American politicians and frankly deny their intention to tax the commodities of the poorest because they cannot stand the increase in cost it would bring. It is just as well to discuss the matter on the solid foundation of principles and say that one wants a tariff because he thinks the increase in income it will bring will more than overcome the increase in cost of living it will also bring.

That it does bring an increase in the cost of living is concretely demonstrated by comparing prices in two cities on the border like Detroit and Windsor. Windsor is separated from Detroit by but a half mile of water but that water is the boundry line between the high tariff of the United States and the lower tariff of Canada. In Windsor commodities are this much cheaper than in Detroit, eggs 6c, beef 3½c, butter 8c, potatoes 5c, turkey 5c, wheat 11c, corn 18c, chickens 15c, cheese 5cc, lard 2c. The argument that these differances do not register the exact differences in tariff taxes between the two countries or that some of the commodities are not taxed at all, does not overthrow the case, for there is no denying that when the tariff raises the general cost of living by increasing the price on the most of the commodities it thereby raises the cost of the untaxed commodities by raising the cost of living to those who produce them.

No one will be able to produce an argument as simple quite as a sum in addition to prove just how much the tariff tax does raise the cost of living. But let it be first acknowledged that there is no virtue in it unless it does that very thing—for how can it increase the wage of the producers without increasing the price of his product—then let the inquiry be directed to the indirect effects of the tariff as well as to its direct influence, i. e. let the question of monopoly, the effects of special privilege, the whole problem of artificial production of prices by legislation, and above all the fact that the consumer gets small consideration in tariff enactments be considered.

Items in Missionary Progress

In thirty years the number of missionaries in China has been multiplied by eight, the number of native teachers and preachers by ten, the places of work by nine, the number of communicants by eleven, and the amount given by the Chinese christians by thirty two.

In Korea the Presbyterian mission has 100,000 professing Christians at the close of twenty-five years. One-fourth of them has been admitted to baptism, seven thousand of the number having been baptised in the past year and 24,000 are preparing for that act at the present time. There are one thousand groups of these Christians and they pay 90 per cent of their own pastors and teachers. This native church gave more than $80,000 to the cause last year. This is equivalent to ten times that sum in our money. There are 840 chapels in this mission built largely by native gifts.

It was among the Tamils and Telugus of South India that the first Hindu Pentacost came. Today there are 900 missionaries in all south India with 14,000 native teachers and helpers. There are about a half a million Christians and half as many preparing for actual church membership. They gave $118,000 last year, the equivalent of ten times that sum in our wage earning power and there was an increase of 24,000 in the membership.

In Japan the actual church membership increased last year over 10 per cent and now numbers 70,000 with 600 organized churches and 1300 native pastors and teachers. They gave 300,000 yen to the work last year, equal to a million dollars in our exchange. There is now a native, self-supporting church and a missionary society that works abroad.

"Land Grant" Statesmen

A few years ago we heard very much about the "land grant" statesmen. They are not much in evidence any longer. There are a few of them left but they shun publicity. But the works do follow after them. Our Uncle Sam had much raw land. It was dirt cheap and so plentiful and our good Uncle was so sure that it was going to stay cheap that he gave it away like a prodigal who has inherited great wealth and showers the gold from his carriages. In all he has given away some 274,000,000 acres or an area larger than a half dozen of our Mississippi states. For the part of it that he gave to actual settlers all the world praises him. For that part he gave to any one else he can in this day find no sufficient justification. To actual settlers he has given 115,000,000 acres; to the railroads he has donated 159,000,000 acres. He gave it on the theory that the roads were neccessary to the development of the country, that there could be no settlers to receive the land if there were no roads to give him a market. The facts are undeniable. The settler had to have the roads and it was the duty of the government to furnish them if it desired the vast domain populated and the latent resources developed. But it did not need to give to private corporations more than one half the public domain to get the citizen a home in the other half. The roads received an average of 10,000 acres of land for every mile they built under the grants made. Poors Manual is authority for the statement that the cost of building was $30,000 per mile. It is a conservative guess to say that the roads realized from $50,000 to $100,000 on the land granted for each mile of rails. In addition to this it must be remembered that Uncle Sam has subsidized railroads to the extent of more than $100,000,000, notably the trans—continental lines that ran through the "Great American Desert." Suppose the government had simply guaranteed reasonable earnings to the new roads and allowed them to refund the advances when their earnings justified it? s it is the roads are capitalized on an average of almost twice what it cost to contruct them, have a bonded debt larger than their total stock issues, and, after paying the interest charges on the debt net their stockholders an average dividend of just a little under 6 per cent. In other words they do business on a capital representing practically their cost of construction but it really represents borrowed capital which their earning power has permitted the first owners to commute into debt while the actual investment was turned into cash through stock issues. All this warns us that public land and water power is not to be distributed to the people through gifts to corporations but preserved for them in such a manner that the free gift will not be capitalized into millions for the few.

Alaska's Black Golconda

The U. S. Governmental Geological Survey makes a report on Alaska's riches in coal that reveals to us a very Black Golconda in that bleak end of the continent. The Survey reports that there are fields in which the veins average a thickness of twenty feet and which will yield 20,000 tons per acre and that there are large areas of it.

The Gugenheim interests, the mining and smelter trust, have been making strenuous efforts to get hold of large areas of these coal lands. It is freely asserted by governmental agents that they have praticed fraud in their efforts and there is an inquiry on by a special committee of which Senator Beveridge is chairman. Alaska's represenative in Congress is Judge Wickersham. He has filed written charges and he has made allegations so serious that even Senator Beveridge refuses to allow them published or to even incorporate them in the records of the committee, claiming that their apparant reflection on the administration would be misconstrued. It is clear however that Secretary Ballinger is inmeshed in them. Delegate Wickersham states that he has been threatened with bodily violence by lobbyists of the Gugenheim's in Washington and further says that some of these paid lobbyists are army officers from Alaska.

The plan that was proposed was for the government to lease the right to mine the coal on these lands at $10 per acre. Now comes John E. Ballaine, said to be the largest property holder in the territory, and offers the government 50c per acre for a 5,000 tract and to give a bond of $1,000,000 that he will fulfil his part of the contract. He says that he will mine enough coal from the tract to net the government $50,000 instead of the $50,000 the Gugenheims' expected to pay. It is safe to say the publicity being given the whole matter of conservation will defeat the steal. It is in far away and little known areas of public wealth that privilege gets its "stakes" on the plea of public development.

Temperance Notes

Ohio sold 10,000,000 gallons less of beer last year, the first under the Rose law.

In Northern California last year 400 saloons were voted out, and the Anti-Saloon League helped to prevent the issuance of 500 licenses in San Francisco alone.

The barkeeper "makes up" one gallon of distilled liquor into fifty drinks. More than 5,000,000 fewer gallons of distilled stuff was withdrawn from bond and sold last year. Thus a quarter of a billion fewer drinks of whisky, etc., were taken last year. The decrease in beer sold amounted to nearly 76,000,000 gallons. Each gallon produces one dozen drinks. Thus the beer drinkers took over 900,000,000 fewer glasses last year. To diminish guzzling to the extent of over a billion in a year is something. The whisky sells from 10c up and the beer for 5c, thus $25,000,000 less went out of pockets for the worst kind of liquor and the barkeep's "temperance drink" cost the people who need it for bread $45,000,000 less. Our temperance "fanatics" turned something over $70,000,000 over to legitimate trade if these figures tell the story.

Governor Stubbs of Kansas has won a signal victory for "dry" territory by persuading President Taft to order internal revenue officers to do all possible to aid the enforcement of local laws. Heretofore liquor selling has not been looked upon as illegal per se by that department. Generally a man found selling without a federal license was excused if he paid up back dues. Now he is to be treated as a criminal and prosecuted. Inasmuch as the possession of a federal stamp is construed as meaning that the purchaser of it is using it and thus is prima facie evidence of guilt, it will greatly help the enforcement of local laws against surreptitious selling. It is hard on the "blind pig."

In the last two years 184,658 divorces have been granted for intemperance. That means 300 divorces for every working day charged up to the saloon. Many times more suffer without appealing to the divorce court.

It has only been 130 years since Frederick the Great declared, "My subjects must and shall drink beer," and to that end forbade the importation of coffee.

The prime minister of Russia reports that under governmental control the use of vodka has declined. The government has been accused of encouraging its use because it needed the revenue.

The Order of St. Christopher is said to have been the first temperance organization. It was founded in Germany in 1517 and pledged its members from drinking toasts. The Order of Temperance was founded in Hesse in 1600 and pledged its members not to drink more than seven glasses at one time, and that not more than twice in one day.

In Michigan there are twice as many paupers per thousand as in Maine. The comparison holds in all cases between "wet" and "dry" states.

A Historic Commission

Dr. Errett Gates has been granted a year's leave of absence by the trustees of the Disciples' Divinity House, to be spent in research and study in Europe. He goes to carry out an Historic Commission in the interest of a more thorough investigation of the Old World sources of the movement of the Campbells.

While the movement they inaugurated has had an American development, its sources were European. All the early training of both of the Campbells was obtained in Scotland in the atmosphere of European religious thought, and their principles were practically settled before they arrived in America.

It is the plan of Dr. Gates to leave America in June, and spend the entire summer in Scotland and Ireland. He will take up his residence in Glasgow where he will have easy access to the historic library of the University, and to the northeastern part of Ireland, the scene of the early life and labors of the Campbells. He will visit every place connected in any important way with their life, and will make investigations of local religious history as well as of wider and more general religious conditions surrounding such places in the eighteenth century.

It is well known that Alexander Campbell confessed indebtedness to many men, and movements and books distinctly Scottish in their origin and ideas. The literature for a study of these can not be found anywhere in such an abundance as in Scotland. While he is making his investigations he will attempt to secure copies of the more important books that influenced the Campbells, as additions to the special library of the Divinity House.

It may not be generally known that the Divinity House has been collecting a library of literature written by Disciples, and about Disciples, or in any way connected with them, until it now has the completest collection of the kind to be found anywhere. The Divinity House was fortunate in securing the gift of the entire library of Dr. B. B. Tyler, who has been a special student of Disciple history, and a careful collector of their literature; and to his valuable gift was added a little later the entire library of J. T. Toof, a life-long collection of Disciple literature. Other valuable collections were given by T. D. Butler, of English historic literature, and by George Vandervoort. The Divinity House possesses some very rare works, such as the original seven volume edition of the Christian Baptist, and a few of the Christian Messengers of Barton W. Stone.

After making researches in Scotland and Ireland during the summer and early fall, Dr. Gates plans to go to Berlin to spend the rest of the year. He will study the history of Christian Union movements after the Reformation in Germany. The materials which he gathers will form the basis of lectures in the University of Chicago, and of various publications on the History of Disciples, and the History and Principles of Christian Union.

During his absence in Europe, Dr. Gates will continue his contributions to the pages of the Christian Century, and will deal with his experiences and observations.

Jesus the Standard of Love

The first and greatest commandment finds its complete fulfillment in Jesus. Love to God controlled all his actions. His joy was in the doing of the divine will. What God required of him was not something foreign to his own desires. This oneness with God is the perfection of religion. We are in error if we think that religion is emotionalism. The deepest feelings of the soul are religious but much that passes for religion is too shallow to bear the name. Love to God is devotion to the ideals that are the expression of the character of God. God is a moral personality. Those who love him love righteousness.

Jesus is the standard of love to man. He went about doing good. His entire life was spent in helpful ministries to men. There was no lack of harmony between his profession of love to his Father in heaven and his practice with reference to the children of God. The religious leaders of his day accused him of blasphemy and of disregard for the law but the only ground for the accusation was that he put service to man before formalism. What he did shocked no man of insight. Only those who lived by rule and never inquired why rules were made saw anything wrong in what Jesus did for the unfortunate.

The impartiality of love is manifested in Jesus. It is hard for those whose standards of judgment are commercialized to appreciate the attitude of Jesus toward all sorts and conditions of men. We talk about vested interests and property rights. Jesus talked about human rights. He had not the slightest reverence for any law or custom that interfered with the development of character. He set aside the laws of the Old Testament that had been outgrown. The hedge of refind legalism which the scribes had put about the ancient law was not treated as a boundary by Jesus.

There are many ways of showing love to God and to man. A word to a boy or girl that is in need of guidance may seem a simple act but if it comes from a desire for the welfare of boys and girls it is a manifestation of love. We show our love for men by suporting the institutions in which the best character is formed. The reverence with which the home is regarded by good men and women is not superstition; it is the expression of their profound interest in the highest welfare of humanity. Love goes into the laws of the state. It aims to make it easy to do right and hard to do wrong. It seeks to protect the innocent and to restrain the vicious. Play grounds provided for the children of the cities tell the story of the love of good people for the children. The state provides for the instruction of all its children. Some who vote for the appropriation of money to support the schools doubtless are controlled by selfish motives, but the schools depend for their usefulness upon the support they receive from patriotic citizens who have other than financial interests at heart.

The church is an organization for teaching the world the meaning of love. It seeks to inspire men in all walks of life to act according to the spiritual needs of humanity and not according to the desires of the flesh. In the "Survey" of February 19, 1910, the editor has this to say of religion and poverty: "There are now at hand a vast array of institutions, societies, committees, foundations, governmental bureaus and departments, all inspired by the idea of social responsibility, all potentially religious in aim and spirit, all eager and ready to become the instrument of religion in its practical mission among the sons of men. The one indispensible element which these secular agencies of social betterment cannot supply is inspiration. The one element which religion alone can supply is inspiration. We make an irretrievable error if we assume that these secular agencies will supply their own inspiration, if we ignore the necessity for the direct cultivation and enrichment of the life of the spirit which is in these movements today because of the historic faith of yesterday and of the ages past. If we have not our own religious faith—rich, abounding, living, fructifying faith—the secular agencies will perish, or perhaps become the instruments of the devil! The love, then, which relieves poverty is impossible where there is no faith in the God of love. We are driven back to Jesus for our help.

The love of Jesus gives the bad man a chance. It does not ask what he is or has been and then stop; it asks what he may become. The possibilities of human beings, not their reputations, their shame, their baseness, are laid hold upon by love. Furthermore, the burden which sin has brought to the world is shared by the loving God. Jesus bore the burden of sin when he was upon earth. Today his people must have a part with him in this heavy task. It is a serious thing to love the world. It means sacrifice; and also the only true joy.

Biblical Problems

By Professor Willett

What did Jesus teach regarding the place of miracles in his own ministry? J. B. S.

He taught that they had a certain significance as evidences of his authority as a teacher, but that this value was distinctly less than that afforded by his own personality and teaching, and that it was chiefly valuable in reaching those who were spiritually undeveloped and whom the higher evidence did not impress. The word "miracle" is liable to be erroneously understood as indicating only that which is superhuman and therefore impossible for other men to attempt. Jesus' favorite word for these acts of unusual character was "works" or "powers." The exceptional abilities of various sorts that are manifested by people of unusual endowment suggest the true explanation of the subject. The wonders that Jesus performed were the natural product of such a life as his. On the degree and extent of life, on its intensity and range of power, it will depend whether its natural workings will be restricted to or rise above the plane of the common and familiar. To Jesus, dowered as he was with a life of marvelous completeness, in vital union with God, deeds that seemed to his contemporaries to be supernatural were the natural disclosures of the life that was in him. The greatest of his miracles were not those which had to do with physical materials, but those in which the transformation of human character from selfishness to holiness was accomplished.

What special significance attached to the feasts which usually followed the sacrifices in ancient Israel? S. D.

The feasts were themselves sacrifices. In primitive times the eating of animal food was an unusual event, and therefore was invested with something of sacredness, and presently came to be recognized as having sacrificial character and only to be permitted in connection with a holy place. The animal intended for this purpose was brought to the sanctuary and there killed and prepared by the priestly servants of the place. A portion was burned upon the altar and a portion given to the priests, the remainder being boiled and eaten by the worshipper and his family as a sort of festal meal. The sacrificial assemblies were just such gatherings, only upon a much larger scale. The thousands of animals "sacrificed" by Solomon at the dedication of the temple were, in reality, the animals whose flesh was used in the entertainment of the people. But the whole ceremony took the form of a sacrifice. In the later days when the Deuteronomic law compelled the observance of all sacrifices at the central sanctuary, the embargo on the eating of meat except at the sacred place was removed, and the people were permitted to use animal flesh as freely as they desired.

When did Jesus become aware of his divine parentage and mission, and by what inner processes did he reach the determination to achieve his destiny? W. H. L.
Seattle.

Our knowledge of the progress of Jesus' thought is of the meagerest. Even the events of his life are told with such scanty detail that we know but little of his outward career. How much less can we comprehend his inner experiences. Our only source of knowledge upon this point is the testimony of the Gospel, that "Jesus grew in wisdom and stature and favor with God and man" (Luke 2:52). This indicates clearly that he was not born with full perfection of mental power, as some early sects of the church insisted, nor that he came suddenly at the moment of his baptism to the full comprehension of his redemptive work in the world. Rather it indicates the quiet growth to maturity of those powers with which he was so richly endowed. But how his Messianic career first dawned upon him and whether, at the age of twelve when he visited the temple, it had taken form in his mind, we cannot say. His words on that occasion may imply no more than the natural interest of an unusually gifted and pious child in the religious life of his people. If there is any approach to knowledge regarding Jesus' inward apprehension of his Messianic destiny, it may perhaps be most safely discerned in his gradual recognition of his power to abide sinless in a sinful world. From many points of view that seems the best approach to the perplexing theme of our Saviour's self-consciousness. But even here one has to walk with hesitant steps in the presence of a mystery which only future ages can make clear to us.

Charity in Theology

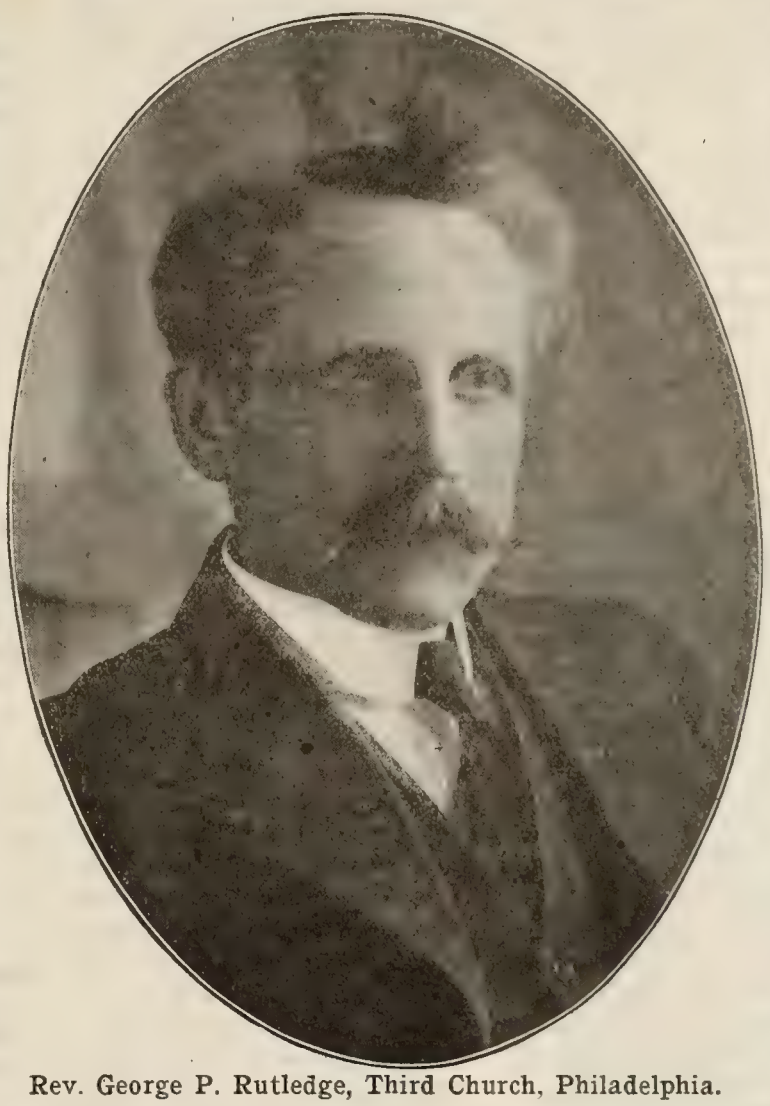
Love's Regnancy in the World of Christian Thought

By George P. Rutledge

Webster affirms that "charity" is "a disposition to think favorably of others." This is, undoubtedly, the connection in which the 13th chapter of 1st Corinthians engages the term. And it is there given a significance that transcends the gift of tongues and the ability to prophesy, the understanding of mysteries and perfect knowledge, extreme benevolence, conviction that will, if occasion demands, sacrifice the body in flames, and even faith—in its best and most powerful development.

"True charity, a plant divinely nurs'd,
Fed by the love from which it rose at first,
Thrives against hope, and, in the rudest scene,
Storms but enliven its unfading green;
Exuberant in the shadow it supplies,
Its fruit on earth, its growth above the skies."

In the universal proclamation of Christian ethics, charity is recommended as a cloak to be thrown over human faults. And the application is emphatically scriptural—"For charity shall cover the multitude of sins." We prescribe the exercise of this grace toward the business man with a question mark after his name, the irregular church attendant and the illiberal contributor, the charity howler in the congregation, the gossip-monger, and all other weak men and women—in and out of the church. Yet in theology—and I use the term in its current acceptation—



"Alas for the rarity
Of Christian charity
Under the sun!"

The age of the Inquisition is past. But the uncharitable spirit that made it a long circuitous chamber of horrors in church-history is not dead. It is less repugnant in its attire and therefore better looking than of yore; its methods of enforcing its power are not so revolting as they were in the dark centuries; and we tolerate it with a grace that would be impossible, were it here with the gory hands it held forth in the name of God during the more barbaric period of its career. Nevertheless, it is here and it is still very much alive. And, if I can see straight it is unchained and seeking whom and what it may devour in practically every denomination—to say nothing of the incalculable harm it is doing in the interdenominational sphere, and the retarding influence it is exerting upon the unsaved world.

Invective in the Heat of Controversy.

Here is the situation, in a few words. Conservatism brands liberalism "infidelity," and liberalism calls conservatism "old fogyism." The speeches made and the articles written in the heat of controversy over the questions that disturb the peace of the church frequently bristle with invective. And invective, no matter by whom nor under what circumstances indulged, is never Christian because it is never charitable.. The stage, on which the shameful tragedy (in which terrible reality plays its heart-rending parts) is constantly enacted, is occupied by first one denomination then another—and, frequently, by representatives of several denominations at the same time. One case is scarcely disposed of until another is before the footlights. Capable men, one after another, are either sacrificed or embarrassed and crippled, while the press spreads a perpetual feast before the spiritually morbid in the church and the ridiculing world.. If what I have just said contains any truth (and I do not fear its successful contradiction), the kingdom of God is delayed by every word that is uttered or written against any man or woman in the spirit of un-charity—no matter what the provocation nor how seriously the "defenders of the faith" on either side of a controversy take themselves.

Controversy is essential. It stimulates investigation and, therefore, brings forth gems that would otherwise forever lie, hidden away, in the towering and, as yet, only partially explored mountains of truth. But uncomplimentary epithet-hurling is never essential to anything—save the degradation of those who engage in it, the injury inflicted upon those at whom the missiles are aimed, the hindrance of truth's progress, and the extension of the world's black night. Calling some one "infidel" or "fogy" or insinuating that he has lost either his mental balance or religion—or both—is not argument, and it is certainly not an exemplification of the charity we profess in sermon, prayer, and song.

It is also the conviction of this essayist that the present-day heresy-trials are not only out of keeping with the thought-freedom of our advanced age, but exceedingly harmful as well, and therefore positively unscriptural. They are dogmatic, but not argumentative. Hence, the trouble never ends with the trial; but, like a thrifty, undaunted tree, it branches out in numerous directions. The man in the case is usually destroyed, and his loved ones and friends are humiliated. But the denomination to which he belonged has not yet passed out of the wilderness of its trials into the land of its hope! As a consequence of the treatment the man has received, his views, heralded far and wide, have infatuated and unsettled thousands who would otherwise have been content with the old, but now hunger for the new. Burning the heretic has never obliterated his heresy, and it never will.. Heresy is promoted by each trial, to which it is subjected. Therefore, if heresy be a good thing, the heresy-trial is advantageous. Otherwise, like the mud-flinging method of either oral or written discussion, it is the quintessence of folly. Last and worst of all, when the proceedings of the heresy-trial, together with the uncharitable flings, back and forth, that logically follow, get into print, the public points a scornful finger at the church, and starving multitudes that were ready to sit down in companies to be fed turn away from the Gospel feast.

What is Heresy?

But what is heresy? And what is orthodoxy? If history can be relied upon, the rank heresy of one period is frequently the gilt edge orthodoxy of the next. The change evidently takes place, but when, where, and how? The expert chemist can point out the exact moment when the juice of the vine is sufficiently fermented to be called wine, and he can also explain the process of the transformation. But on what theological expert devolves the supreme study of deciding when heresy is good, ripe orthodoxy? The difficulty has always been, is yet, and will be for some time to come, that this tremendous responsibility rests upon the over-burdened shoulders of the man who prayerfully concludes that he himself is the logical judge. Many a good teacher is branded "unsound" by people who do not know the alphabet of "rightly dividing the word of truth." Speaking in a general way, every one exercises the prerogative of passing judgment upon the teaching of others. Hence, the old definition—ever humorous, because it is so ridiculously true—, "Orthodoxy's my doxy and heterodoxy's your doxy!" But simply because your "doxy" does not happen to exactly accord with my "doxy," have I the right—either divine or human—to call you "infidel" or "fogy" or seek to destroy your influence as a teacher?

Our theology is divinely inspired, and it is therefore of divine origin. But it is humanly constructed, and it is therefore confined within the limits of human conception. It must grow, for two reasons—it is an indestructible system that is intensely and eternally vital, and it is the hope of the world. Furthermore, it must develop, in the future as in the past, by shedding the interpretations that are dead because it has absorbed their life, and taking unto itself, living in, and being promoted by the larger conceptions that come within its grasp. In other words, it expands as does the tree or any other living thing. It retains its kind, but enlarges its being and usefulness.

This conception might be brought out a little more distinctly if set in another illustration. As has already been suggested, the development of our theology is dependent upon consecrated human thought. Real thinking is growing, and reconstruction is not destruction, and we need not be made unduly alarmed when the hand of human-reason is laid on the world's most sacred structure. Here is an old house that must adapt itself to the necessities of the present generation. The process may evolve the elimination of things and features that have served their purpose and are no longer useful, and the addition of things and features that must do duty for a time; yet the structure, itself, remains—its columns more substantially set, its frame-work more securely joined together, its rooms better ventilated and lighted, and its entire character greatly enhanced and better adjusted to public view. It is now larger and more commodious, useful, and beautiful than it was before the hand of reconstruction was laid upon it. Still, the present occupant points with pride to the fact that he lives in the house his great grandfather built. And it will pass into other hands. But will it serve the next generation in its present magnificent style and appointments? So long as it stands, it will pass through repeated periods of reconstruction. The same is true of everything that advances the world's interests and must be developed by the thinkers of each generation. And if this is the process by which houses and cities, all kinds of inventions, art and literature, and the commercial, political, and social life of the world are expanded—why should any one marvel at or be alarmed by the theological reconstruction that is still in evidence?

Theology Not Fixed.

If it be asserted that the theology by which the world is to be lead out of its night into the golden day needs no reconstruction, because it has already been fixed, the question persistently presents itself—who fixed it? And if a dissenting voice answers, "God!" some other questions press their claims. When did He "fix it"? Did He "fix it" at Laodicea, in 360, when the Apocrypha was excluded from the canon? And did He "fix it" again at Trent, in the sixteenth century, when the Apocrypha was placed on an equality with the other Old Testament books? And did He "fix it" yet again, in 1826, when the British and Foreign Bible Society resolved that it would no longer circulate the apocryphal books? And did He "fix it" still another time when the Church of England drifted into the use of the Apocrypha for edification but not for the "establishment of doctrine," and the other denominations left it so far behind that the present average layman scarcely knows it ever existed? Verily, the Lord is accused of doing some very strange things!

"But the history of the Apocrypha is not a fair illustration," I hear some one think! Very well. Let your minds run back along the path, trod by any one of Christianity's great problems—problems either canonical or ecclesiastical—and you will find many sharp turns and long stony stretches that remind you of Apocrypha's path.

A Twentieth Century Test.

And if it be objected that the past is too far out of date to be wrung into the arguments, we will apply the test to our own twentieth century theology. That it is self-contradictory, the most conservative advocate of time-honored doctrines would make no attempt to deny. Calvinism and Arminianism are as divergent as the poles. Even the innocent little subject of baptism, which we strive to brush aside by saying "it is inconsequential, anyway," and which, nevertheless, occasions more widespread dissention in Zion than any other recognized ordinance or doctrine, must, according to the denominational division of opinion upon it, be diagnosed as follows: First, the great stem on which the word "baptism" is written in a bold hand; then the three branches on which modestly perch the three phrases—"proper subject," "exact or permissible mode," and "the design!" And, without going into more lengthy detail, suffice it to say that there are yet a few other points on which even the extremely orthodox do not agree! Will anyone assume the responsibility of affirming that God has constructed this Tower of Babel and put His people on it? It is useless to ask the question.

Our theology (and it, of course, includes Christology, which, in its practical analysis and application, adapts itself to the universal needs of mankind and is destined to redeem the world) is still in a process of development and will be for generations to come. And human thought, upon the part of both conservative and liberalist, is the instrument by which it must continue to unfold its increasing influence. If God used the devout minds of both conservative and liberal thinkers in the past, there is no reason why He should condemn the consecrated gray-matter of either class today.

Thinking Is Inevitable.

Men must think, and perhaps this is why the theology that is gradually enlarging itself and saving the world is dependent upon their conclusions. Every one will think, especially the student—be he genius or plodder. And he will think according to his temperament, his education, and his environment. The Gulf could be drained dry. Niagara's leap could be checked, and it may be that Vesuvius could be quenched. But independent thinking upon the deep things of God is as inevitable as the rising of the sun! No heresy-trials, no form of ostracism, no calumny—nothing can stop it!

"But if a man must think contrary to the recognized doctrines, let him keep his thoughts to himself," is a frequent admonition. Unfortunately for this piece of advice, there are two serious difficulties in the way of its successful application. The conclusions of the human mind are like love—they must express themselves! And, in the second place, history proves that, in obedience to the commands of the divine plan, the race must mine for truth and call attention to its finds.

The process is slow and tedious, and, at times, discouraging. But much has been accomplished. Some doctrines are established, and concerning them there is no controversy—the deity of Christ being the chiefest. And when a man accepts and proclaims this corner-stone doctrine—no matter how he arrives at its conception nor how wide of the mark I may think him to be in his conception of other doctrines—can I brand him "unworthy" and still walk in the path of charity?

Two-Sidedness of All Questions.

Every question under controversy in the present, as in the past, has two sides; an it will be so until sane, charitable argument wears the weaker side away. The contention is sustained by the fact that men of superior intellectual culture and enviable consecration are arrayed against each other in every discussion that has sufficient merit to interest and hold public attention. It is easy to set up a man of straw and then knock him down. But it is not the easiest thing in the world to meet the informed man on the other side of any question that disturbs the peace of the church and demolish his arguments with a single blow. If you wish to be convinced, select your man and try it! Every one, who has read and can think in unbiased logic, will agree with the statement that the authorship of the Pentateuch, the historical and allegorical aspects of Job and Jonah, the literary styles of Isaiah, the Virgin Birth, and numerous other questions, we occasionally hear from, have arguments on even the weak side. This being true, suppose I happen to be on the side of preponderant evidence—and there you will always find me—who am I, that I should brand the other fellow "knave" or "infidel" or "fogy" or drive him out of the synagogue! Who is any man—be he priest, bishop, or archbishop—that he should exercise the prerogative of speaking the final word on any controversial theological proposition, and annihilating the misguided, presumptious teacher or preacher on the other side of the question with the powerful breath of his own wrathful displeasure!

Un-Charity a Sin Against Christ.

Like Saul of Tarsus, it is possible, even yet, for a man or set of men, in blind human zeal, to persecute the Lord. If I misuse my brother no matter how far wrong I regard his conception of truth, the Master calls me by name—though I may be unwilling to recognize His voice—and says: "Why persecutest thou me?"

When theology shall have been so symmetrically developed that the Golden Rule will be sufficiently understood and appreciated to be universally applied in the church many important questions will yet remain to be settled. And there will, doubtless, be interesting discussions over questions that, perhaps, have not yet engaged the attention of our most advanced thinkers. But the lack of charity—the most pronounced and destructive heresy in all Christendom today—will not make the church ridiculous in the eyes of the world. Faith is important, but, if Paul be a competent witness, charity is more important. It is good to have straight, orthodox faith, but it is better still to exercise straight, orthodox charity. And I would add that crooked faith and straight charity are better than straight faith and zigzag charity.

"And now abideth faith (in man as well as God), hope (for this world as well as the next), and charity (in theology as well as society). These three, but the greatest of these is charity."

A Little Girl's Wish

"Mayn't I be a boy?" said our Mary,
The tears in her great eyes of blue;
"I'm only a wee little lassie;
There's nothing a woman can do.

"'Tis so, I heard Cousin John say so,
He's home from a great college, too;
He said so, just now, in the parlor,
'There's nothing a woman can do.'"

"My wee little lassie, my darling,"
Said I puting back her soft hair,
"I want you, my dear ilttle maiden,
To smooth away all mother's care.

"Is there nothing you can do, my darling?
What was it that pa said last night?
'My own little sunbeam has been here
I know, for the room is so bright.'

"And there is a secret, my Mary,
Perhaps you may learn it some day—
The hand that is willing and loving
Will do the most work on the way.

"And the work that is sweetest and dearest,
The work that so many ne'er do,
The great work of making folks happy
Can be done by a lassie like you!"

History of the Disciples of Christ

A Review of Dr. Moore's Comprehensive and Monumental Volume

By A. B. Jones

I have been reading the "History of the Disciples," by Dr. W. T. Moore, and published by the Fleming Revell Company, New York and Chicago, and I feel moved to write a few words about it—not a full and formal review.

It is not an easy task to write a good history: a history satisfactory to one's self; and less so to write a history satisfactory to other people, especially to the people who lived in the times and were associated with the events of which the history treats. This difficulty is increased when the writer of such history was himself an active participant and factor in the stirring events and revolutionary incidents covered by his historical sketches. In a case like this it is very difficult if not impossible for a writer to eliminate self, and to write with an unbiased mind.

A. B. Jones.

In reading history men want the facts undiluted, the truth uncolored; they want these facts and truths in their true relations and their just proportions. And here is the rub with the historian who undertakes to write of his own times. This is wny we always read autobiographies with some grains of salt.

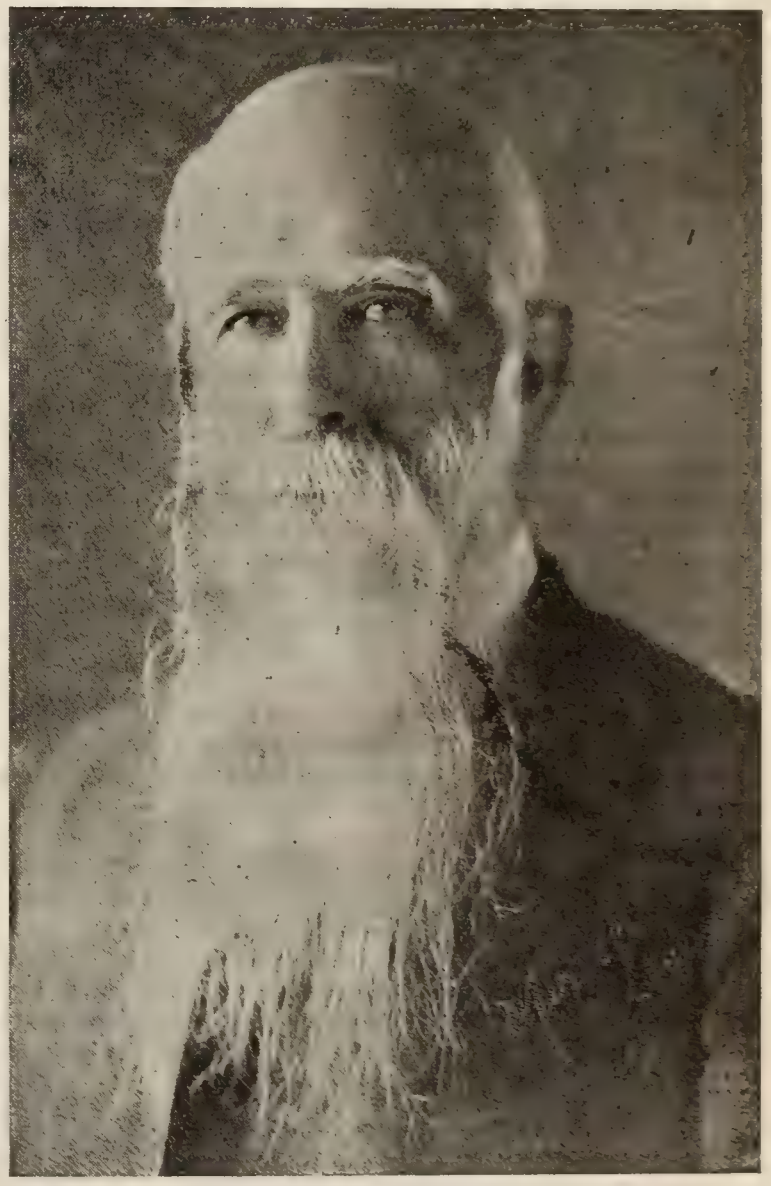
Thomas Benton wrote "Thirty Years in the United tates Senate." Mr. Benton had the reputation of being the greatest egotist of his day. Would anybody expect this work of his to be impartial and fully reliable in every respect?

Not many men are qualified by nature and acquirements to write history. Perhaps no man is equal to the task of writing a fair and adequate history of himself or of his own times. Dr. Moore says he has spent forty years in preparation for the writing of this history. But this will not relieve it of the embarrassment suggested above.

And yet we are all glad Dr. Moore has written this history. While there are spots on the sun still the sun gives light. And Dr. Moore's history of the Disciples will be suggestive even in its defects, and helpful by its many excellencies, to some future historian, who being further removed in time and without personal association in the events of which he is to write, can survey the field deliberately and philosophically, and, endowed with an adequate historical imagination, will produce a history of the Disciples that will be a standard authority on the matters of which it treats. History itself is an evolution, and the writing of history is an evolution as well.

With these general preliminary observations let us now come to a closer view of this book.

In literary style Dr. Moore is clear. You have no trouble in understanding him. He appears to write with ease to himself, and you feel at ease in following him. When you have to read a man's sentences over again and sometimes again in order to understand him you don't feel drawn to his writings. You lay that book aside and take up something else. Dr. Moore seldom makes an effort at fine writing; and when he does—as he appears to do on the last two pages of his introductory chapter—he falls below rather than rises above himself.



As a writer Dr. Moore is also strong in his style. There is a masculine quality in his writings that arouses the mental faculties and provokes thought. He is now an old man and occasionally he seems to fag and drop a loose sentence like this: "Recognizing as they did that a religion will always be as its Deity is, the early pioneers were careful to give the people a true conception of God, for they recognized the fact that a religion will always take on the type of the God that is worshipped by those who hold to that religion." But this is a rare occurrence.

In his illustrations also the author some times lets himself down in his style, as when he likens the difficulty of persuading people to accept believers' baptism instead of infant baptism by "the difficulty of inducing Mr. Jones to substitute a new and improved cook range for the old one in his kitchen." And again where he represents his idea of being normally saved through baptism, and yet being abnormally saved without it, by exploding a gun normally by "pulling the trigger," and yet it "may be exploded by other methods." The reader feels that these illustrations are not in keeping with the writer's general dignity of style. About this abnormal firing of his gun more here-in-after. We are now speaking of the literary features of the book.

The author has shown ability in the general plan of his work—in classification and logical and chronological arrangement of his material. By this means his book is made pleasing and inviting to the reader. It is as interesting as a well plotted novel.

In reading Dr. Moore's book the impression is left on the mind that you are getting the simple facts of history; that the writer is interpreting those facts in accordance with his own view of what they ought to be. In this way the whole book has the appearance of revolving around the author as the central figure. His introducing into the book his own address in London on the character and life of President Garfield at the time of his assassination, and his long chapter on the "meaning of baptism"—is this writing history or is it an effort to make history?

The doctor expresses his own views of baptism as the views of the Disciples. There may be some Disciples who agree with the author that baptism is a condition of salvation; but I doubt whether he will find many of the more thoughtful and scholarly among them willing to accept his ideas. If baptism is a condition of salvation like faith and repentance, then a man cannot be saved without baptism. "He that believeth not shall be damned." He that is not baptized shall be damned! "Except you repent you shall perish." Except you are baptized you shall perish! Is this scriptural teaching? The author felt himself confronted by the difficulty of his position, and sought relief by his ludicrous illustration of firing his gun by "pulling the trigger." He argues that the normal way to fire the gun is to "pull the trigger," but if necessary the gun may be exploded by other methods. So the normal way of salvation is through baptism, but if necessary other methods may be improvised. But suppose in actual practice with your gun you find that it is necessary to adopt other methods of exploding it a hundred times when you can fire it by "pulling the trigger" only once? Would not the exceptions become the rule and the rule the exception? And would you not seek a better gun? If in actual practice God finds it necessary to save a hundred men without immersion—as he does—where he can save one through immersion will he not conclude that his plan of salvation needs to be improved?

William T. Moore, LL. D.

But the worst feature of this case is that Dr. Moore seeks to make it appear that Alexander Campbell's views of baptism harmonize with his own. He admits that in his debate with McCalla, Mr. Campbell said: "Paul's sins were really forgiven when he believed, and formally when he was baptized." But this was when he was a Baptist. And he quotes Raccoon John Smith approvingly, as saying, "Mr. Campbell said that when he was a Baptist: when he left the Baptists he had more sense."

If Dr. Moore spent forty years preparing to write his history he ought to know better than that. His contention here is untrue and misleading. In his debate with Mr. Rice, page 472, Mr. Campbell says:

"Some twenty years ago, when preparing for a debate with Mr. Calla, I put myself under the instruction of the four evangelists, and one Paul, of apostolic rank and dignity. I had for some time before that discussion been impressed with such passages as Acts 2:38; and that providential call to discuss the subject with Mr. McCalla compelled me to decide the matter to my entire satisfaction. Believe me, sir, there I had forgotten my earlier readings upon the subject; and upon the simple testimony of the Book itself, I came to a conclusion alleged in that debate, and proved only by the Bible, etc.

In that debate with Mr. Rice Mr. Campbell also says: "I do not hold baptism to be absolutely essential to salvation in any case." And I could quote a dozen other passages from Mr. Campbell's writings to the same effect. Dr. Moore's history of the Disciples is sometimes a perversion of history.

The author should revise the title of his book, "A Comprehensive History of the Disciples of Christ," and make it to read, "A History of the Disciples of Christ, Apologetically and Polemically Presented Through the Colored Glasses of Dr. W. T. Moore."

When the book was announced for sale I ordered it immediately, and have enjoyed reading it. I have walked with the doctor back over the fields and through the scenes of the past and have greatly enjoyed his company. This history will be a part of my library henceforth, and I hope it will find a place in every preacher's library, among the Disciples, and in the library of others as well.

In conclusion I venture to nominate Dr. Errett Gates, Professor of Church History in the University of Chicago, as a suitable man to prepare himself during the next ten years, and then to write a standard history of the Disciples of Christ. Liberty, Mo.

The Religious Outlook

By Dr. Errett Gates

The Disciples and the Pragmatic Test

Pragmatism is the philosophy which explains the conduct of life as action according to present, experienced need, or with reference to immediate usefulness. It describes things as they are, not as they ought to be; and applies to all spheres of human thought and action.

What have men been doing in every generation, and what does every man do every moment of his conscious existence, whether he think or act, play or work, eat or sleep, believe or disbelieve? Pragmatism answers that he is trying to make things work agreeably, or serviceably, or beneficially. In this respect, the child does not differ from the man, the thinker from the worker, or the saint from the sinner. They are all acting and reacting with reference to what they conceive to be the values of existence. And in every case these values are never purely future; they are present and immediate. That is, the sense of those values or goods is present to the consciousness, and brings an immediate feeling of relief, or peace, or benefit.

The saint believes in a future paradise of bliss because it brings a present good—help in temptation or comfort in affliction. The miser hoards his gold for the future rather than spends it in the present, because it gives him a greater present satisfaction. In other words human beings always act from motives of present, practical good or usefulness. And this present serviceableness or value in turn becomes the test of the good and true.

My thoughts on this subject were started this morning by reading the following paragraph from "Religion and Medicine," by Drs. Worcester, McComb, and Coriat:

> The most powerful motive of religion will ever be the Practical Motive, and by the Practical Motive we mean believing because it is good and useful to believe, believing what is good and useful to believe. We are never at a loss to find measures for what we wish to believe. No one ever yet accepted a form of religious faith which promised him nothing but harm. The more good any particular form of religion accomplishes the more men will believe it, and the less good any particular church or religious institution does, the less faith it is able to inspire. Here lies the source of the power of Christian Science. It does unquestionably bestow certain great benefits on believers; it makes men happy, it improves tempers, it frequently weans men from evil habits, it can reduce or remove pain, it cures certain types of disease and it gives courage to endure those which it can not heal. It concerns itself with the present and its effects are direct, practical, immediate.

This statement explains what to me seemed inexplicable ten years ago, when one of the most active and trusted leaders of a church of which I was minister suddenly asked for letters for himself and wife to join the Christian Scientists. He was the superintendent of the Sunday-school, and the best one the school ever had; he was the heaviest contributor to the current expenses of the church and to the new building enterprise just launched. Without any warning he came to me one Sunday after the services and said that that would be his last Sunday there, and wanted letters to join the Scientists.

I was fairly dazed by the announcement. Had some one offended him? Had I injured him? Had he gone crazy? were some of the questions that shot through my mind. How could be abandon the Disciples who had the truth, and nothing but the truth, and go among a strange people who shared so few things in common with the Disciples. He had been a Disciple all his life and had stood close to some of the greatest leaders in Missouri. If any member of the church was sound in the "faith once for all delivered to the saints," I thought he was.

He made an appointment with me at his office the next day to explain the reasons for his step. He told me that his wife had been cured by a Christian Science practitioner. She had been in poor health for many years, and he had spent a small fortune on all kinds of doctors trying to cure her, but without avail. Now she had been cured by a few sittings with a Christian Scientist without medicine, or surgical operation. He had never known her to be so well. New life surged through her body, and new hope and light filled his heart and home.

He took his place actively among the Scientists and soon became a leader in the strongest of eight strong Science churches in the city. Today he is an official reader of the church, and the leader and largest contributor to the establishment of a new church. This new organization will build a better building than is possessed by any church of the Disciples in the state of Illinois. And yet as "Religion and Medicine" says concerning it: "Its interpretation of the Bible is so false, it is so obviously committed to errors, illusions, and aberrations of every sort, that the intelligent have been disposed to shrug their shoulders in contempt and to ignore it."

No one can miss the fact that Christian Science is, next to Roman Catholicism, the most influential and aggressive religious force at the present time. How shall we explain it? It is bestowing upon people an immediate blessing. Absurd? But it cures weak nerves, and bad tempers. Unscriptural? But it gives men new hope in life. It illustrates the philosophy of pragmatism. It works, therefore it is true.

And every religious movement that succeeds does so because it works as an immediate good in the minds and lives of men. It satisfies some need—intellectual, moral, emotional or physical; and whichever it satisfies it will be equally true to those who are benefitted by it. One form of need—the intellectual or emotional—may be felt as insistently as any other. It was when the intellectual need was dominant in the early days of Christianity, that it was intellectualized in the form of a creed. The church became a school of philosophy, and the basis of fellowship, doctrine instead of life. Metaphysical or logical consistency was then the test of the truth. Christianity was made to satisfy the intellect. It was proved true in debate or on paper, rather than in life.

When the Campbells began their work in the early days of the nineteenth century intellectualism was still dominant in the church in the form of theological terms of fellowship. The formulated creed was the standard of the truth, and intellectual satisfaction its test. Many a Baptist or Presbyterian was conducted by Alexander Campbell or Walter Scott to the simpler doctrinal system of the Acts of Apostles, when nothing more took place than a mental elevation due to the discovery of a new idea. They exchanged one plan of salvation for another. The same methods of proof passed over to the Disciples from the schools. There followed, as a matter of course, debates in public and in print, as to the doctrinal orthodoxy of the Disciples, until very recent days when modern men began to look for the satisfaction of other needs besides the intellectual. The Disciples were able to prove the doctrine true in the Book, or in debate; the present generation is looking for another kind of proof.

That is why the Sunday-school superintendent went over to Christian Science. Something was done for him by the Scientists that proved true by being proved valuable in his home. These are the new needs the men of this time are bringing to their religion to be satisfied. It was nothing to him that the word baptizo meant to immerse; that faith came before repentance, and not vice versa; and that the Holy Spirit operated only through the written word. He knew all this, but it did not yield him as much satisfaction as the cure of his wife. And he knew of other wives who needed this new gospel of health.

The preaching of the present has ceased to be doctrinal in the old theological sense because the religious needs of men are no longer merely intellectual. Human interests have shifted their basis from the theological to the ethical—from doctrine to life. Men are not religious today for the same reason that they were fifty years ago. It used to be enough for the preacher to put up a good logical argument against creeds, and human opinions as tests of fellowship, in favor of the New Testament terms of communion, to win the support and allegiance of a small community. Such sermons make no impression today upon most communities, for they do not feel the oppression and bondage of creeds any longer. Their difficulties are now of a different sort.

A gospel which does not help to bear the burdens and carry the sorrows of the present, is no gospel at all. The success of Christianity and of the church is pragmatically conditioned. Men will have nothing to do with the church if it does not have some real value for them. And that value will depend upon the greatness, the poignancy of the need that is satisfied.

Do Cities Kill Their Ministers?

By George A. Campbell

A prominent minister of New York claims that that great city is a graveyard for its ministers. He meant a literal graveyard. He meant that the work of New York pastorates literally kills their leaders.

The above question is not asked or raised by the ambitious country or town minister. The city for him has facination and probable victory.

The question is asked by men who know, by those who have felt the heat and burden and defeat of the city pastorate.

It is not true that Chicago has been a literal graveyard of Disciple ministers; for there is not even one of our ministers buried here.

Chicago is still foreign, strange soil to us. We bury our dead in spots we love, we do not yet love this great noisy tremendous city.

Even its beautiful cemeteries have to us none of the home-like touches about them. They are too vast, too busy with funerals, too strange with their various cosmopolitan inscriptions and perhaps too nice.

Our ministers refuse to die in Chicago. We do not love the pulsating life well enough to die here. When we grow tired and weary we expect to go back to the woods and fields and die near a quieter graveyard. Live Chicago like dead Chicago drives our ministers to fields more easily harvested. The pastors do not give Chicago a chance to literally kill them. They flee from the destruction. Some of them never look back. But the constant egress proves defeat and suggests a premature death if any large number stayed.

Why then are city pastorates difficult? Why are Chicago fields so terrifying as to cause fear to come to the heart of its pastorates? There are many reasons.

Its mystery is appalling. It chills when it fails to charm. One can look around a tree: but a dark forest often holds terrifying secrets. The city has such secrets. There is mystery in its very largeness, mystery in every unknown house, mystery in the saloon, mystery in the clubs, mystery everywhere—knock and these do not open. The best of souls are likely to become discouraged over much unavailing entreaty. Thus the unresponsiveness of the city overwhelms the minister. His pride is shocked. Elsewhere his personality means much. Here it is ignored. There is no man in our brotherhood who can get an audience in any part of this city by the power of his name to draw. He has no name here. The big man among us is not likely to attempt a work in Chicago because he would have to begin to built anew his reputation, and perhaps before he built it into the life of this city it would be entirely gone or he would be gone forever. In the history of our ministry of Chicago only one has ever returned to a second pastorate, no, two—but both stayed only for a short period. Several have buried their ministry here. Disheartened they have turned to what seemed to them more tangible occupations. They were and are splendid men.

The largeness of the task overwhelms. Chicago is half Catholic. Then there are foreigners of every kind—we do not understand them. We cannot meet them without a little strangeness coming between us. Sin is a big factor in causing the retreat of ministers. There is so much of it that one man is likely to undervalue the use of his own efforts. The indifference of former church members is one of the most discouraging features of a Chicago pastorate. There ought to be classes formed in churches sending money to Chicago to study, "How to maintain our Christianity in the Chicago atmosphere." Why do people leave the flowers and birds and soft coal smoke of Des Moines or the quiet peacefulness of Philadelphia to come to Chicago anyway? Why does anyone come to Chicago? With few exceptions everybody comes here to better their income, to make money. Absorbed in this object they often put off their Christian obligations until they cease to value them.

Another disheartening thing to city ministers is the scant time laymen give to the work of the church. They are hard driven in the week's work. They work to the limit. Most of them are heavy smokers. Their nerves are heavily taxed. They do not meditate much. Thus the city pastor is a combination of prophet, priest, business manager and chore-boy. The chore-boy makes a strong bid to crowd at least the first two out of the race. Most ministers think they are called to something greater and thus go where laymen give more time to the church; and where they can be preachers in fact.

The lack of proper support is another cause of the defeat of ministers in Chicago. The city pastor among us is very meagerly supported. Laborers who have just picked up their work without any years or even months of outlay are often better paid than our Chicago ministers. Two or three are fairly well paid, but not the others. They are willing to sacrifice; but not to starve. That would be suicide. There are other causes at work, but the above are a few that cause a procession of our ministers from Chicago. Our brotherhood does not love Chicago sufficiently.

It has consecrated no grave in Chicago. It is not serious in dealing with this city. It supports its misionaries on foreign fields far better than its city missionaries.

This is a glorious city. How glorious, and how good, I will suggest next week.

The Second Mile

While the friends of Bethany College are rejoicing on account of the success in raising the first $100,000 of the proposed $500,000 endowment fund, it is well for the public to understand that the good work will be continued. Brother Long will extend the time of his proposition to me and give another $25,000 if we raise $100,000 during the present year. We have already over $30,000 subscribed on the second mile, but this second mile will involve a hard pull for all of us, and I hope, therefore, that the friends of the college will not be slow in making known their desire to help. I will be glad to correspond with any one who is interested in the raising of this endowment fund and also to give all information and furnish blank pledges to be filled up. I am keeping a strict account of the names and amounts contributed, and when the canvass is completed all those names will be retained in a book for that purpose in the college library at Bethany. I make a special appeal to the old students and graduates of the college. The whole of the $80,000 now necessary to secure Brother Long's $25,000 should be taken up at once by the men who have received their education at the grand old college that is encircled with so many happy memories.

Eureka College and Education Day

The returns from Education Day observance in Illinois are coming in very encouragingly. One hundred churches promised to take the offering for Eureka College this year and thus far seventy have reported. Quite a number have sent in offerings that did not promise help this year. We have something like forty that promised to have fellowship with us that we have not heard from. We will have the largest number in line this year that we have ever had. Education Day must come to be recognized among our people as one of the great days of the year. We propose to do our part in Illinois. There is nothing that would help our cause more as we enter upon the second century of our work than the enlargement and endowment of twenty-five good colleges. Schools can never be endowed by free-will offerings. But free-will offerings with good endowment will make our schools mighty in the proclamation of the truth. We hope within the next thirty days to report that the number of contributing churches has gone beyond one hundred.

Benedict

Mrs. Sarah J. Benedict of Ionia, Mich., passed away on Saturday afternoon, February 19. She was a sister of Mrs. Mary E. Willett, whose death occurred last summer, and the two, so long beautiful and pleasant in their lives, were in death hardly divided. She was born in 1847, near Ionia, Mich., and spent all of her life in the Ionia church, of which she has been one of the most helpful and devoted members. She was baptized by Isaac Errett and served the church in numberless capacities as leader and helper. Through sorrow and through joy she has kept on with quiet, steady faith in the unseen realities, and has seen those who were dear to her go on into the larger life to make more real and homelike for her the eternal world into which she has now entered. The funeral services were conducted by Rev. G. Webster Moore, pastor of the Ionia church, and the sadness which fell upon the church and the community at her departure was profound. Mrs. Benedict was one of those true servants of God of whom the words of holy Scripture may appropriately be spoken, "She rests from her labors and her works do follow her."

It is a great thing to see God in the manna. It is greater to see him in the fields. It is a great thing to see God in the miracle. It is greater to see him in the usual. To waken in the dull morning and feel that God is there; to go to our drudgery and have his presence; to live in the faith that the hairs of our head are numbered, and that not one sparrow can fall without our Father, that is the mark of growing trust in God.—The Congregationalist.

A STORY OF THE TRUSTS

BY JANE RICHARDSON

CHAPTER XVIII.—Continued.

The house selected at last, was a plain and rather shabby cottage of four rooms.

"It is all that we shall need," said Mary finally, as Teddy demurred a little.

The rent was moderate and the landlord promised to make the necessary repairs. Teddy himself had quite a knack at such work and of evenings and mornings, when the days began to lengthen, he painted the whole interior of the house, put up additional shelves in kitchen and pantry, and built a new platform around the cistern. Of pleasant evenings Mary came and sat on an upturned box, and chatted to him as he worked, and they were blissfully happy. Teddy hoped to get the premises in good order by the middle of March. The coming wedding was a great event in the Neighborly Club, and instead of their own personal sewing, all worked, during the reading and talking, on the towels and table cloths, sheets and pillow-cases for Mary's home, marking them with an elaborate embroidered "B" which Jessie Clark had designed.

The girls felt a personal interest in Mary's well-being, and knew that when it should be required—a time not so far removed with several—they, too, could count on the good offices of the club. A few weeks before the wedding Eleanor invited Teddy to tea, and early in the evening, on the pretext of writing letters, she left them to the unwonted luxury of a parlor to themselves; though both earnestly assured her that they had no secrets from her, and that they had long ago talked over everything which had to be settled between them. Eleanor only shook her head in smiling doubt and left them.

"Oh, Teddy, I'm so happy. I don't believe anyone ever had so much to be thankful for—it almost makes me afraid," said Mary. Teddy laughed at her, but he, too, acknowledged being supremely content.

"We might have more money," he said laughing at his own small inconsistency, "but even then, while it would come in handy, I don't believe it would make us really one bit happier. When I'm there in the engine-room with Lon, and think of that little house we're going into before long, you waiting there for me when I come home, tired and hungry, at night—my own home and my own wife—the one I've always wanted—I feel as if it was more than I have any right to!"

"You deserve far, far more, Teddy, dear!" said Mary, "but sometimes I feel half frightened. It makes me tremble, and I've thought of an old King, Miss Eleanor once told us about. He had been so lucky in everything that at last the gods got jealous, so he went to the Oracles, who pretended to read the future, and to tell people how to be happy and keep off trouble. Well, this King had a splendid emerald ring that he cared more for than all his other jewels and riches put together. He hated to part with it, but the Oracle said nothing else would do:—he must give it up. So he threw it into the sea, and in a little while a fisherman caught a fine fish. He hoped to please the King, so he sent it to the palace, and when the cook dressed it she found in its stomach the emerald ring! The gods rejected it and the King was murdered!"

"That's not a very cheerful story, Mary," was Teddy's matter-of-fact comment as he kissed her lovingly. "You and I need'nt be afraid; we had all our troubles to begin with."

But a shadowy doubt had risen in both of their hearts—a subtle change in the mental atmosphere—like that marked by the sensitive mercury, and to which the aching nerves and sluggish blood of the physical body instantly respond. They sat for some time silent, Teddy holding Mary's soft hand in his, roughened and coarsened by years of toil. As he gazed into the fire he saw there with the eyes of vision, their little home; Mary comelier than ever with her children gathered about her—the sacred vision that at some time, has kindled the soul of every man worthy the name. The clock struck eleven. Their moment of apprehension passed and when Mary spoke again it was with her old cheerfulness. They parted with full hearts and with her lover's kiss warm upon her lips, Mary went to her bed counting herself supremely blest.

She slept and dreamed that B. F. Mullins had suddenly appeared and demanded her engagement ring. She refused to surrender it and he attempted to wrench it from her finger. In her pain she cried aloud, and woke to find Eleanor bending over her.

"What is it; what has frightened you?"

"Oh, Miss Eleanor, I've had such a dreadful dream—I'm sure it means trouble!"

"Nonsense! How can you be so superstitious. Go to sleep again. See, I will open the door between our rooms and if you can't sleep, dear, call me, and I will come."

Eleanor touched her forehead gently with her lips, and left her quieted and soothed.

CHAPTER XIX.

The Ultimatum.

The latter part of February the snow, which had covered the ground for several weeks, began to melt. The roads were thick with icy slush and the fields were cold and wet. The mist of the early morning was followed by east wind and rain—not a driving storm, roaring through the dripping woods—but a dull drizzle that congealed the blood, breeding discouragement and apprehension.

Randall had finished reading his letters and dictating replies. Mary Benson, sitting at her typewriter in the outer office, was busy copying them.

Dull and out of sorts for no apparent cause, except the depressing weather, Randall stared out of the window lost in vague reflection. He was thinking idly of Teddy Wilkins. He was to be married in a fortnight. Thoroughly happy in his own home, he took a personal interest in Teddy's romance. He had noticed the improvement in Mary Benson whom, although she had been faithful and thoroughly reliable since he had taken her into his employ, he had considered rather vain and shallow. She had developed a womanliness that greatly pleased him and he recalled the modest gratitude with which she came to thank him for an additional envelope that he had added to her regular wages "as a little help toward the housekeeping."

Mary had always regarded Randall as a model employer—so polite, so considerate and liberal. He was inherently well-bred, and had not one set of manners for his intimates and another for his employees. He would no more have smoked in the face of his stenographer, sat with his feet on his desk, or sprawled vulgarly in his chair in her presence ,than in that of Eleanor Crofton. He repudiated the assertion of inordinate selfishness that "working women were taking the bread out of men's mouths;" for he found upon investigation that, in nine cases out of ten, women wage-earners were supporting men's families, impelled by an unfaltering sense of duty. On this ground, he considered that they were entitled to more—not less—courtesy than his own sex lavished voluntarily upon frivolous women of fashion. His view, of course, was unique, but his whole code of ethics was uncommon as applied to every-day affairs.

Without self-applause he was demonstrating that humanity and generosity were not incompatible with financial success.

In the midst of his speculations he was roused by the closing of an outer door, and almost immediately B. F. Mullins came into his private office. He was accompanied by his lawyer, a man better known for professional cunning than for honesty. Randall had come to look upon Mullins as a sort of bird of evil omen, and instantly suspected that he had not relinquished his intention of forcing him by fair means or foul, to join the Trust; which, accomplished he knew perfectly well that Mullins, as the richer man, would take control of the Works and probably compel him eventually to retire. He was not hoodwinked by the bluff cordiality which Mullins assumed, nor by the suave greeting of his attorney.

He bid them both good-morning and asked them to be seated. Mullins set down, crossed one leg over the other, displaying the sole of his huge shoe which revealed the lines of a heavy foot, flat and springless as that of a plantigrade. He clasped his hairy hands behind his head and cleared his throat. He found it a little difficult to begin, and he did not authorize the lawyer to speak for him. His face was redder than ever, and his stubby beard seemed coarser and more grizzled. His small furtive eyes avoided Randall's questioning scrutiny.

"Well, Mr. Mullins," Randall said at length, as his visitor sat silent, "since this is hardly the weather for a mere friendly visit, and as you have brought Mr. Simms with you, I infer that you have come to see me on business."

Mullins, on this remark, looked at Randall, for the first time and said:

"You're right!"

"Very well, then," said Randall shortly, "Come to the point."

"That's right," remarked the lawyer approvingly.

"Well," said Mullins, shifting his hands to his knees, and leaning forward a little, "since, as you say, there's no use parleying and wasting time—I've come to buy this plant."

"To buy this plant!" Randall repeated wonderingly.

"Yes."

"But I've no intention of selling. I have never thought of such a thing. I've never intimated to anybody that I would sell at any price!"

"That remains to be seen," said Mullins indifferently.

"I beg to differ with you," Randall retorted sharply, restraining himself with difficulty. "I think I made it pretty clear in our former conversation that I would not, under any circumstances, consider a partnership, or reorganization, on any basis which would deprive me of the unhampered personal control of my own business. And it is mine. With the help of my men, I have made it what it is. I shall keep absolute control of the plant."

As if he had not spoken, Mullins, placing his heavy feet on the floor, said slowly: "I am authorized to pay you $60,000 for this plant."

"I would not accept twice that sum! It would not even tempt me!"

Mullins only repeated his former statement a little more slowly than at first: "I am authorized by the Wire Fence Trust to offer you sixty thousand dollars in cash, for this works, which will include the machinery, buildings and the stock you have on hand."

Randall was very pale, but said in a firm voice: "I decline the offer."

"Very well," said Mullins dispassionately, "you can accept the sum I offer you, or shut down in thirty days and get nothing."

"Who says so?" Rendall demanded. "Who dare order me to shut my doors, whether I like it or not?"

"The Trust I spoke of, backed by the court of New Jersey," replied Mullins, doggedly.

"The court of New Jersey! Has it assumed jurisdiction over the courts of Indiana?"

"The Trust recognizes no sectionalism," smoothly interposed Simms.

"No; nor the rights of individuals, it seems," observed Randall caustically. For a moment there was silence, then Randall asked quietly:

"I suppose, on taking over the works, your first official act would be to cut down wages?"

"O, no," said Mullins easily, "we wouldn't do that! There would be no pay-roll at all, for we intend to close out the whole concern."

"Close it out! Close it out!" Randall exclaimed hotly. "Turn my men adrift at this season when it is almost impossible to find work anywhere? Men who have been with me for years—of whom I've never had cause to complain—who have done their best?"

"Well, we've got to regulate the output, and somebody's got to suffer," said Mullins with cool brutality.

"'Somebody'—yes!—But I've noticed in instances like this that it is never the directors—never the individual members of corporations, never the man of millions! You turn men into the streets without a qualm and leave their families to starve, if their wives cannot earn their bread with the needle or over the wash-tub. But when a reduction is ordered there is not one of you who sacrifices a single luxury—not one!"

"That has nothing to do with the matter we're discussing."

"It has everything to do with it," said Randall emphatically. "If, when there is need of entrenchment, the stockholders and officers of corporations would bear their fair share of it, the so-called conflict between capital and labor would be reduced to a minimum. But you do not—you will not! you go to Europe, and toady to an aristocracy that don't want you—that justly holds you in contempt—while it rifles your pocket! You buy fine horses, you live as extravagantly as ever! And when your profits foot up into the millions, you salve your conscience—or rather advertise your generosity—by building hospitals and churches, endowing colleges, and founding libraries—with your name always over the entrance in huge letters; while the discharged workmen may starve, or his family sink to the gutter!"

"The public are glad enough to have the colleges and churches, and use the libraries," said Mullins sardonically.

"I admit that—to their shame—but you take exclusive credit of the gift; whereas every man that you have hired, from the lowest to the highest, has helped you earn the millions that you could not otherwise accumulate, and the gift—often wrung from them—in every case, was theirs as well as yours."

"I'm sorry, Randall,, but this is all nonsense, you know; you talk like a social settlement crank, if you'll excuse me."

Randall did not notice either the comparison or the apology; he was too outraged at this audacious violation of his personal rights to be captious over trifling insults.

"You seem disposed to resist shutting down," Simms the lawyer now interposed, "but in this world, as society is unavoidably constituted, the few must suffer for the many."

"Oh, don't begin in that strain; it's only another form of the old doctrine of barbarians, 'Might makes right,'" Randall said impatiently.

"I must say what I have to say," the attorney persisted, "by closing half a dozen factories or more the output is regulated, the market is not overstocked, the prices are not lowered, and the result is, steady employment for a certain number of men for a much greater period."

"What good will that do these poor fellows whose bread is to be snatched from their mouths—whose homes will be destroyed? If, with all our boasted progress, we have hit upon no more humane and honest means of regulating trade, this Republic is a failure and our civilization a damnable humbug."

Mullins laughed uproariously. "Why, Dick," he exclaimed, "You have mistaken your calling. You ought to go on the lecture platform. You should have gone on the stump in the campaign. Indiana would have trebled her plurality."

Randall was in no joking mood. He was infuriated and if Mullins had been a younger man he would have struck him in the face. Presently he recovered his self-control and said calmly:

"In any event I would have refused your offer; but your avowed intention to close down—to discharge my people—would force me to refuse if I had no other reason. We have come through thus far together, and we will pull together to the end."

"I'm afraid that won't be for long." Mullins said significantly.

"It will be as long as I live—as long as we have a market—as long as my credit is what it is today. And now, since nothing you or Mr. Simms could say will alter my decision, I see no reason why we should talk any further."

"I understand, then, that you refuse?"

"I think I've made my meaning sufficiently plain."

"Then," said Mullins deliberately, "all I have to say is this, that, whether you accept our offer or not, you will have to shut down. I've learned that you have on hand material that'll keep you running for about thirty days. When that supply is exhausted you cannot buy another ounce! The Trust has bought up all the wire in the country."

Mullins' ultimatum came like a thunderbolt. In all the conceivable machinations of the enemy, Randall had never anticipated such an infamous move as this. He sprang to his feet with increased pallor, his eyes burning with helpless wrath; he realized that he was tied hand and foot. No snared beast was more impotent; brains, morals, courage, integrity; every attribute of manhood that he possessed, proved of no avail. He could not lift a finger to avert the calamity, to save himself, and—a far more serious matters—to save his men!

"This a free country?" he cried. "This the country that was to overthrow despotism?—to teach the oppressed the meaning of freedom? Under the laws of the land—made by your venal tools—men like yourself are empowered to enter my shops, which are as much mine, and should be as inviolate as my house—and stop every wheel by the mere word of command; paralyze my business, cut off the wages of my men, turn them out to starve or beg. For you know, with all our boasted prosperity there has never been a time when it was so hard for the unemployed, no matter how skilled or faithful, to get work when they have lost their job. Unfortunately the Trust by lessening the number of jobs does not lessen the number of men who must have them, die or become paupers or criminals through no fault of their own. You have not hurt me as you have hurt my men. Only a minor part of my capital is invested here, as you have doubtless informed yourself."

"Then put your socialistic theories into practice," said Mullins, with a sneer.

"I need no advice from you, Mr. Mullins, on that point. God help them all, if I did! They have not been raging anarchists or wheedling socialists, opposing me at every turn, and I do not mean to desert them. But that is quite aside from the unspeakable outrage I must suffer, with no redress from you or your fellow conspirators. Neither Russian autocracy nor Asiatic despotism have such merciless power over life and death as the Industrial Combines of these United States; they have been and will be the death and ruin of thousands! It means, in the end, bloody revolution."

Mullins eyed Randall contemptuously. Such men cannot be touched by the logic of integrity. He muttered: "Damned heroics!" then added aloud, "I made you a fair proposition."

"A fair proposition!" said Randall. "There is not the faintest semblance of fairness in it! The armed footpad that attacks a defenseless man, and the thug that strangles in the dark can as well talk of fair dealing."

"Well," said Mullins, rising, "I've made my offer, take it or leave it!" and he stalked out of the office with Simms at his heels.

A Little Nonsense

The Law and the Lady.

Former Judge Beasley, one of the counsel of the Public Service Railway company, in summing up a case before the jury the other day, told the following story to show the unreasonableness of a woman:

"Pat Finnigan had been summoned to jury duty. Coming down stairs one morning, dressed in his Sunday clothes, his wife looked at him and said:

"'Where are you going, Pat?'
